Another arm of her faith work is the children. She has two Orphan Homes. And yet another is a Home for Invalids. And all has been founded and sustained through faith in the Lord, not a single penny being asked from any one—all has come from the hands of those whom the Lord has moved to give unasked.
The work has gone on and grown since the year 1875, and she has adapted it with God-given wisdom to the circumstances of those northern kingdoms, not imitating the work elsewhere, but adapting it perfectly to the people and their circumstances; and while she has had many trials of her faith in the work, they never have lacked bread, or clothing, or shelter, and never have been in debt. The number in the various homes now is about a hundred, depending upon the Lord, through her, for daily bread.

ASAHEL H. HUSSEY, OF OHIO.
ASAHEL H. HUSSEY, from Mount Pleasant, Ohio, whose portrait appears on page 412, also attended the Faith-Healing Conference in London. He is a member of the Society of Friends.
He is known as the editor and publisher of the Gospel Expositor, a paper devoted to the exposition of Gospel truth, especially on the line of Holiness and Faith-Healing. At the close of last year Mr. Hussey united his paper with one published in Chicago. He is also one of the nine directors of the Publishing Association of Friends, and one of the three editors. Mr. Hussey has also made a selection of hymns and spiritual songs which are set to music, and a smaller book of choice selections of spiritual songs without music, which is a new thing among that quiet religious community. A little book entitled "Holiness, or Christian Perfection as Set Forth in the Scriptures, and Believed in by the Society of Friends," has had a circulation of several thousands, also a tract on "Confessing Christ," are from his pen. He is a full believer in the personal return of Christ in the near future, and often speaks upon this subject.
He was born in 1833, at Mount Pleasant, Ohio, where he now lives on his father's farm of one hundred and sixty-nine acres. His early rural life and poor health promoted habits of piety, but did not bring salvation or rest of soul. But fifteen years ago, in 1870, he was converted and became concerned for the salvation of others; and immediately he began preaching the Gospel. In this God blessed his work to the salvation of souls, as he travelled through the United States. His constant work in preaching and teaching brought on a severe and painful nervousness of the head, which at times was so great as to stop his work, sometimes in the midst of a revival meeting, and at times in the midst of his preaching.

For the relief of this he tried many remedies and physicians for years, without relief. At last, when one of his worst spells was upon him, he visited a friend who had been healed by faith in answer to prayer; and on receiving instructions how to trust the Lord for healing, he did so, while Divine healing was being explained to him, and was immediately and permanently healed. After this he was often called upon to pray for the sick, and many cases of healing occurred in answer to these prayers, of persons suffering from loss of voice, spine disease, consumption, and cancer.

While in Columbus, Ohio, he gave one of his houses for the benefit of a Faith Home, furnish- ing it mostly himself for that work, which proved a blessing to many.

REV. ELIAS SCHRENK, OF GERMANY.
REV. ELIAS SCHRENK, whose portrait appears on page 412, was born in 1831, in Tuttligen, in Wurtemberg, Southern Germany, where he received his education. In accordance with his late father's will, he became a merchant in hard- ware, and afterward head book-keeper in a bank, though from his tenth year he felt called to preach the Gospel among the heathen. When twenty-three years old he felt free in his conscience to leave business and to prepare himself for the ministry. After having offered his services to the Bäle Missionary Society, he studied five years in their college at Bäle, and then was sent to the Gold Coast of Western Africa, in 1859, where he labored thirteen years, notwith- standing the trying nature of the climate. Before his departure from Africa he was severely ill, but was healed instantaneously through faith and prayer, under the teaching of Dorothea Trudel, at Mannsdorf, after all medical treatment had failed. This experience strengthened his faith for many trials on the Gold Coast, when death so often seemed to be very near.
Having returned to Europe in 1872, he was for some time pastor at Davos, in Switzerland. The year 1874 saw him busy in England on be- half of the Bäle Missionary Society, for start- ing a mission in Ashantee after the British war with the Ashantees.
It is remarkable that out of the Ashantee war there thus sprang a mission work, which at present is carried on by twenty-five German mission- aries. Afterward he was travelling for four years in Germany to stir up people for this and other foreign mission work, and during the last six years he was engaged at Berne, introducing there home evangelistic missions, as we have it in this country. He is still very active, notwith- standing his thirteen years' service on the Gold Coast, exhibiting personally the ever sure promise of the Lord, "I am the Lord, thy Healer."

A Remarkably Successful Series of Services have been held at Nashville, Tenn., during the past three weeks, by the Rev. Samuel Jones, of Georgia. Over five thousand people, the South- ern papers say, have been seen at every service, and the number of conversions is enormous. Mr. Jones has passed through the ordeal of denunciation that lies at the outset of the course of original preachers, and his value is recognized. He is thirty-six years of age, and until his conversion, fifteen years ago, was a lawyer, and by no means a moral man. He is now intensely in earnest, and his sermons are being used of God to the conversion of many hitherto considered hopeless cases. The following pointed observa- tions are illustrations of his style of preaching, and explain how it is that his hearers are im- pressed: "Thank God any of us can turn to- night, but I would not be any man's security that he can turn to-morrow. The best thing a man can do is to say, 'Here I am, Lord; take me as I am.' There's many a fellow with a whitewash brush trying to clean up a little be- fore he goes to God. Pull up your doubts by the roots, and you'll find a seed at the bottom, and that seed is sin. A lie is always on the down grade, but the truth you have to hitch an engine to. What is culture worth if it's nothin' but whitewash on a rascal? I'd rather be in heaven learnin' my A B C than in hell reading Greek. Some preachers are so elegant that they speak of hell as the 'burnt district,' but this sort of dignity is the starch of a shroud. Heaven is on dead level with every good man."

SUMMER TEMPTATIONS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 21, 1885.

"Come ye yourselves apart unto a desert place and rest awhile."—MARK 6: 31.

The Crowded Summer Resorts—The Temptations There—I. To Leave Piety Behind—How the Sunday is Spent—Tainted Air—II. To Attend Horse Races—The Horse in the Bible—In Literature—In Training—On the Race-Course—Vicious Surroundings—III. To Unhealthy Habits—IV. Flirtation—V. Pernicious Literature—VI. Intoxicants—Satan's Down Grade—Temptations at Home—Living Watering-Places.

HERE Christ advises His apostles to take a vacation. They have been living an excited as well as a useful life, and He advises that they get out into the country. When, six weeks ago, standing in this place, I advocated, with all the energy I could command, the Saturday afternoon holiday, I did not think the people would so soon get that release. By divine fiat it has come, and I rejoice that more people will have opportunity of recreation this summer than in any previous summer. Others will have whole weeks and months of rest. The railway trains are being laden with passengers and baggage on their way to the mountains and the lakes and the sea-shore. Multitudes of our citizens are packing their trunks for a RESTORATIVE ABSENCE.

The city heats are pursuing the people with torch and fear of sunstroke. The long silent halls of sumptuous homes are all abuzz with excited arrivals. The crystalline surface of Winipisogee is shattered with the stroke of steamer, laden with excursionists. The antlers of Adirondack deer rattle under the shot of city sportsmen. The trout make fatal snaps at the hook of adroit sportsmen and toss their spotted brilliance into the game basket.

Already the baton of the orchestral leader taps the music stand on the hotel green, and American life puts on festal array, and the rumbling of the tepin alley, and the crack of the ivory balls on the green-baized billiard tables, and the jolting of the bar-room goblets, and the explosive uncorking of champagne bottles, and the whirl and the rustle of the ball-room dance, and the clattering hoofs of the race-courses attest that the season for the great American watering-places is fairly inaugurated. Music—flute and drum and cornet-a-piston and clapping cymbals—will wake the echoes of the mountains.

RECREATION NECESSARY.

Glad I am that fagged-out American life for the most part will have an opportunity to rest, and that nerves racked and destroyed will find a Bethesda. I believe in watering-places. Let not the commercial firm begrudge the clerk, or the employer the journeyman, or the patient the physician, or the church its pastor a season of inoccupation. Luther used to sport with his children; Edmund Burke used to caress his favorite horse; Thomas Chalmers, in the dark hour of the church's disruption, played kite for recreation—as I was told by his own daughter—and the busy Christ said to the busy apostles, "Come ye apart awhile into the desert and rest yourselves." And I have observed that they who do not know how to rest do not know how to work.

A NOTE OF WARNING.

But I have to declare this truth to-day, that some of our fashionable watering-places are the temporal and eternal destruction of "a multitude that no man can number," and amid the congratulations of this season and the prospect of the departure of many of you for the country I must utter a note of warning—plain, earnest, and unmistakable.

1. The first temptation that is apt to hover in this direction is to leave your piety all at home. You will send the dog and cat and canary bird to be well cared for somewhere else; but the temptation will be to leave your religion in the room with the blinds down and the door bolted, and then you will come back in the autumn to find that it is starved and suffocated, lying stretched on the rug stark dead. There is no surplus of piety at the watering-places. I never knew any one to grow very rapidly in grace at the Catskill Mountain House, or Sharon Springs, or the Falls of Montmorency. It is generally the case that the Sabbath is more of a carousal than any other day, and there are Sunday walks, and Sunday rides, and Sunday excursions.

Elders and deacons and ministers of religion who are entirely consistent at home, sometimes when the Sabbath dawns on them at Niagara Falls or the White Mountains take the day to themselves. If they go to the church it is apt to be a sacred parade, and the discourse, instead of being a plain talk about the soul, is apt to be what is called a crack sermon—that is, some discourse picked out of the effusions of the year as the one most adapted to excite admiration, and in those churches, from the way the ladies hold their fans, you know that they are not so much impressed with the heat as with the picturesqueness of half-disclosed features. Four puny souls stand in the organ loft and squall a tune that nobody knows, and worshippers, with $2000 worth of diamonds on the right hand, drop a cent into the poor-box, and then the benediction is pronounced and the farce is ended.

TAINTED AIR.

The toughest thing I ever tried to do was to be good at a watering-place. The air is bewitched with "the world, the flesh, and the devil." There are Christians who in three or four weeks in such a place have had such terrible rents made in their Christian robe that they had to keep darning it until Christmas to get it mended! The health of a great many people makes an annual visit to some mineral spring an absolute necessity; but, my dear people, take your Bible along with you, and take an hour for secret prayer every day, though you be surrounded by gufaw and saturnalia. Keep holy the Sabbath, though they denounce you as a bigoted Puritan. Stand off from those institutions which propose to imitate on this side the water the iniquities of Baden-Baden. Let your moral and your immortal health keep pace with your physical recuperation, and remember that all the waters of Hawthorne and sulphur and chalybeate springs cannot do you so much good as the mineral, healing, perennial flood that breaks forth from the "Rock of Ages." This may be your last summer. If so, make it a fit vestibule of heaven.

THE RACE-COURSE.

II. Another temptation around nearly all our watering-places is the horse-racing business. We all admire the horse. There needs to be a redistribution of coronets among the brute creation. For ages the lion has been called the king of beasts. I knock off its coronet and put the crown upon the horse, in every way nobler, whether in shape, or spirit, or sagacity, or intelligence, or affection, or usefulness. He is semi-human and knows how to reason on a small scale. The centaur of olden times, part horse and part man, seems to be a suggestion of the fact that the horse is something more than a beast.

Job sets forth his strength, his beauty, his majesty, the panting of his nostril, the pawing of his hoof and his enthusiasm for the battle. What Rosa Bonheur did for the cattle and what Landseer did for the dog, Job with mightier pencil does for the horse. Eighty-eight times does the Bible speak of him. He comes into every kindly procession and into every great occasion and into every triumph. It is very evident that Job, and David, and Isaiah, and Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and John were fond of the horse. He came into much of their imagery. A red horse—that meant war. A black horse—that meant famine. A pale horse—that meant death. A white horse—that meant victory.

A NOBLE ANIMAL.

As the Bible makes a favorite of the horse, the patriarch, and the prophet, and the evangelist, and the apostle stroking his sleek hide, and patting his rounded neck, and tenderly lifting his exquisitely formed hoof, and listening with thrill to the champ of his bit, so all great men in all ages have spoken of him in encomiums. Virgil in his Georgics almost seems plagiarize from the description of Job. The ir of Wellington would not allow any one irreverently to touch his old war-horse Copenhagen whom he had ridden fifteen hours without mounting at Waterloo; and when old Chahen died his master ordered a military s fired over his grave. John Howard sh that he did not exhaust all his sympathy pitying the human race, for when sick he v home: "Has my old chaise-horse become or spoiled?"

But we do not think that the speed of horse should be cultured at the expense human degradation. Horse-races in olden were under the ban of Christian people, a our day the same institution has come up i fictitious names, and it is called a "Su Meeting," almost suggestive of positiv religious exercises. And it is called an "Agral Fair," suggestive of everything t improving in the art of farming. But i these deceptive titles are the same cheatin the same betting, the same drunkenness the same vagabondage and the same abo tions that were to be found under the old l racing system.

VICIOUS SURROUNDINGS.

I never knew a man yet who could give self to the pleasures of the turf for a long of time, and not be battered in morals. hook up their spanking team, and put on sporting cap, and light their cigar, and tal reins, and dash down the road to per the Great day at Saratoga, and Long B and Cape May, and nearly all the other v ing-places is the day of the races. The l are thronged, nearly every kind of equip taken up at an almost fabulous price, and are many respectable people mingling jockeys, and gamblers, and libertines, and mouthed men and flashy women. The tender stirs up the brandy smash. The be high. The greenhorns, supposing all is fa in their money soon enough to lose it. weeks before the race takes place the str is decided, and the men in the secret kn which steed to bet their money. The tw on the horses riding around long before arr who shall beat.

Leaning from the stand or from the ca are men and women so absorbed in the str of bone and muscle and mettle that they a grand harvest for the pickpockets, who off the pocketbooks and portemonnaies, looking on see only two horses with two flying around the ring; but there is m man on that stand whose honor and d happiness and fortune—white mane, white white flank—are in the ring, racing with i ety, and with fraud, and with profanity, and ruin—black neck, black foot, black flank, and neck they go in that moral Epsum.

DEPRECIATION OF MEN AND ANIMALS. Ah, my friends, have nothing to do horse-racing dissipations this summer. ago the English Government got through ing to the turf for the dragon and light c horse. They found the turf depreciate stock, and it is yet worse for men. T Hughes, the member of Parliament an author, known all the world over, hearing new turf enterprise was being started i country, wrote a letter, in which he "Heaven help you, then; for of all the c of our old civilization there is nothing i country approaching in unblushing mea in rascality holding its head high, to t lauded institution of the British turf." A famous sportsman writes: "How man domains have been shared among these h rapacious sharks during the last two hu years; and unless the system be altered many more are doomed to fall into the gulf!" The Duke of Hamilton, throug horse-racing proclivities, in three year ugh his entire fortune of £70,000, and I will hat some of you are being undermined by With the bull-fights of Spain and the bearings of the pit may the Lord God annihilate infamous and accursed horse-racing of Eng- and America.

UNHEALTHY HABITS.

I. I go further, and speak of another tem- p that that hovers over the watering-places; this is the temptation to sacrifice physical igh. The modern Bethesda was intended eparate the physical health; and yet how come from the watering-places their ly absolutely destroyed! New York and klyn idiots boasting of having imbibed ty glasses of Congress water before break- Families accustomed to going to bed at clock at night gossiping until one or two ck in the morning. Dyspeptics, usually cautious about their health, mingling ics, and lemons, and lobster-salads, and co- uts, until the gastric juices lift up all their es of lamentation and protest. Delicate en and brainless young men chazseing selves into vertigo and catalepsy. Thou- s of men and women coming back from our ring-places in the autumn with the founda- laid for ailments that will last them all life long. You know as well as I do that is the simple truth.

the summer you say to your good health: od-by, I am going to have a good time for the while. I will be very glad to see you in the autumn." Then in the autumn, you are hard at work in your office, or shop, or counting room, Good Health come and say: "Good-by, I am going," say, "Where are going?" "Oh," says Health, "I am going to take a vacation!" a poor rule that will not work both ways, your good health will leave you choleric, splenetic and exhausted. You coquetted your good health in the summer-time, and good health is coquetting with you in the er-time. A fragment of Paul's charge to taller would be an appropriate inscription he hotel-register in every watering-place: o thyself no harm."

FLIRTATION.

"Another temptation hovering around the ring-place is to the formation of hasty and ong alliances. The watering-places are re- sible for more of the domestic infelicities is country than all other things combined. ety is so artificial there that no sure judg- of character can be formed. Those who companionships amid such circumstances into a lottery where there are twenty blanks ne prize. In the severe tug of life you want ean glitter and splash. Life is not a ball- n where the music decides the step, and e and prance and graceful swing of long trail make up for strong common-sense. You ht as well go among the gayly-painted its of a summer regatta to find war vessels o go among the light spray of the summer ring-place to find character that can stand test of the great struggle of human life. In the battle of life you want a stronger pon than a lace fan or a croquet mallet! load of life is so heavy that in order to v it, you want a team stronger than one le up of a masculine grasshopper and a fem- e butterfly.

there is any man in the community that tes my contempt, and that ought to excite contempt of every man and woman, it is the -handed, soft-headed folk, who, perfumed l the air is actually sick, spends his summer taking killing attitudes, and waving senti- mental adieus, and talking infinitesimal ings, and finding his heaven in the set of a under kid-glove. Boots as tight as an inquisi- tor, two hours of consummate skill exhibited e tie of a flaming cravat, his conversation e up of "Ahs," and "Ohs," and "He- s." It would take five hundred of them ed down to make a teaspoonful of calf's-foot r. There is only one counterpart to such a man as that, and that is the frothy young woman at the watering-place, her conversation made up of French moonshine; what she has on her head only equalled by what she has on her back; useless ever since she was born, and to be useless until she is dead; and what they will do with her in the next world I do not know, except to set her upon the banks of the River of Life for eternity to look sweet! God intends us to admire music and fair faces and graceful step, but amid the heartlessness and the inflation and the fantastic influences of our modern water- ing-places, beware how you make life-long cov- enants!

PERNICIOUS LITERATURE.

V. Another temptation that will hover over the watering-place is that of baneful literature. Almost every one starting off for the summer takes some reading matter. It is a book out of the library or off the bookstand, or bought of the boy hawking books through the cars. I really believe there is more pestiferous trash read among the intelligent classes in July and August than in all the other ten months of the year. Men and women who at home would not be satisfied with a book that was not really sensible, I found sitting on hotel-piazas or under the trees reading books the index of which would make them blush if they knew that you knew what the book was.

"Oh," they say, "you must have intellectual recreation!" Yes. There is no need that you take along into a watering-place "Hamilton's Metaphysics" or some thunderous discourse on the eternal decrees, or "Faraday's Philosophy." There are many easy books that are good. You might as well say: "I propose now to give a little rest to my digestive organs, and instead of eating heavy meat and vegetables, I will, for a little while, take lighter food—a little strychnine and a few grains of ratsbane." Literary poison in August is as bad as literary poison in December. Mark that. Do not let the frogs and the lice of a corrupt printing-press jump and crawl into your Saratoga trunk or White Mountain valise.

Would it not be an awful thing for you to be struck with lightning some day when you had in your hand one of these paper-covered romances—the hero a Parisian roue, the heroine an unprincipled flirt—chapters in the book that you would not read to your children at the rate of $100 a line? Throw out all that stuff from your summer baggage. Are there not good books that are easy to read—books of entertaining travel, books of congenial history, books of pure fun, books of poetry ringing with merry canto, books of fine engravings, books that will rest the mind as well as purify the heart and elevate the whole life? My hearers, there will not be an hour between this and the day of your death when you can afford to read a book lacking in moral principle.

INTOXICANTS.

VI. Another temptation hovering all around our watering-places is the intoxicating beverage. I am told that it is becoming more and more fashionable for woman to drink. I care not how well a woman may dress, if she has taken enough of wine to flush her cheek and put glassiness on her eyes, she is intoxicated. She may be handed into a $2500 carriage and have diamonds enough to confound the Tiffanys—she is intoxicated. She may be a graduate of Packer Institute, and the daughter of some man in danger of being nominated for the Presidency—she is drunk. You may have a larger vocabulary than I have, and you may say in regard to her that she is "convivial," or she is "merry," or she is "festive," or she is "exhilarated," but you cannot with all your garlands of verbiage cover up the plain fact that it is an old-fashioned case of drunk.

Now, the watering-places are full of tempta- tions to men and women to tittle. At the close of the tenpin or billiard game they tittle. At the close of the cotillon they tittle. Seated on the piazza cooling themselves off they tittle. The tinged glasses come around with bright straws, and they tittle. First they take "light wines," as they call them, but "light wines" are heavy enough to debase the appetite. There is not a very long road between champagne at $5 a bottle and whiskey at five cents a glass.

Satan has three or four grades down which he takes men to destruction. One man he takes up, and through one spree pitches him into eternal darkness. That is a rare case. Very seldom, indeed, can you find a man who will be such a fool as that.

THE DOWN GRADE.

When a man goes down to destruction Satan brings him to a plane. It is almost a level. The depression is so slight that you can hardly see it. The man does not actually know that he is on the down grade, and it tips only a little toward darkness—just a little. And the first mile it is claret, and the second mile it is sherry, and the third mile it is punch, and the fourth mile it is ale, and the fifth mile it is porter, and the sixth mile it is brandy, and then it gets steeper and steeper and steeper, and the nian gets frightened and says, "Oh, let me get off!"

No," says the conductor, "this is an express train, and it does not stop until it gets to the Grand Central Depot at Smashupton." Ah, "look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth its color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." And if any young man in my congregation should get astray this summer in this direction it will not be because I have not given him fair warning.

LIVING WATERING-PLACES.

My friends, whether you tarry at home—which will be quite as safe and perhaps quite as comfortable—or go into the country, arm yourself against temptation. The grace of God is the only safe shelter, whether in town or country. There are watering-places accessible to all of us. You cannot open a book of the Bible without finding out some such watering-place. Foun- tains open for sin and uncleanness; wells of sal- vation; streams from Lebanon; a flood struck out of the rock by Moses; fountains in the wil- derness discovered by Hagar; water to drink and water to bathe in; the river of God, which is full of water; water of which if a man drink he shall never thirst; wells of water in the Valley of Baca; living fountains of water; a pure river of water as clear as crystal from under the throne of God.

These are watering-places accessible to all of us. We do not have a laborious packing up be- fore we start—only the throwing away of our transgressions. No expensive hotel bills to pay; it is "without money and without price." No long and dirty travel before we get there; it is only one step away. California in five minutes; I walked around and saw ten fountains, all bub- bling up, and they were all different. And in five minutes I can go through this Bible parterre and find you fifty bright, sparkling fountains bubbling up into eternal life.

A chemist will go to one of these summer watering-places and take the water and analyze it and tell you that it contains so much of iron, and so much of soda, and so much of lime, and so much of magnesia. I come to this Gospel well, this living fountain and analyze the water, and I find that its ingredients are peace, pardon, forgiveness, hope, comfort, life, heaven. "Ho, every one that thirsteth come ye" to this water- ing-place!

Crowd around this Bethesda this morning! Oh, you sick, you lame, you troubled, you dying—crowd around this Bethesda! Step in it! Oh, step in it! The angel of the covenant this morning 'stirs the water. Why do you not step in it? Some of you are too weak to take a step in that direction. Then we take you up in the arms of our closing prayer and plunge you clean under the wave, hoping that the cure may be as sudden and as radical as with Captain Naaman, who, blotched and carbuncled, stepped into the Jordan, and after the seventh dive came up, his skin roseate complexioned as the flesh of a little child.

THE PERSONAL ANTICHRIST.

By Rev. M. Parsons, D.D., of Buffalo, N. Y.

The Age of Antichrist—He is Not a Myth—The Three Spirits—A Hoary Blunder.

THE AGE OF ANTICHRIST.

It is quite unnecessary to regard Antichrist as a personification of anything that opposes Christ. As it is the great power on which Satan relies to forward his cause in this age, he has continued to throw around the Word a speculative, or mystical, or spiritualized sense that takes away the literal and personal power of this mighty adversary. As against the confession of Satan, let us look at the Antichrist of prophecy. Antichrist is not an abstract principle of evil. Many talk of the fact and thought of evil and deny the personality of Satan, the grand and subtle enemy of God. So, as the devil has invented many works for the Son of God to destroy, his last masterpiece is this Antichrist, who fills up the prophetic outline of Satan's campaign in this age.

Prophecy reveals Antichrist under various forms and separate titles. Just as our Lord is predicted by prophets and priests of the Old Testament, each one presenting some significant trait of His character, some form of His office, some distinct picture of His person, of His Coming, and His reign—all which are completed and compacted in His incarnation—so the pen of inspiration sketches the portrait of this adverse and opposing person, Antichrist, under various forms and separate titles.

The Apostle John, in his Epistle, speaks of the spirit of Antichrist as then prevailing, and that whoever denies that Christ is to come in the flesh is Antichrist (1 John 2:18, 22, 23). He does not call any name in thus describing the spirit of Antichrist. It will be more suggestive than any labored exposition to reveal the truth of Scripture on this subject, to turn our attention to several inspired portraits, and see how they fit the thought we are urging, that under separate names and titles the same person is always meant. Thus, in Revelation 13th, the Beast is described in 1st and 2d of Daniel the Little Horn, in 13th of Daniel, King of fierce Countenance, and in 9th the Prince that shall come; the King of Assyria of 10th; and Lucifer, of 14th of Isaiah. The Man of Sin and Son of Perdition in 2 Thess. 2.

These prophetic statements seem conclusive against the theory of a growing increase of boldness and peace and purity that shall be universal, previous to the coming again of the Lord. For instead of a gradual victory over the foe they describe his vaunted resumption of power, until a given time—when the "indignation" against Israel shall be accomplished, and the end of the age be at hand.

Another prophetic statement in 2 Thess. 2:4 describes Antichrist "as exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped." And this has currently been applied to the apostate Roman Church, in the assumptions claimed and exercised by the Pope. Without doubt there is here an illustrious and conspicuous and continued representation of the spirit of Antichrist manifesting itself through the age, within the Christian Church, and in the name of Christ. For we must look for this manifestation not outside, but within the organized Christian fold. Yet in the prophetic statement of the final Antichrist, in Daniel 11:45, it is said:

He shall plant the tabernacle of His palace between the seas in the glorious Holy Mountain, and in 2 Thess. 2:4 he is represented as "sitting in the temple of God showing Himself that he is God." While this last feature of the reign of Antichrist finds its shadow in the pretensions of the Papacy we still believe that a more literal and more imminent springing out of present and patent conditions of blasphemy and corruption will be seen in the very temple yet to be built in Jerusalem.

The personality of this Antichrist is seen to be real, and clearly visible in human form, from noting the contrast of personal and moral qualities of Christ with those which will distinguish Antichrist.

ANTICHRIST NOT A MYTH.

Antichrist is not a mere principle, nor a myth. If Christ be a real person in human form, so is he. If Christ is declared and spoken of as endowed with all grace and humility and glory, and having a glorious retinue of the saved and glorified ones—Antichrist is the embodied reality of the very opposite principles and their malignant supporters, which shall be utterly destroyed in all their usurped empire, and in the very person of their boastful and blasphemous king, in that day when the Faithful and True shall ride forth from the opened heaven with His armies to "judge and make war" (Rev. 19:11-14).

There is a preparation now going on for this grand and glorious issue, on the part of the enemies of God. In Rev. 16:13-14, we have a description of three unclean spirits, like frogs, coming out of the mouth of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. These are spirits of demons working miracles, going forth to the kings of the earth and of the world to gather them to the great battle of which we have spoken. One spirit came out of the mouth of the dragon. This may be infidelity, in its various forms, now so fashionably prevalent, atheism, pantheism, skepticism, rationalism, and all the forms and phases of intellectual speculation which deny the Word of the living God to-day. These are recruiting the forces for Antichrist.

The next demon comes out of the mouth of the Antichrist, and represents that alienation from God, independence of God, and opposition to Him, which in these days is so manifest, a worldly spirit, secretly or openly infusing itself in the Church. It is that lawlessness spoken of in 2 Thess. 2:7, which is so rapidly developing in this and other lands as a lawless and godless socialism. And then a third demon from the mouth of the false prophet. When men cast off the superstitions of the harlot they will have some religion. When men throw off the external garb of a formal godliness they will seek some refuge of lies. And so spiritualism is a widely extended phase of modern infidelity. These three unclean spirits are recognized by all the children of God. We cannot, my brethren, reason them down, or coax them, with the flat-teries of a mis-called Christian charity, to cease their dreadful work of preparation for the empire of the final Antichrist.

The calculation which, by arithmetical process, would convert this world to Christ in fifty or a hundred years, falls to the ground when we consider the number and extent of the enemies of our Lord, within the very Church professing to receive and obey His last command. The age of the Church among the Gentiles will find the same appalling intrusion from conformity to the world, which we observe in every experiment before. God will be glorified in His creatures. In every age, thus far, the revelation from heaven has been slighted, and with all its splitting aid, man has started upon his first sad venture of being as God, and capable of gauding himself. His failure is demonstrated in each dispensation so wonderfully, it would seem that man should accept the Word of His Lord, and rest only on Him.

A HOARY BLUNDER.

But the power of Gentile civilization, the supremacy of Christianized thought and institutions, is so powerful and dazzling that men will not believe the Word of God. The Church is following the path of the Jews in their view of the First Advent. They looked at the coming glory, until, dazzled with the sight, they overlooked the humiliation and suffering of our Lord that was made essential to His appearing in glory. To-day the Church at large look for the recovery of this earth and this human race by means which nowhere in God's Word can be found appointed to that end.

The destinies of our age are plainly declared. As one has well said: "When this, our Gentile dispensation, shall have run the vast round of earth, and have reached again its starting point, the land of its nativity, and, returning in grief, as it were to die, its cradle will be a grave." But "in those days the God of Israel shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed." This will set in divided gloom, the Saturday evening's sun of that dispensation, briefly preceding the Mill dawn of the new Judaic dispensation, when salem shall at last dwell safely at rest in Gentile foes, when "her light shall go to brightness, and the salvation thereof as that burneth" to all the families of the with none to molest or make afraid in all holy mountain.

Thus shall Antichrist arise and prosper, practice, and pass away, and the groans travelling earth, now at last relieved, enter a Sabbath of peaceful and blessed rest. Satan be bound for a thousand years.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Rest for Body and Soul.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Stuart said: "A young girl not ago was on her death-bed, and as she dragged slowly by, the dying one exclaim the friends who were standing by her side 'I am weary' 'I am weary' 'Speak about it' 'Tell me of His mighty and unchanging love' They did so, and her wan face began to glow though she were already in the glory. 'That every one had learned this happy; that to speak about Jesus as the omnipotent everlasting Saviour, is rest for both body and soul.'"

A Night Spent in a Tree.—A Friend "A missionary with whom I was acquainted twenty years in one of the South Sea Islands the inhabitants had put some of his fellow missionaries to death, and were now in sea hunt; but a friendly chief came to his aid, warning him of his danger. He said: 'Will you come with me?' and the chief the way to a wood, and placed the missionary in a tree, where the chief assured him he was perfectly safe. He told me afterward that never had such a realization of God's presence as he had that night in the tree. The missionary said: 'I would gladly spend a there again to be so near to my God.'"

Jumping into the Darkness.—Mr. W narrated the following: "A gentleman was in a cellar of his business premises one when his child, a little girl, came into the and cried: 'Father, father, where are you?' 'I am here,' called the father, from the below. The child went to the edge of the and looked down into the darkness. 'My child,' called the father, 'and I will you.' 'Not seeing her father she became timid, and drew back a step. Again he called to her to jump, and this time getting all her courage, she jumped down into the cess, and was caught safely in her father's arms. Friends, who who are not yet saved, do a little child did: by faith throw yourself upon your Father's arms, because He is waiting to receive you."

Too Late to be Cured.—A Devoted Servant Christ said: "I remember a lady friend of mine in the village where I lived who was prostrated by a disease from which she never recovered. She had sought many doctors, who all butted their skill upon her, but instead of getting better she seemed to be growing worse. At last, hearing of it, called in one day, and said: 'Nothing more to do with these doctors; they are only trying experiments upon you.' I wrote to one of the Queen's doctors, who is one of the best physicians in the world.' She wrote to him, but being away from home at a very important case, he could not immediately come to this woman, and when after considerable delay he did come, he said: 'The roots of the disease have struck, and now too late to do anything for you. Had you come sooner I might have been the means of saving your life, but now, at the most, you will here are two years. It was just as the doctor said she had a powerful sufferer for two years when she was called to go with Christ. Her dear friends, there is a great Physician who can cure at your feet when He comes. He will not tell you that you are going to die, but that He cannot cure you without your wish, your consent and prayer. His own precious blood.

A Novelty Wanted.— Captain McLean said: "I was standing in a field the other day, and happened to ask him what church he intended, and on hearing I stopped. 'You could find a nearer church, and I think one where a truer Gospel is preached.' I want something new, he replied. 'It is always the same in that church you speak of, but I don't like it.' But he said, 'believe, and I am saved.' Yes, my friend, I replied. 'But how you believed yet?' I don't know anything about that, was his answer. 'Dear friends, that was the secret, he did not know anything about it, and he did not wish to know anything about it, and warning him of the dangerous position in which he was, I directed him to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.'

Another Friend Lost.—An Evangelist related the following: "When I was a Gloucester I was asked to stay with the Mayor at that place, and one day his wife said to me: 'Have you any objection to accompany my husband and myself on a visit to a lady?' I thought as well tell you, she added, that she is much given to strong drink, and we intended driving over for her and taking her to the meeting with us. I willingly agreed to this, but when I saw the lady I was much surprised. She was a fine, well-looking, unassuming lady, and there would never have thought of her being given to such an evil. We drove to the attic, a small hall, where George Fox preached his first sermon, and there that lady met with God and cried for mercy. Since then she is doing as she can to further the cause of God's dear Son."

A Conservative's Salubrity.—A Christian who had spent some time in the States, and some delinquent friends, and on knocking at a door a woman opened, and said, "My husband is very ill. Will you come and see him?" On entering the man informed me that he was dying at consumption. I asked him if he were trusting in Jesus. No, he said. I said, "On any terms except Christ, said I. We are there is something to be done for you. You believe that God sent His Son as the way to save sinners?" Yes, I believe that. And that He is able to save to the uttermost all who come unto Him. Yes, he said. I believe it. But that there is a way that I cannot get to the Father. Yes, I said, "But as He said, God that is not believing we are saved, but by faith in the Lord Jesus. When the man had said that I was not his friend, we went to his bed, and he told me about his thin hand to be healed. I was a zealous Christ. He did so and his end was peace."

A Yarned Wife.—Mr. Lakin, an Evangelist, remarked: "There was a lady in Manchester whose husband was a man of some position and influence in that city. They and their children might have been a happy family, for they had everything that this world could give, but the lady was much addicted to strong drink. Her husband, a man of great patience, tried in many ways to win her from it, but it was all in vain, and one day not being able to bear the humiliating disgrace any longer, he said to her: 'You have been guilty of most atrocious deeds, and I am going to be divorced from you.' When she heard this, she threw herself at his feet, and pleaded for forgiveness, crying to him not to put her away. His heart was touched, for she was still his wife, and lifting her from the ground, he said, 'I will freely forgive you. I will not cast you off, and this matter shall never be mentioned again, on condition that you never more touch the drink.' The promise was given, and the breach was healed. But, as time wore on, she began to take substitutes for whiskey, and by and by to take gin, and whiskey again, and eventually she was again as bad as ever. Before I left Manchester the distressed husband, with a breaking heart, was sending her to an asylum, where he intended she should spend the remaining part of her life."

How Mary became a Christian.—Mr. Jack remarked: "About ten years ago, on the occasion of Mr. Moody's first visit to Glasgow, God greatly blessed the work in Finnieston. At one of these meetings a young girl wanted to be spoken with. I directed her to Isaiah 55, and putting her finger on the verse, I said, 'All we like sheep have gone astray.' Is not that true?' Yes, perfectly true, she replied. 'We have named every one to our own way. Is not that also true, Mary?' Yes, she replied, perfectly true. 'But the Lord hath said, upon this iniquity of us all.' Do you also admit that this is true?' She hesitated, and said, 'No, I do not see that. But after some explanation, she entered into light, and went home a saved woman. Some years afterward I was visiting the district in which she lived, and when I knocked at her door was answered by Mary, who gave me a very hearty welcome. After a little conversation with her, I said, 'Were you saved in the church that called Mary?' Her mother, answering for her, said, 'Yes, Mary was saved, and has been a true and consistent Christian ever since, and I am very anxious that these two should be saved.' She added, pointing to two girls who sat by her side, 'It was not long before both of them gave their hearts to the Lord, and lately I had the pleasure of seeing a widow and her three daughters seated at the Lord's table, and all came out of this one girl giving her heart to the Saviour.' Wherefore, beloved, be ye steadfast, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY

The statesman whom Queen Victoria has invited to assume the direction of national affairs has been, since the death of the Earl of Beaconsfield, the acknowledged leader of the Conservative party. In making him Mr. Gladstone's successor, the Queen has followed constitutional precedents. For more than two centuries the government has been conducted alternately by the two great parties, and every attempt to form a coalition administration, in which Whigs and Tories were associated, has been a failure. The present Queen has reigned forty-eight years, and during that time the Whigs held office thirty years and eleven days, the Conservatives fifteen years and a half, and there was a brief period of about two years and a half, from the close of 1841 to the spring of 1843, in which a coalition ministry held office. With that one exception a Whig premier has been succeeded by a Tory premier, and be again by a Whig. This alternation is the logical consequence of the theory that the people rule. When they by a vote of their representatives in the House of Commons express disapproval of the policy of the administration the administration is expected to resign, or if this cannot be done the House does not properly represent the people, they may dismiss the representatives and order a fresh election. No premier can continue to direct the policy of the nation in defiance of the will of the people, as expressed in the House of Commons, he must either govern as the people wish, or give place to a premier who will. So when Mr. Gladstone placed in the Queen's hands the resignations of himself and his colleagues, Lord Salisbury, the leader of the Conservatives, was invited to take his place. The Conservative party is in its leading principles, contrary in its policy of protection, as opposed to free-trade, identical with the Republican party with us, but the comparison does not hold through out.

The new premier, Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoigne Cecil, Marquis of Salisbury, was born in 1830 and is therefore now fifty-five years old. The Cecil family, to which he belongs, is descended from Robert Cecil, a younger son of the famous Lord Bacon, the favorite minister of Queen Elizabeth. The family has assumed a marquisate, which is the next rank to the peerage to that of duke, which is the highest. In the younger days of the present Marquis, being the second son of his father, was known as Lord Robert Cecil. By the death of his elder brother he became Viscount Cranborne, a title borne by the eldest son of the Marquis of Salisbury at the time being, and in 1876, on the death of his father he became Marquis, and exchanged his seat in the House of Commons for the place in the House of Lords, which the marquisate gives.

From the time of his leaving the university, in 1853, Lord Salisbury has been in Parliament. The bulk of the real estate in the town of Stamford belongs to the Salisbury family, and when a member of Parliament is to be elected by that town the man who has the support of the Marquis of Salisbury is sure of election, as the voters know that they will consult their own interests by voting for their landlord's candidate. Thus it happened that when the present Marquis, then Lord Robert Cecil, a young man of twenty-three, presented himself as a candidate, he was elected. Curiously enough, he made his mark in the House by his attacks on the Conservative administration, which he assailed with a caustic severity in which he has few equals. He assailed it also in the press, for being poor, as most younger sons of peers are owing to the law of entail, which compels the estate being carried intact from the father to the eldest son, or the next male heir, if he has no son, he was glad to earn a little money by writing for the press. Many of the most trenchant and vigorous articles which appeared in the London Standard and The Saturday Review were from his pen. It was chiefly owing to his ferocious editorials that the Saturday Review acquired the name of The Saturday Revolver.

By 1866, however, he had made his peace with the Conservatives, who were much in need of young men of ability, and when in July of that year the late Earl Derby became premier he gave the young man a seat in the Cabinet. He had by that time become an ultra Conservative, and when he saw his colleague, Mr. Disraeli, proposing to extend the suffrage, he resigned his office in disgust. He recommended his assents on Disraeli, but this time there was a difference. He attacked him personally, while supporting Conservative principles, to which he believed Disraeli to be untrue. The differences were eventually arranged, and in 1874, when Disraeli returned to power Salisbury held office under him and became his warm friend. Together they managed the Russian crisis, and by their firmness and undaunted demeanor convinced the Czar to disgorge his ill-gotten plunder and reside from before Constantinople. He resigned with Disraeli, who had then become Earl Beaconsfield, in 1880, and from that time until this has been out of office. The party have looked to him for guidance since the death of Lord Beaconsfield, and now that Lord Cairns is dead, he stands almost alone in his party as a man of capacity and statesmanship.

The Marquis is an earnest member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, strongly opposed to the rationalizing tendencies of the time. Speaking as chairman of a religious meeting on one occasion, he said: "We are standing in one of the most awful crises through which the intellect of Christendom has ever passed. We can point to many distinguished intellects from which all that Christian belief is gone in which the latest the highest minds coincided. But great scientific discoveries always dazzle the intellect of man, making him think for a time he has destroyed ignorance, and leading him to try and explain everything. It is no season for half-hearted action or concealment. Those who are for Christ, and those who are against Him, should state distinctly in which camp they stand."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Gen. Grant's Removal from New York to a cooler climate became necessary last week, as the thermometer mounted into the nineties. Mr. Joseph W. Drexel invited him to his cottage at Mount McGregor, and the physicians having pronounced the place suitable, the General was taken there on June 16th. Everything that could be done to render the journey an easy one for the invalid was done. Mr. Vanderbilt placed his own special car at his disposal, and a special train was made up to prevent crowding and fatigue from stoppages. General Grant bore the journey as well as had been expected, though he evidently suffered much pain, and was extremely weak. A large swelling under the right ear indicates the alarming progress of the disease, and his weak voice, which for several days of the week before his removal was quite inaudible, showed how seriously the cancer was affecting the tongue and throat. Since his arrival at Mount McGregor the clear mountain air has improved General Grant's condition, but the reports of his physicians forbid the hope that the improvement is of a permanent character. All that is hoped is that it may slightly prolong his life.

The Great Statue of Liberty Enlightening the world, the gift of the French people to America, arrived off New York on June 17th, on board the Iser, and was formally presented and accepted on Friday last. The huge figure, which, when placed on its pedestal, will tower three hundred and five feet above the water of the Bay, the torch in the hand of the figure rising above the summit of the great towers of the Brooklyn Bridge, and higher than the spire of Trinity Church, is packed in sections. Its gigantic dimensions are realized as we read that it weighs two hundred and twenty tons, and is packed away below decks in two hundred and twelve boxes, some of them twenty feet long. Enormous crates, each containing many tons of metal, were packed away as neatly and with as much economy of space as so many bricks on a scow. The diadem was in an arched frame large enough for a horse and wagon to drive under. Other pieces, hardly recognizable from the careful manner in which they were packed, were pressed close beneath it until it looked as though the iron sides of the vessel would bulge out under the stupendous weight. The eyes and nose filled one crate, the forehead another, an ear and part of the crown another, until every foot of space seemed to be utilized. A sheet iron curl looked large enough for the smoke-stack of a small steam launch. A sailor said that it was eight feet long. A maritime procession went through the Narrows on Friday to escort the Iser to Bedloe's Island, and her officers to the Battery. Thence Captain De Saune and the French officers were conducted by a procession of military and civilians to the City Hall, where Mayor Grace and the Aldermen formally accepted the gift of the French people. The vessels in the Bay and the public buildings in the city were gay with bunting, and the booming of cannon and the screaming of the steam whistles expressed loudly, if not intelligibly, the city's sense of the importance of the occasion, and the gratitude of the people.

The Dolphin is not yet safely off Mr. Roach's hands. Mr. Whitney is of the opinion that the government has in her either "a broken contract or a bad bargain," and has submitted those alternatives to the Attorney-General for decision. The contract proves to have been so loosely drawn that the probability seems to be in favor of the ship proving a bad bargain, in which case the loss will fall on the people. If a broken contract can be proved it will fall on the contractors. It appears that before any trials of the ship had been made the Secretary of the Navy received warning that she was practically useless. He therefore called to his assistance a board of experts to witness the trials of the ship and report. The board discovered that she is so deficient in structural strength and stiffness that slight changes in the disposition of the weights she carries are sufficient to so alter her shape that her machinery will not work properly. No one can tell, therefore, how long she would be able to maintain even the low rate of speed which has been exhibited.

A Second Destructive Tornado Passed over Nebraska and Iowa on June 14th, only two days after the severe storm reported last week. Sioux City appears to have suffered most damage. The Baptist and Methodist churches were completely shattered and the fragments scattered by the wind about the city. Public buildings, warehouses, stores, and dwelling-houses were unroofed, some of the walls thrown down, and in some cases the buildings completely demolished. Omaha, Jackson, Neb., Ponca, Neb., Mason City, Iowa, and other places also suffered heavily. Thirteen lives were lost, and the destruction of property is enormous.

The Hon. James Russell Lowell Returned to America last week on the Scythia. A formal reception will be accorded to him in a few days, but by his own desire only a few personal friends were present to greet him as he stepped from the vessel. To a reporter who said, "I supposed you are glad to be home once more?" Mr. Lowell replied, "Yes. On some accounts I am. It is pleasant to be among my old friends, but the English people have been so very kind that it is not without much regret that I leave them and the pleasant associations by which I have been surrounded."

The New Cabinet in England had not been formed at the close of last week. The difficulty which causes the delay is due to the fact that a majority of the members of the House of Commons are Liberals, and a Conservative Cabinet would only exist on sufferance. The victory won by the Conservatives was due to the absence of many Liberals from the House and the support given by the Parnellites to the opposition. The Parnellites cannot be relied upon to vote steadily with the Conservatives, and therefore the Cabinet would be in constant danger of defeat, and could not pass any measure without the consent of the Liberals, who would naturally enjoy the embarrassment of their rivals. The Queen has endeavored to obtain a definite promise from Mr. Gladstone that he will assist the Conservatives to transact the necessary business of the session and await the decision of the people at the general election, which must take place in November. It was not known what answer Mr. Gladstone would make to the appeal, and the crisis was therefore still unarranged. The slate made up by the newspapers, based on the movements of Lord Salisbury and the Conservative leaders, gave Lord Randolph Churchill, the brilliant young Conservative guerilla leader, the office of Secretary for India, and Lord Carnarvon, the Viceroyalty of Ireland. Both those appointments would be popular, as Lord Randolph has recently paid a visit to India and made many friends there, and Lord Carnarvon is popular in Ireland. The Parnellites speak well of him, and seem disposed to make his task as easy as possible, particularly because his authorship of Canadian federation fosters the idea that he is to be charged with the duty of framing a scheme of legislative autonomy. This slate, nevertheless, is mere guess work, and it is still possible that Mr. Gladstone may return to office with a new Cabinet, in which the Radicals will be supreme.

The Cholera Epidemic in Spain is Spreading with frightful rapidity. The European correspondent of the New York Times, who travelled through the infected district during the outbreak last year, and knows the exact state of the country, cables to his journal that there are indications that Spain is definitely in for a terrible visitation of the plague. Hitherto the cholera belt ran along the coast from Castellon south to Jativa, thence by unaccountable skips to Alicante, where the bulk of the cases occurred last year, and where it now reappears in its worst form, to Murcia and down to Cartagena. Some few cases occurred in the Province of Tereul, adjoining Castellon, but then there was another skip to Toledo and Madrid. From June 6th official reports show 2858 cases and 1273 deaths, including those of Thursday, on which day the death rate was very high. Probably the real figures are 500 higher. The panic in the Province of Murcia has grown to fearful proportions. So great was the exodus that the towns are almost empty. Even the authorities, with the exception of a single prefect, have fled. Sulphur bonfires are burning night and day in the supposed infected quarters of Madrid, and almost every house in the city has been disinfected with phœnic acid. While the sanitary authorities are carrying out their precautionary measures, mobs frequently gather and attack them. The rioters are composed of the lower classes, who are bitterly opposed to all kinds of practical preventive measures, and rely solely on prayers to keep off the dreaded scourge.

The Death of "The Red Prince," the most brilliant and successful of German generals, occurred on June 15th. He was stricken with apoplexy the previous day, and never regained consciousness. His correct title was Prince Frederick Charles. He was the son of the Emperor's brother, and was born in 1828. He was a soldier from his boyhood, and early gained distinction in the field. His most noted exploits were in the war with Austria in 1866. He had command of the first army put in the field against Austria, he entered Bohemia through Saxony, and so managed his march through the latter country as to win the friendship of its people for Prussia. In Bohemia the movements of his forces were remarkably swift and energetic, disconcerting the Austrian General Benedek, who had expected the Prussians to act on the defensive. Prince Frederick Charles drove the Austrians to Sadowa by a series of actions, and won the great victory of Königgratz with the aid of the Crown Prince, who arrived with the Second Army at the crisis of the battle. During the Franco-German war of 1870 he also performed brilliant service. It was mainly through his efforts that Bazaine was shut up in Metz, and finally had to capitulate with his army. General Manteuffel, another famous general, died last week.

Two Contributions were Received Last Week to the fund for supplying colored ministers and others with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. From Clinton, Mass., $5, and from Rockland, Wis., $4. We have much pleasure in acknowledging these amounts, which bring the fund up to a larger total than in any previous year. It does not, however, keep pace with the applications we receive from ministers who are pathetically anxious to share in the benefits of the fund.

A Terrible Mining Disaster Occurred at the Pendlebury Colliery, near Manchester, England, on June 18th. While three hundred and forty-nine miners were down in the workings a loud explosion was heard, and volunteers were called for to descend the pit to ascertain the fate of the men and the extent of the damage. The cages in which the volunteers were proceeding down to the bottom of the pit got stuck in the shaft, and it was two hours before the party could get to work exploring the mine for the missing men. Sixty men who were shut off by the debris from escape were liberated alive. They were ignorant of the fate of their companions. The explosion was caused by fire-damp. One hundred and sixty miners were at work in the level in which the explosion occurred. Only twenty of these were saved; all the others died from the effect of the fire-damp or the falling debris.

An Outbreak of Anarchists is Reported from Austria, and it is alleged that it was incited and led by emissaries from the socialistic societies in Chicago. A new labor law has been promulgated in Austria recently, fixing the number of hours which shall constitute a working day, and making rest from labor for a portion of the Sunday compulsory. The workmen, who have been growing more and more disaffected during the past nine years, resented this interference of the Government, and at the large manufacturing city of Brünn they rose in armed rebellion. The mob sacked the factories, smashed the engines, and demolished the machinery. They then plundered the saloons, and becoming wild with the stolen liquor, proceeded to rob the stores. The arrival of the military saved the city from complete anarchy. Twenty workmen were killed, and several hundred more or less seriously wounded. The men were generally armed with pieces of iron and knives, and possessed military organization. The city, at last accounts, was quiet, and a sufficient force is stationed there to quell any outbreaks that may occur.

Bishop Taylor's Last Letter, Dated from Loanda, and published in the Christian Advocate, gives interesting details of the progress of the African mission. The chiefs and governors of the country contiguous to Loanda have been seen and consulted. These dignitaries are all favorable to the missionaries, and promise to give, or lease for ninety-nine years, all the land they need, and to furnish other facilities for the prosecution of their enterprises. It was manifestly providential, the Bishop thinks, that they were enabled to rent the large house they occupy in Loanda as their headquarters. The rooms and grounds are spacious and beautiful, located on a high promontory overlooking the sea, and swept by perpetual salt breezes, and made inviting and fragrant by tropical fruits and flowers. The house and grounds, it appears, might be purchased for $8000, and soon after the publication of that statement the amount was generously furnished by an anonymous friend of the mission, who, before Bishop Taylor's departure, gave him $1000 toward the expenses of the journey.

A Consumptive Lady in Chicago was Healed by faith recently. She has suffered long, and when on June 2d she left her home to attend a religious service, it seemed that her death could not be delayed many days. She had heard of many cases of sick people being healed by faith, but had not a particle of confidence in it. The diseases were imaginary to begin with, she thought, or the cure, if there had been a cure, was due to other causes. But her physician had given her up, and another physician whom she consulted at great cost assured her that no power or skill on earth could save her, and then in sheer desperation she set out to learn if she could be healed by faith. As she walked toward the cars she tottered from weakness, and was several times on the point of turning back. But she went on, and attended at the Garden City Mission, on Van Buren Street, where the meetings for faith-healing were being held. Soon after seating herself in the mission she became chilled, and arose to leave the place. The leader begged her to remain, and commenced praying fervently. Suddenly the lady exclaimed, "I feel so strange and different!" Touching her throat with her hands, she said, "The lumps are all gone;" and after a short season of prayer and praise she arose to her feet and declared she was completely cured. Mr. Edgerton, her husband, who was like his wife, an unbeliever, relates these facts, and reports his wife as going about singing and seeming entirely cured. Faith in soul-healing always comes in the same way. It is never effective until every other trust is cast away, and the soul rests on Jesus only (Rom. 10: 34).

A Deadhead Journey Across the Continent has been undertaken by a New York man, who proposes to travel to San Francisco in six weeks free of cost. The conditions arranged before setting out were that he was to start without food or money, and if any one gave him money on the way, he was to hand it to a companion, who travels with him, who, whatever the amount was, might buy a single meal out of it, retaining the balance until the end of the journey. He must ride the whole distance, never walking more than one mile from any station, and he must deadhead the whole journey in food and lodging and railroad expenses. It appears that he is well known in New York among the drovers, whom he has frequently entertained, and who take delight in his society. He has an inexhaustible stock of funny stories, to which they will listen entranced for hours. He relies on his conversational and persuasive powers to secure free transportation and free support all the three thousand miles, and, so far, he seems to have been justified in his confidence, having accomplished about half the journey. It is precisely the opposite of this confidence that supports the faithful Christian worker. He renounces all confidence in himself, and depends entirely upon Christ, who never suffers him to lack any necessary thing (Luke 22: 35).

A Death in a Hollow Tree is Reported from Pennsylvania. A farmer whose place is near Coatsville, Pa., has been missing since last February, and though search was made in all directions and every effort was made to find him, no trace of him was discovered. He was somewhat intemperate at times, and he was excited by drink on the day he quitted his home. He had a quarrel with his wife about a purchase she had made without consulting him, and went out to get more liquor. He returned late in the evening, almost demented with drink and passion, and after abusing his wife went out again. No one saw him afterward, until a few days ago, when a man who was passing through the woods in the neighborhood of the house where the missing man used to live, saw a pair of boots sticking out of a hollow tree. He obtained assistance, and it was found that the boots were on the feet of the dead farmer, who had fallen head foremost down the hollow trunk, and had been unable to extricate himself, or to make himself heard. It is conjectured that he must have climbed the tree to cut a stick and have overbalanced. His position was one of utter helplessness, with nothing possible but to wait for death—an expressive type of the situation of the whole human race when God, in His infinite mercy, rescued it by the sacrifice of His beloved Son (Isa. 59: 16).

An Unbridled Horse did Serious Mischief in Paterson, N. J., recently. A manufacturer who resides a short distance from the city drove in with a lady, a neighbor, and stopped at a harness store to get a new bridle. The harness-maker insisted on the lady alighting while the bridle was being changed. The gentleman objected, saying that there was not the slightest danger; but the harness dealer had his way, and the lady got out. Then the bridle was tried on, and a second later the horse was dashing madly up the street, with the owner clinging to his nose. The horse rushed across a sidewalk, striking a lamp-post as he ran, and the man was hurled to the walk, the horse falling on top of him, where he lay thrashing about furiously, his iron-shod hoofs striking his prostrate owner repeatedly in the face and head. The gentleman was picked up unconscious, with a dislocated shoulder and serious internal injuries, and removed to his home in an ambulance. The owner of the horse evidently did not know the disposition of the beast. That he thought he did is proved by his wishing the lady to remain in the buggy while the bridle was changed. Some men show similar ignorance in matters still nearer home. They are apt to think that no harm will be done by their own passions if the restraints they have placed upon them are removed for a little time. The drunkard, the opium slave, and other vicious persons are generally the victims of such misplaced confidence. Even the Apostle Paul declared that he found constant watchfulness necessary (1 Cor. 9: 27).

A Texas Judge was Pronounced Incompetent to solve a difficulty recently by an applicant in his court. The man, who was young and rather effeminate, asked the judge to aid him in getting some one out of his house who would not pay any rent and refused to leave. The judge said there was no need for him to interfere; the young man might serve the tenant with a proper legal notice fifteen days before the end of the month, and the house would then have to be vacated. "But," said the young man, "the tenant is my mother-in-law, and my wife sides with her." "That makes no difference," said the judge; "you are not bound to rent your house to her, as she pays you nothing. You can notify her to vacate. Your course is quite simple." "Air you married, judge?" asked the poor fellow. "No," said the judge, emphatically. "Then there's no use trying to explain the case to you; you could not understand it," and the man turned dejectedly away. The man felt, apparently, that the only help which would suit him was the help of a man whose experience fitted him to understand the difficulty. His is not the only case in which that want is felt; the tried, and weak, and tempted Christian often needs it, and he knows where it is to be found (Heb. 4: 15, 16).

A Flight of Eight Hundred Miles was Taken by an owl, which arrived in New York recently on board the Celtic of the White Star Line. The captain says that when the steamer was on its way from Liverpool to this port, and was still eight hundred miles from the American coast, a white owl alighted on the spars of the ship. It was easily caught and brought on deck. It was quite tame, and so weak and exhausted that it could scarcely move. The men fed it, and after a few hours it revived, but showed no disposition to fly away. It remained contentedly about the ship, perching occasionally on a rope or spar, and presenting itself frequently for food. It is supposed that it was blown off shore in a gale, and being unable to return, or not knowing its way, had continued flying out to sea until it met the steamer. The mystery is how a land bird could have endured so prolonged a strain on its muscles, as it must have been in ceaseless motion night and day to save itself from drowning during its eight hundred miles of travel. During the remainder of the voyage the owl seemed to fully recover its strength, but did not attempt to fly away. Evidently it appreciated the peace and rest of the ship after its weary journey. Such an experience has the tempest-tossed soul that at last finds peace in Christ. Its own efforts are carrying it further from the haven of its search, until, being met by the Saviour, it rests upon Him and is saved (Ps. 107: 30).

A QUESTION FOR A QUESTIONER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Hath God forgotten to be gracious?"—Ps. 77: 9.

The Despondent Believer—Homœopathic Treatment—Pursuing Truth—A Question for Three Classes—I. The Believer in Distress—Troubled by Unanswered Prayers—By Suffering—Insomnia—Melancholy—The Answer—God Forgets Nothing—Cannot Forget Eternal Habit—Nor His own Son—The Question Changed—II. For the Seeking Sinner Despondent—The Question Wrong—Faith the Queen Bee—III. For the Disappointed Worker.

ASAPH was very grievously troubled in spirit. The deep waters were not only around his barque, but they had come in even unto his soul. When the spirit of a man is wounded, then is he wounded indeed; and such was the case with this man of God. In the time of his trouble he was attacked with doubts and fears, so that he was made to question the very foundations of things. Had he not taken to continual prayer, he had perished in his affliction; but he cried unto God with his voice, and the Lord gave ear unto him. Nor did he only pray, but he used the fittest means for

ESCAPING FROM DESPONDENCY.

Very wisely this good man argued with himself, and sought to cure his unbelief. He treated himself homœopathically, meeting like with like. As he was attacked by the disease of questioning, he gave himself questions as a medicine. Observe how he kills one question with another, as men fight fire with fire.

The question which makes our text is meant to end other questions. You may carry truth as far as ever you like, and it will always be truth. Truth is like those crystals which, when split up into the smallest possible fragments, still retain their natural form. You may break truth in pieces, you may do what you like with it, and it is truth throughout; but error is diverse within itself, and evermore bears its own death within itself. You can see its falsehood even in its own light. Bring it forward, strip it of its disguises, behold it in its naked form, and its deformity at once appears. Carry unbelief to its proper consequences, and you will revolt from it and be driven by the grace of God to faith.

Sometimes our doubts assume appearances which are not their own, and so are hard to deal with; but if we make them take their own natural shapes we shall easily destroy them. The question before us is what the logician would call a reductio ad absurdum; it reduces doubt to an absurdity; it puts into plain and truthful words the thought of an unbelieving mind, and at once it is seen to be a horrible notion. "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" The bare idea is both ridiculous and blasphemous.

The question now before us is one of very wide application. I shall not attempt to suggest all the ways in which it may be employed, but I am going to turn it to three uses this morning. The first is for the man of God in distress. Let him take this question and put it to his own reason and common sense, and especially to his own faith: "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" When we have handled the question in that way, we will pass it over to the seeking sinner who is despondent, and we will ask him whether he really believes that God hath forgotten to be gracious. When this is done, we may have a moment or two left for the Christian worker who is dispirited, who cannot do his work as he would wish to do, and who mourns over the little result coming from it.

TO THE DISTRESSED.

I. To the man of God in distress this question is commended. "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" What kind of distress is that which suggests such a question? Where had Asaph been? In what darkness had he wandered? In what tangled wood had he lost himself? How came he to get such a thought into his mind? I answer, first, this good man had been troubled by unanswered prayers. "In the day of my trouble," he says—"In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord;" and he seems to say that though he sought the Lord his griefs were not removed. Nothing is more grievous to the sincere pleader than to feel that his petitions are not heeded by his God. It is a sad business to have gone up, like Elijah's servant, seven times, and yet to have seen no cloud upon the sky in answer to your importunity. It tries a man to spend all night in wrestling, and to have won no blessing from the covenant angel. When the mercy-seat itself ceases to yield us aid, what can we do? You will not wonder, then, considering your own tendency to doubt, that this man of God, when his prayers did not bring him deliverance, cried out, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?"

IN SUFFERING.

Besides that, he was enduring continued suffering. Our text says, "My sore ran in the night." His wound was bleeding ever; there was no cessation to his pain. It is torment indeed to have a worm gnawing at your heart, a fire consuming your spirit; yet a true child of God may be thus tormented. When Asaph had prayed for relief and the relief did not come, the temptation came to him to ask, "Am I always to suffer? Will the Lord never relieve me? It is written, 'He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds;' has he ceased from that sacred surgery? 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious?'"

More than that, there seemed to be a failure of the means of grace for him. "I remembered God, and was troubled." Some of God's people go up to the house of the Lord where they were accustomed to unite in worship with delight, but they have no delight now; they even go to the communion-table, and eat the bread and drink the wine, but they do not receive the body and blood of Christ to the joy of their faith. Anon they get them to their chambers, and open their Bibles, and bow their knees, and remember God; but every verse seems to condemn them; their prayers accuse them, and God himself seems turned to be their enemy; and then it is little wonder that unbelief exclaims, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?"

At the back of all this there was another trouble for Asaph, namely, that he could not sleep. He says, "Thou holdest mine eyes waking." It seemed as if the Lord himself held up his eyelids, and would not let them close in sleep. We may speak of sleeplessness very lightly, but among afflictions it is one of the worst that can happen to men. When the chamber of repose becomes a furnace of anguish it goes hard with a man. Moreover, there was one thing more; he lost the faculty of telling out his grief—"I am so troubled that I cannot speak." There are some people to whom we would not tell our trouble, for we know they could not understand it, for they have never been in deep waters themselves; there are others to whom we could not tell our trouble, though they might help us, because we feel ashamed to do so. A dumb sorrow is sorrow indeed. The grief that can talk will soon pass away; that misery which is wordless is endless.

THE QUESTION ANSWERED.

Having thus, you see, put the doubt in the most apologetic style, and mentioned the excuses which might mitigate the sin of the question, I am now going to expose its unreasonableness and sinfulness, by considering what answers we may give to such a question? I shall endeavor to answer it by making it answer itself—"Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Answer: Hath God forgotten anything? If He could forget, could He be God? Is it not absurd to speak of Him as short of memory of whose understanding there is no searching? He hath not forgotten a worm that hides itself away beneath the sod; therefore banish the thought, once for all, that thy God hath forgotten anything, much less that He hath forgotten to be gracious. "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Then hath He forgotten an old, long, ancient, aye, eternal habit of His heart. Hast thou not heard that His mercy endureth for ever? After having been gracious all these myriads of ages—after having manifested His love and His grace at such a costly rate, hath He forgotten it? Oh, Lord, forgive the thought "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Why then, He must have forgotten His purpose. Doth He not say, "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed?" Hath He said, and will He not do it? Hath He purposed, and shall it not come to pass? Banish, then, the thought of His forgetting to be gracious.

Listen, and let unbelief stand rebuked. If God hath forgotten to be gracious, then He must have forgotten His own Son; He must have forgotten Calvary and the expiatory sacrifice offered there; He must have forgotten Him that is ever with Him at His right hand, making intercession for transgressors; He must have forgotten His pledge to Him that He shall see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied. Canst thou conceive that? It is verging upon blasphemy to suppose such a thing; yet it must be that He has forgotten His own son if He hath forgotten to be gracious. I think I hear some one say, "I do not think God hath forgotten to be gracious, except to me." Doth God make any exceptions? Doth He not speak universally when He addresses His children? Remember, if God forgot to be gracious to one of His believing people He might forget to be gracious to them all. The Lord hath not forgotten Himself in any one instance; but He is faithful to all believers.

Now, let us attend to

THE AMENDMENT OF THE QUESTION.

Shall I tell thee, friend—thou who hast put this question—what the true question is which thou oughtest to ask thyself? It is not, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" but "Hast thou forgotten to be grateful?" Listen: Hast thou not forgotten to be believing? Hast thou not also forgotten to be reverent? "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Why, surely thou hast forgotten thyself, or thou wouldest not talk so; thou hast forgotten that thou owest everything to thy Lord, and art indebted to Him even for the breath in thy nostrils. Thou hast forgotten the precious blood of Jesus; thou hast forgotten the mercy-seat; thou hast forgotten Providence; thou hast forgotten the Holy Spirit; thou hast forgotten all that the Lord has done for thee: surely, thou hast forgotten all good things, or thou wouldest not speak thus. Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and leave the dung-hill of thy despair, and sing, "His mercy endureth for ever." Say in thy soul, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." Thus much to the child of God.

II. Furthermore, I desire to talk a little with in despondency. You have not yet found joy and peace through believing, and therefore I will first describe your case, and what it is that has made you say, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?"

You labor under a sense of guilt; you know that you have transgressed against God, and you feel that this is a terrible thing, involving wrath to the uttermost. The arrows of God are sticking in your soul and rankling there. You cannot trifle with sin as you once did; it burns like a fiery poison in your veins! You have been praying to get rid of that sense of sin, but it deepens. The case I am stating is very clear to every child of God, but it is not at all clear to the man who is enduring it. He cries, "The more I pray, the more I go to hear the Word, the more I read the Bible, the blacker sinner I seem to be. 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious?'"

Moreover, a sense of weakness is increasing upon you. You thought that you could pray; but now you cannot pray. You thought it the easiest thing in the world to believe; but now the grappling-irons will not lay hold upon the promise, and you find no rest. You cannot now perform those holy acts which you once thought to be so easy. Now you say: "When I get up in the morning I resolve that I will go straight all the day, and before long I am more crooked than ever. I feel worse rather than better. The world tempts me, the devil tempts me, the flesh tempts me, everything goes wrong with me. 'Hath God forgotten to be gracious?' I have prayed the Lord to give me peace, and He promises to give rest; but I am more uneasy than ever, and cannot rest where I used to do."

My friend, I perfectly understand your case, and think well of it; for the like has happened to many of us. You must be divorced from self before you can be married to Christ; and that divorce must be made most clear and plain, or Jesus will never make a match with you. You must come clear away from self-righteousness, self-trust, self-hope, or else one of these days, when Jesus has saved you, there might be a doubt as to whether He is to have all the glory, or to go halves with self. He makes you nothing that He may be all in all to you. He grinds you to the dust that He may lift you out of it for ever. Meanwhile, I do not wonder that the question crosses your mind, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?"

THE QUESTION WRONG.

Let me show how wrong the question is. "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" If He has, He has forgotten what He used to know right well. David was foul with his adultery—remember that fifty-first Psalm—but how sweet was the prophet's message to the penitent king: "The Lord hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die!" "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow," was a prayer most graciously answered in that royal sinner's case. Remember Peter, how he denied his Master, but his Master forgave him, and bade him feed His sheep. Forget not the dying thief, and how in the extremity of death, filled with all the agonies of crucifixion, he looked to the Lord, and the Lord looked on him, and that day he was with the King in paradise. If God has forgotten to be gracious, he has forgotten a line of things in which He has wrought great wonders, and in which His heart delighted from of old. It cannot be that He will turn away from that which is so dear to Him.

"Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Then why are all the old arrangements for grace still standing? There is the mercy-seat; surely that would have been taken away if God had forgotten to be gracious. The Gospel is preached to you, and this is its assurance: "Whosoever believeth in Him is not condemned." If the Lord had forgotten to be gracious He would not have mocked you with empty words.

THE WAY.

I shall come to close quarters with you. I know your despair has driven you to the question, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" and I would silence it by putting other questions to you. Is it not you that have forgotten to believe in Christ? "I have been praying," says one. That is all very well, but the Gospel is, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," not "he that prays." I have been trying to come to Christ. I know that, but I read nothing about this trying in Holy Scripture, and I fear your trying is that which keeps you from Jesus. You are told to believe in Christ, not to try to believe.

A minister in America, some time ago, was going up the aisle of his church during a revival, when a young man earnestly cried to him, "Sir, can you tell me the way to Christ?" "No," was the answer, very deliberately given; "I cannot tell you the way to Christ." The young man answered, "I beg pardon; I thought you were a minister of the Gospel." "So I am," was the reply. "How is it that you cannot tell me the way to Christ?" "My friend," said the minister, "there is no way to Christ. He is Himself the way. All that believe in him are justified from all things. There is no way to Christ; Christ is here." Oh! my hearer, Christ Himself is the way of salvation, and that way comes right down to your foot, and then leads right up to heaven. You have not to make a way to the Way, but at once to run in the way which lies before you. The way begins where you now are; enter it. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ now, and you are saved; and then you will no more ask the question, "Is His mercy clean gone for ever?"

"Oh," says one, "but I have been looking to reform myself and grow better, and I have done a good deal in that way." That is not the Gospel; it is all very right and proper, but the Gospel is, "He that believeth in Him is not condemned." The other day I saw my bees swarming; they hung on a branch of a tree in a living mass; the difficulty was to get them into a hive. My man went with his veil over his face and began to put them into the skep; and I noticed that he was particularly anxious to get the queen bee into it; for if he once had her in the hive the rest would be sure to follow, and remain with her. Now, FAITH IS THE QUEEN BEE.

You may get temperance, love, hope, and all those other bees into the hive; but the main thing is to get simple faith in Christ, and all the rest will come afterward. Get the queen bee of faith, and all the other virtues will attend her. You guilty, worthless sinner, you at the gates of hell, you who have nothing to recommend you, you who have no good works or good feelings, simply trust the merits of Christ, and accept the atonement made by His death, and you shall be saved, your sin shall be forgiven, your nature shall be changed, you shall become a new creature in Christ Jesus, and you shall never say again, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?"

III. The time has gone; therefore must be content with a few crumbs. You have been working for Christ, dear brother, and have fallen into a very low state of heart, so that you cry, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" I know what state you are in. You say, "I do not feel as if I could preach; the matter does not flow. I do not feel as if I could teach; I search for instruction, and the more I pull the more I cannot get it." "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Can He not fill thine empty vessel again? Can He not give thee stores of thought, emotion, and language? He has used thee; can He not do so again? "But, sir, the sinners I have to deal with are such tough ones; they reject my testimony; they grow worse instead of better; I do not think I can ever preach to them again." "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" You cannot save them, but He can.

But I work in such a depraved neighborhood, the people are sunk in poverty and drunkenness." "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Does not He know the way to save drunkards? Does not He know how to rescue the harlot and the whoremonger, and make them clean and chaste?

THE DUTY.

"Ah, well," saith one, "I am ready to give it all up." I hope you will not do so. If you have made up your mind to speak no more in the name of the Lord, I hope that word will be like fire in your bones; for if God has not forgotten to be gracious, provoked as He has been, how can you forget to be patient? Is it possible, while God's sun shines on you, that you will refuse to shine on the fallen? If God continues to be gracious, you ought not to grow weary in well-doing.

Perhaps I speak to some dear brother who is very old and infirm; he can hardly hear, and scarcely see, so that he reads his Bible with difficulty. He gets to the service now, but he knows that soon he will be confined to his chamber, and then to his bed. His mind is sadly failing him; he is quite a wreck. Take this home with you, my aged brother, and keep it for your comfort if you never come out again: "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" Oh, no; the Lord hath said, "Even to your old age I am He; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you; I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you." Having loved

His own which were in the world, the Lord Jesus loved them unto the end; and He will love you to the end. When the last scene comes, and you close your eyes in death, blessed be His name, you shall know that He has not forgotten you. "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," is the Lord's promise and His people's sheet-anchor. Therefore, let us not fear when our frail tabernacles are taken down, but let us rejoice that God hath not forgotten to be gracious. Though our bodies will sink into the dust, they will ere long rise again, and we shall be in glory for ever with the Lord. Blessed be His name. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

"THE STATE OF THE BLESSED DEAD," by Henry Alford, D.D. This little gem of a book—its pages are little more than three inches long by two inches wide—will be invaluable to those who have lost Christian friends by death. We can imagine no more kindly thing that any one can do for a bereaved family than to enclose a copy of it in an envelope and mail it to the mourners. At a time when the vacant chair stands in the family room mutely reminding those left behind of the loved one gone before, and at every turn in the household that one face is missed, there is no balm of human making that can heal the wound. But in this little volume Dean Alford directs the thoughts to the source of all consolation. His words are all the more welcome to the sorrowing because they are in the line of their own thoughts. It is of the dead that he speaks; assuring his readers from Scripture that their lost ones are still conscious, not sleeping, that they are with Jesus and enjoying all implied in the expression; that we shall see them again, either by going to them or by their coming with their Lord in the clouds; and finally of that state of reunion and eternal blessedness in which the period of separation will be forgotten. Dean Alford's words are so well known here that the beauty and tenderness of this consoling little book can be imagined. Small as it is, it will carry consolation into many an aching heart, and many eyes will reflect the heavenly sunshine again after reading its pages. Pp. 96, elegantly bound and gilt edged. Price, 35 cents; published by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York.

"THE INFLUENCE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL on the Development of Christianity," by Otto Pfeleiderer, D.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Berlin. Translated by J. Frederick Smith. This volume contains the six Hibbert Lectures of the year. Its subject at this time is all-important. A study of the teaching of the Apostle Paul is the best antidote to the materialism which seems to be eating away all spiritual life in the Church and the world. That Professor Pfeleiderer deals with the subject in an original manner is only as might be expected from a scholar of his eminence and penetration. The six lectures are respectively entitled: The First Church and the Conversion of Paul; The Doctrinal Teaching of Paul; The Conflict with the Jewish Christians; The Reconciliation with Jewish Christianity; Paulinism and Gnosticism; Paulinism and the Church. The author points out how at the period of the apostle's conversion just such a teacher as he was needed to break the formalizing fetters that were binding the young Church. How he was specially prepared for his work by the superhuman interposition on the way to Damascus—an interposition which even those who reject the miraculous must account for on psychological grounds, equally marvellous. How he was further instructed in his period of retirement, and before ever he had seen Peter or had learned anything from him of the historical Christ, he appeared in public a Christian teacher sent from God, preaching the incarnation, the atonement, and the resurrection with a fullness that amazed the apostles themselves. Even Peter found it difficult to follow this brilliant reasoner, and admitted that his teaching was hard to be understood.

This origin of Paul's insight the professor regards as accounting for the absence, in Paul's speeches and epistles of reference to Christ's own teaching, and of his frequent allusions to the things he "had received of the Lord," having reference to that divine illumination and revelation at and immediately subsequent to his vision on the way to Damascus. We are unable to accept several of the professor's views, especially those respecting Paul's teaching of the Second Advent, which appear to us forced and illogical. The author is evidently in a difficulty, not liking to accept the plain teaching of the apostle, and being driven in consequence to find some ingenious way of spiritualizing words intended to be understood literally. Nevertheless, we recognize the remarkable ability displayed, and the clear insight manifested as to the character and influence of Paulinism in the Church and its power over the minds of men in the ages that have elapsed since the great apostle wrote. At the present time the value of this influence cannot be over estimated. The doctrines that lie at the basis of evangelical belief are being assailed by men of eminent ability without and within the Church. It is to the writings of the great apostle that we go for the clearest statements of the fundamental truths of the fatal effects of the Fall and the way of salvation through faith in Christ. A handy by H. C. Faulkner, is one of those useful little manuals that have made the compiler's name famous throughout the country. How much labor and loss of time Mr. Faulkner has saved in the aggregate no man can realize. He has the faculty of placing the information he has to convey in such a shape that busy men can find it readily, and he seems to know by intuition or perhaps by experience what information is most needed. In this little work of two hundred and seventeen pages he has collected forty thousand words, which he has arranged with reference to their similarity and opposition, so that a writer may not only find a synonym if there is one for the word he has in his mind, but which he does not wish to use, but is helped to perceive delicate shades of meaning, and to realize how few actual synonyms there are in the language. While it is invaluable to writers for the press, the man who seldom writes anything more important than a letter will probably use it most frequently, for it is as a friend and helper to those whose education has been neglected that Mr. Faulkner seems especially anxious to distinguish himself. Several attempts have been made to accomplish the object of this volume, but this is the most compact as well as the most comprehensive we have yet seen. Price 50 cents. Mr. J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York.

A REPROBATE FAMILY REFORMED.

A REMARKABLE incident, showing how God uses and blesses instruments which men are apt to despise, is related in the biography of Miss Maria Louisa Charlesworth, a lady whose early piety grew with her growth, and who in her womanhood was untiring in her efforts to rescue the poor and the vicious from their degradation. Her brother, the Rev. Samuel Charlesworth, the writer of her biography, thus describes the circumstance:

"Close to our church at Flowton there was a cottage occupied by a notoriously bad family—the man, a notorious law-breaker and contraband seller of ardent spirits, a desperate character, feared and disliked by all the neighborhood; the wife, a meet partner for such a man, both in temper and vicious propensities.

"Miss Charlesworth, then a girl of fourteen, was passing by the house one Sunday afternoon on her way to church; hearing the sounds of drunken revelry within, she quietly walked up the little garden path, apparently without a tremor, and entering the house, closed the door after her. The idle, dissolute men grouped there sat amazed at the boldness of the child, as she said, calmly and kindly 'Do you not go to church? There is the bell calling you to go to worship God in His house of prayer.'

"A pause of silence followed, caused, it may be supposed, by amazement at the intrepidity and simplicity of the child. It was broken by the wife rising, and, with violent language, ordering her to leave the house; but the husband reached down his hat from the peg, and said, firmly and quietly, 'Hold your tongue, wife; the young lady is right. Come, lads, I am off to church; who'll go with me?'

"To the astonishment of all present, the hardened man entered the church, and sat quietly throughout the whole service. The village congregation was astounded at the sight of this well-known man sitting composedly in their midst. But the man listened attentively, and walked away at the close of the service with a decorous demeanor. From that day was dated a reformation in the reprobate's character. It was not noticed at first by the village, but the man, at a later period, himself fixed the date.

"I can bear witness that he was a consistent Christian for nearly forty years, and when he died, at the age of ninety years, he breathed his last in faith and hope in Christ. He retained to the last the deepest reverence and affection for the ministering child whom God had used to turn him from the error of his ways, and who anxiously watched over his after-course. The wife, too, became an altered character, and the once worst house in the village, the plague-spot of the neighborhood, became a clean and cheerful cottage home where God was feared and loved." It was a grand work to have come from a child's ministrations, but the Holy Spirit is not bound. He works by the feeblest instrumentalities, and the self-sufficient orator sometimes goes unblest.

MEDICAL MISSION WORK IN CHINA.

At a recent meeting of the China Inland Mission Mr. A. W. Douthwaite, M.D., a returned medical missionary, said: "Much has been said as to the duty of going forth to preach the Gospel to those who have it not; but while it is a duty it is also a privilege, high and glorious. After ten and a half years' work in China I consider them the happiest years of my life, and had I ten lives it would be the highest privilege I could have to spend them in work for Christ in China. Arriving in China in 1874, I set to work to learn the language—it was slow work. By and by, before I intended to take up medical work, a man came with blind eyes. As soon as I saw him I knew I could by an operation restore his sight. I was successful, and this cure put an end to my study of the Chinese language. The people crowded on me from all hands—every sort of disease, and all expecting to be cured as by a miracle. Among those I was able to cure was a native preacher, who had been laid aside by blindness, and the moment he was healed he started to preach and speak everywhere. Thus, although I could not study the language, I did what I could in medical mission work, and soon picked up the colloquial speech."

After describing his experience with Mr. Meadows during a riotous attack, Dr. Douthwaite told of his early efforts to establish a station at Fuchow, and how Mrs. Douthwaite was enabled to reach the women. For example, one who confessed she had with her own hand destroyed seven female children was brought to the Saviour. The men, however, were hard to reach, it being a very bigoted city, one in which there are over a hundred families the direct lineal descendants of Confucius. They won the villagers, and afterward the townspeople, by means of medical work. After about a year's labor with no results, a Chinaman came and began to oppose them bitterly; but by and by he was broken down and confessed, "I have ridiculed you, but now I know you are right. I wish to become a Christian." This was the beginning of a work which went on not only in that city, but spread into the villages and cities round, the converts taking up the work and going out into the villages.

IN THE FAMINE DISTRICTS.

Mr. A. G. Parrott remarked: "I arrived in China six and a half years ago, during the time of the great famine, and my first work was to assist in the relief of the distressed people in the famine districts of North China. The sights were simply awful, dead bodies lying about on the road and in the houses just as they fell. But, awful as this famine was, there is a worse and more widespread famine—a famine of the Word of God. We learned the Chinese language, adopted the Chinese costume, and travelled among the people, finding open doors everywhere. Some had asked: 'Do you organize meetings?' We don't organize them at all; they are ready made anywhere. Just speak to a man in the street, and a crowd is round you in a minute."

Mr. J. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the mission, who is at Shanghai, writes: "Notwithstanding the unsettlement caused by war, no less than seven brethren have been able to proceed up the Han toward the north-west; four also have been located in what were out-stations in the central province of Gan-hwuy, in which we have long wished to see resident missionaries. A happy party of our sisters from Scotland are preaching successfully in Yang-chau. The brethren Windsor and Hughesdon have reached Kwei-yang, and F. A. Steven and O. Stevenson have been for some time in Tali-Fu, in the extreme west. The first converts in Yun-nan have been given to our brethren during the present year—two at Tali-Fu and three at Yun-nan Fu. Large and encouraging meetings were held for a considerable time in Yun-nan Fu (capital of Yun-nan) by George Clarke and Arthur Eason; and Mrs. Eason has had encouraging access to the women in town and country, some of whom, it is hoped, have received Christ as their Saviour."

"In the far north-west Mr. Parker has secured valuable premises in the capital of Kan-suh, Lan-chau, for the first time. Further south Mr. Riley has rented additional premises in Chen-tu, the capital of Si-ch'uen."

"We have been greatly cheered by the arrival of the last party, consisting of Mr. Stanley Smith and his companions. Not only were they able to labor for the Lord on board the steamers in which they travelled, but five meetings were held at Colombo, one at Penang, one at Singapore, three at least at Hong Kong, and on arrival in Shanghai a series of public meetings, afternoon and evening, were held, which have been productive of much good, and which have more thoroughly affected Shanghai than any series of meetings that have ever been held."

A Child's Appeal to a Reprobrate.

"Messrs. Stanley Smith, Rev. W. W. Cassels, and D. E. Hoste will be leaving in a day or two for T'ai-yuen, via Tientsin and Peking, and may probably hold a few meetings on their way. The other members of the party will probably join in a conference at Gan-k'ing, after which Messrs. Studd, Cecil, and Arthur Polhill-Turner will go on to Han-chung Fu with Dr. and Mrs. Wilson. Mr. M. Beauchamp will take an inland journey with me."

THE JEW'S STORY.

A SERIAL WORK.

Christmas at Hazelmout.

ONLY one thing was needed by Mr. and Mrs. Arnold now to render their happiness complete. The old farm was secured to them for three lives—their own, their son's, and their grandson's; but they had no grandson, and it seemed to them they were not likely to have one, for Philip, since Carola went away, had never borne to hear of marriage. But the good news that they were not to leave Hazelmout was sufficient to fill their hearts with joy after their sorrow, and they were just now busy with preparations to welcome the hospital nurse, who was to come down to spend Christmas with them. But Philip alone knew who the nurse was.

It was well known throughout Hazelmout that she was expected at the Grange, and Capt. Bentley proposed driving down to await her arrival there on Christmas Eve. There had been some talk of putting up a triumphal arch at the entrance of the village; but Philip discouraged it, and the fact that it was not a time for flowers was against it. But the desire to see and welcome the hospital Sister, who had been the happy agent of their deliverance from exile, was strong in every heart, and when Philip passed through the village on his way to the station the women and children ran to the cottage doors, and looked after him as long as he was in sight.

They drove home together in the gig, side by side, close to one another, as they would often do in time to come. There was no possibility of being interrupted or overheard; yet they did not say much to one another. Philip could see that her color came and went under her brown bonnet, and that the smile which had shone in her dark eyes died away as they drew near his home. Her hands were trembling, not with cold; nor was he himself without apprehension. All the proud boasts of the unblemished name of the Arnolds rushed back to his memory as the horse slowly mounted the steep roads. They had sunk deep into his own heart; but he knew they were far deeper in his father's and mother's. And the villagers themselves were full of pride in the old fame of their masters. Even yet there might be sore trouble in store for him.

The first cottage-gate was thronged; there stood old Richard Windbank, with his son John Windbank and his grandchildren, waiting to welcome the captain's nurse. Carola's bonnet had fallen back a little, and she leaned forward to them with a wistful, timid look upon her face. For a moment they hesitated, and gazed again, then set up a cheer, which echoed with noisy gladness along the village street.

"Why, it's our schoolmistress!" they shouted to one another.

Up at the Grange they heard the running salute of hurrahs which followed Carola through the village, and Mr. and Mrs. Arnold, leaving Captain Bentley in the oak-parlor, went out to meet their guest. Mr. Arnold hastened out bare-headed to the gate, while his wife stood waiting under the porch. Philip's face was pale and anxious as he sprang down to lift Carola out of the gig, and at that moment his father, looking up into the sweet, wistful face, saw who she was.

"Carol!" he cried, opening his arms to her; and she laid her head down upon his breast, as if she was some prodigal child coming home repentant, while the old man, bending his head upon hers, burst into a passion of happy tears.

"Father," said Philip, eagerly, "she is to be your daughter."

"Ay, ay!" he sobbed; "God bless her! She's saved me from a broken heart. I thought it was a stranger did it, and it was the dear maid I've loved all along."

"Loved me all along!" repeated Carola, lifting up her head and looking into his face.

"Yes, in spite of myself and my forefathers," he said, half carrying her along the causeway of smooth pebbles to the porch, where Mrs. Arnold was standing in much amazement at the greeting he had given to this stranger, though she knew he had been in a state of grateful excitement all day. He pushed back the bonnet from Carola's face and put his arm round her as he stood before his wife.

"Anne, my dear," he said, in a broken voice, "it's Carol that has saved us, our daughter that is to be, that must be. Oh! my dear, think of how you and me have loved one another all these years, and make us happy. They'll forgive us, them that are gone, for we should have lost the old home if it hadn't been for her."

The appeal came suddenly upon her; yet she felt as if she had been gradually preparing for it. All the day her thoughts had been busy with Carola, and there had been a secret yearning after her in her heart. Since she had been so near losing, not only the old home, but the husband who had made it so dear a home to her, and whose heart had been almost broken, she had learned how much too strong a hold the world and its principles had upon her. She called herself a Christian—nay, she was a Christian; yet when Christ had sent to her one of His disciples she had shut her heart against her, because she came with no credentials from the world. Her eyes were open at last. She had been striving to serve God and mammon; she had vainly tried to link the love of the Father with the love of the world.

It was but for a few seconds that she stood motionless while these thoughts flashed through her mind, and Carola's timid eyes anxiously and silently watching her. Then she took the girl's face between her hands and kissed her with solemn tenderness.

"I will make it up to you, Carola," she said; "I will atone for it all."

But what she had to atone for she could not have told, if there had been time to tell it; for Philip hurried Carola away into the oak-parlor, where Captain Bentley was sitting by the fire, listening intently for her voice. His disfigured face and half-blinded eyes were turned eagerly toward the door, and as she entered he sprang to his feet.

"You are come at last, then," he said; "I have been very weary without you. Sit down here beside me, and tell me what you have been doing, and if Sister Elizabeth will consent to give you up. And tell me if I have done what pleases you, and what you think I ought to do, my little conscience-keeper. For she is the keeper of my conscience, Arnold."

"And of mine," said Philip, exultantly. "Ah!" breathed Captain Bentley, with a half-sigh.

"This nurse of yours, Captain," said Mr. Arnold, "was schoolmistress here two years ago, and she promised herself to Philip as his wife. We claim her promise now, and they'll be married as soon as possible, for there is nothing to put it off for, that I can see."

"That is the best news you could tell me, Mr. Arnold," he answered, after a slight pause. "I shall have her always near me, and you know what a poor wretch I am, and must be, with one eye gone, and the sight of the other quickly going. It will be a Godsend to me to have friends like her and Philip. You'll be my friend, Philip?"

"Yes," he said, warmly clasping his outstretched hand.

"And come and live in the chaplain's cottage," he went on, "for when I am stone-blind I could find my way there. I will set about putting it in order immediately. All that must be left to me. It is twenty years since I lost my sister, and I feel at times as if God in His mercy had sent her back to me."

It seemed to Carola and to Philip as if this Christmas Eve was linked so closely to that happy one two years ago they might have made but one day. Yet there was a difference; a consciousness of a dark and sorrowful night, which had lasted long, and had threatened to last forever, lay between them. It made the joy of this latter Christmas greater, though more solemn, than the former.

On the afternoon of Christmas Day, when most of the farm-people were taking holiday at home, Philip asked Carola to go again with him to the distant fields, to count the flock, and look after the cattle. They trod the same narrow paths, foot-worn by many generations, and he helped her over rough stiles that had kept their places for a century or two, as they had done two years ago. In the gray sky the December sun was shining coldly; and icicles hung from the roofs of the sheds, and the well-known landscape lay under a wintry haze.

He knew that all the wealth of long association and the blessedness of keeping his old home had been well-nigh lost; and that but for Carola he and those belonging to him would have been homeless this Christmas Day. It was she who had brought peace on earth, and goodwill toward men for Hazelmont; and every voice had welcomed her, and every heart blessed her. There was more gladness this day in every little homestead than there had ever been before, for the thought of that desolation, and loss, and separation, which they had just missed. They stood again on the brow of the hill, looking down on the floating columns of wood-smoke rising from the cottage hearths, and at the ivied gables of his own home.

"Oh, my darling!" he said abruptly, "have you forgiven me? Have you altogether forgiven me?"

"I never thought I had anything to forgive," she answered, with tears standing in her eyes, "but I hardly understood why you left me, till I saw my old home again, and the people I had lived with. That was a terrible thing even to me; and it was no wonder you could not take a wife out of such a place. And yet—yet if my Lord placed me there, and chose that for my home, what could I do? I could not think He had done a wrong thing. And He had placed Matthias beside me to guard and teach me. If it had not been for Matthias, I should have been like those other girls. Oh, Philip! I never thought any of you needed my forgiveness; only I needed your friendship so sorely."

"Ay! that was it," he said; "we forsook you as if you were unworthy."

It was a sting to him in the midst of his happiness; and more or less the memory of it would dwell with him all his life. They had deserted her when her need was sorest, when the battle of her life was the fiercest. She had been alone when he ought to have been beside her. In their selfish fear for their own fair fame he had left her to bear shame and suffering in dreary loneliness. In a measure he had copied the cowardice and treachery of the disciples when they forsook their Master, and fled. No one had stood by her but Matthias, the feeble old Jew, who knew nothing of her Lord.

"You love me, Carola?" he asked, so doubtful of himself that he was a little doubtful of her.

"I love you better than life!" she answered, pressing closer to his side, as if she felt his doubt. "I love you as my own soul. Yet if Christ called me away from you I would go, and I would try to do His will. All through, ever since I knew of Him, there has been in my heart, under all troubles, the peace which He left with us, the peace He gives to us. I have not been afraid; and my heart has not been altogether troubled."

"That is one thing I cannot understand, Carola," Philip said, thoughtfully. "You do not seem to take religion as my mother and other people do. Everyone I have known, even the vicar and the curate, are different from you. I love you better for the difference," he made haste to add, "but I can't understand it. Religion seems more to you than other people."

"I don't know that I can explain it," Carola said, as a far-off gaze came into her expressive eyes. "I know there is a difference, because I have noticed good people look at me wonderingly sometimes when it does not appear to me that I have said anything remarkable. I sometimes think that it is because I scarcely ever think about religion, and other people think a great deal about it. I am always thinking about my Lord, and I love Him, Philip, oh so much. I love you, Philip, very dearly, and I think if you were very ill, and I could save you from suffering by dying myself, I should do it very gladly; but that love is very different. I cannot make it clear to you; but when I think how

He came here to be poor, and how He pitied all the poor about Him, and cured the sick and helped the miserable, and how the great people ill-used Him and killed Him at last, I feel as if my heart would burst with love for Him. And then, when I wonder why He did it all, and why God let the people so ill-treat Him, and it comes to me that He did it because He loved the people and there was no other way of saving them, and though He knew all He would have to suffer, He loved them so that He did not mind His own pain and the shame of His death if He could only save them, then it seems too much almost to believe. After that, anything I can do to please Him seems to be so little, and I am always wishing I could do something more. I am ashamed to think that perhaps there is something I might do, if I only knew of it, that would show Him that I love Him so, and that I am really grateful to Him. I get low-spirited when I think of it, and I am so ignorant that I make mistakes and let opportunities go past me. Then I try to picture to myself what He was, and how He acted, and I try to be in my little way like Him. I should like to help the poor as He did, and try to make them happier and better. I thought once, just after that trial, when the angry folks wanted to kill me, that I would have let them do it, as my Lord did, if it would have done them any good. But it would not; they would have been worse, not better. But it would be a good thing to die for the sake of others."

"You are going to do a better thing, Carola," Philip said, interrupting her; "you are going to live for others—for me and my father and mother, and all the people in the village. They all love you, and you will love to make them better."

"Yes, I hope so. My Lord seems to wish me to do that, and I want to do just what He wishes. If He wanted me to die for other people, I would. All I want to know is what He wants; I don't mind myself at all. But I don't know that that is religion. I asked a clergyman about it once, and he smiled sadly, and he said I need not try to find out about religion if I only kept on loving my Lord and thinking about Him. But still I know there's a difference."

"Didn't you ever feel anxious about salvation, Carola?" Philip asked. "There was a preacher I heard once who said religious people had all been very anxious once at some time in their lives about whether they would be saved or not, and then they were converted and were happy afterward; and our curate often says the same thing in another way."

"No," Carola said, "I never felt so. Perhaps that makes the difference. I don't think about being saved—I never have. My Lord was so good, and He loved us all so and never seemed to consider Himself, and I want to be like Him in that. I expect that He will take me to heaven when I die; He promised that to all who believe Him, and I don't doubt His Word. But I don't think much about that. I should like Him to see me always trying to help other people as He did, and being exactly what He wishes me to be, and I can trust Him to take care of me now and after I am dead. It seems mean to me for people to be so anxious about themselves, when Jesus never seemed to think about Himself at all."

"You are the most unselfish woman I ever heard of, Carola," Philip said, looking at her lovingly. "I don't know whether that is religion, but I know the world would be a good deal better place if every one acted in that way. Most religious people I know seem to be so anxious about themselves, and whether they will get to heaven, that they never think of other people."

"Well, we won't blame them, Philip. Perhaps they don't look at things in the same way as I do. But I'm glad you like my way, because I should be miserable if you were to hinder me from helping poor people when we are married."

"Oh, then," said Philip, "there is something of the woman in you after all. I began to think

I was going to have an angel for my wife, but it seems my wife will want to have her own way." And looking at her lovingly, he said, "and she shall, for there is no better way."

They walked homeward through the quickly gathering gloom, and went in through the fold-yard gate to enter the house by the great kitchen. A huge fire was blazing on the hearth; and Mr. Arnold was sitting in the chimney-corner smoking his pipe; and he made room for Carola, and put his arms fondly about her. It seemed as if the past had come back again in perfect repetition. But there was no fear now for the future; no deep valley of humiliation to pass through. There might be sorrow for them; but there would be no more separation; except that brief one, when one goes before another, through the silent gates of death, into the Father's house, where Christ Himself is preparing a place for us.

THE END.

REVOLT OF THE TEN TRIBES.

S. S. Lesson for July 5. 1 Kings 12: 1-17. Golden Text, Prov. 13: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter. The Backsliding of Solomon—Peculiarly Heinous His Lost Place as a Witness for God—His Enemies—Jeroboam Appointed—His Error—Rehoboam Succeeds—The Petition of the People—A Weak and Foolish King—The Two Sets of Advisers—The King's Answer—The Divided Nation.

THE backsliding of Solomon teaches us that no amount of knowledge and no gift of God received can insure a man of God from falling. Saul was changed, and God "gave him another heart" (1 Sam. 10: 6, 9). Solomon had asked and received of God a wise and hearing heart, so that he had become "the wisest of all men," and yet he fell into the most grievous sin, doubtless through failing to depend continually upon God. God's complaint of him was, "Thou hast not kept my covenant and my statutes which I have commanded thee." "And with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel, which had appeared unto him twice" (1 Kings 11: 9, 11). Something else had taken the place of God in his heart. He who once had been first with the king was put in the second place. And this was all the more heinous a sin because Solomon's position made him the leading witness for God in the then known world. He had a splendid opportunity to make God known, and by his early history we learn how fully he embraced it. From "the uttermost parts of the earth," the Queen of Sheba came because of the fame of Solomon "concerning the name of the Lord" (Matt. 12: 42; 1 Kings 10: 1). But now the fame of Solomon was concerning his many wives, and concerning the many gods which they and he worshipped. His fame was concerning idol shrines, and his wisdom and godliness were things of the past. In proportion as he lived for himself and for the world, he became hard and cruel, his popularity declined, and God raised him up adversaries. Hadad the Edomite, Rezon of Damascus, and finally Jeroboam stirred up rebellion against him. Why did he not, like Asa and Jehoshaphat, make his cause the Lord's? Alas! it was because he would not give up his sin. There is no limit to the grace of our God, but Christ will never be the minister of sin (Gal. 2: 17). Unless we yield up our wills to God and come to His terms, we cannot count upon His grace because our past experience may have been unspeakably precious. There were points in which Solomon was at issue with God; he did not yield, and it looks much as though the talent of wisdom which he had was taken from him.

JEROBOAM NOTIFIED.

Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, was chosen by Solomon at the time of the building of Millo and the repairing of the city of David. Probably Jeroboam was made superintendent of the works. It was at this time that the prophet Ahijah, the Shilonite, met the young man in the way, "and he had clad himself with a new garment; and they two were alone in the field; and Ahijah caught the new garment that was on him, and rent it in twelve pieces; and he said to Jeroboam, Take thee ten pieces; for thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, Behold, I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee." It was a startling announcement for the young man, who was the son of an Ephrathite, probably one whom Solomon had employed as his servant on account of his coming from his father's birth-place.

Had Jeroboam been a man of God, he would immediately have conferred with the Lord Himself concerning this thing. When God revealed Himself to Moses, Moses turned aside to see, and immediately entered into communion with God. Thus it was with Abraham, with Jacob, with Joshua, with Gideon, and many others. But so was it not with Jeroboam; we have no record of any reply, on his part, to God. After declaring to him that God would still leave one tribe in the hand of Solomon's son, and that He would not take away the ten tribes during Solomon's life time, he further said, "And I will take thee, and thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth, and shalt be king over Israel. And it shall be, if thou wilt hearken unto all that I command thee, and wilt walk in my ways, and do that is right in my sight, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as David my servant did; that I will be with thee, and build thee a sure house, as I built for David, and will give Israel unto thee."

AMBITION NOT PIETY.

It was the least which God could ask of Jeroboam—it is what God asks of every man; but Jeroboam, instead of being melted with the wondrous love and grace of God, was dazzled with the prospect of being king. His own aggrandizement, and not the good of the people or the glory of God took hold of him, and he gave himself to serve himself instead of God, and to stir up rebellion instead of yielding himself up to a living sacrifice to God, that he might reign as His deputy and representative. Thus he neither heard nor obeyed God further than suited his own purpose.

But are there none of us who are in point of fact doing the same thing? Are not many of us seeking personal satisfaction in our religion—in our life, physical, social, and political? Are there not many who, even when claiming the most blessed of God's promises, are more occupied with the satisfaction to themselves than the glory which may accrue to Jesus? This is the love of God, that we keep His commandments (1 John 5: 3). Jeroboam lived for self, and by and by he earned the hateful reputation of the man "who made Israel to sin."

THE PEOPLE'S PETITION.

When Solomon died, Rehoboam his son went to Shechem, "and all Israel made him king." But elements of disaffection were abroad among the people, and some of them sent for Jeroboam out of Egypt. He had fled there from Solomon, who had heard of Ahijah's prophecy. It is more than probable that Jeroboam, instead of yielding himself up to God to be prepared for reigning over His people, had boastfully told of the prophecy that he should reign, and had made a party among the people who were out of heart with the oppression which characterized the latter part of Solomon's reign. There was a preconcerted plan to make a general petition to the new king, that some of the oppressive taxes and laws under which they were groaning should be repealed. Jeroboam was made their spokesman, and worded the petition thus: "Thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore make thou the grievous service of thy father, and his heavy yoke which he put upon us, lighter, and we will serve thee."

Rehoboam was a weak man, but not altogether irreligious. When Jeroboam was established over the ten tribes, and his idolatry became unbearable, "out of all the tribes of Israel, such as set their hearts to seek the Lord God of Israel, came to Jerusalem to sacrifice unto the Lord God of their fathers." Rehoboam by no means discouraged them, and they "strengthened his kingdom three years." And again, when Shishak, King of Egypt, came up against Jerusalem, Rehoboam humbled himself and sought the Lord (11 Chron. 11: 16, 17; 12: 9, 12). But he never gave himself fully up to the Lord.

He did evil because he prepared not his heart to seek the Lord" (11 Chron. 12: 14). Thus, when this grave crisis came about, Rehoboam did not turn it over to God—he did not, as David did, inquire of the Lord. But feeling it too grave a responsibility to deal with entirely alone, "he said unto them, Depart yet for three days, then come again to me." He called his father's counsellors and asked their advice. They had much experience, and it may be there were men of God among them, who had known the early days of Solomon, when he had put God first in everything. They knew David's inspired utterance, "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of God. And he shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain" (11 Sam. 22: 3, 4). Their advice was sound, that if the young king should be "a servant unto this people this day, and wilt serve them, and answer them, and speak good words to them, then they will be thy servants for ever."

THE KING'S ANSWER.

But an unconverted man could get no glory out of a course such as this—it would be tame, and his young friends would jeer at him. Should he not show that he was master, and that he had some spirit and meant to show it? This was the empty, foolish vanity which led him to reject the counsel of the faithful, tried counsellors of his father, and to turn aside to the boasting, bragging, inexperienced young men who "had been brought up with him." Theirs was just the counsel which hair-brained and heartless young men would be likely to give, who had never conceived the idea of serving "their own generation," but only of ministering to their own pleasure and making a little show. "The young men that were grown up with him spake unto him, saying, Thus shalt thou speak unto this people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it lighter unto us; thus shalt thou say unto them, My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke: my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions."

SECESSION.

Vain, selfish, heartless boast! The only idea of those young men was to make the sorrows and wrongs of a people a means of ministering to their sovereign's pride and the display of unmeaning tyranny, just as a cruel child will play with and torture a fly or an earwig! God made use of this manifestation on the part of the king to bring about His purpose; a rebellion broke out, headed by Jeroboam, and ten tribes selected him as their ruler, leaving only Judah and Benjamin loyal to Rehoboam. "Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils" (Isa. 2: 22). "Put not thy trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help" (Ps. 146: 3). "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man" (Ps. 118: 8).

RETROSPECTION.

BY ANNA SHIPTON.

"Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee,"—Deut. 8: 15.

"Cast not away, therefore, your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward."—Heb. 10: 35.

He was better to me than all my hopes,
He was better than all my fears;
He made a road of my broken words,
And a rainbow of my tears.

The billows that guarded my sea girt path,
But carried my Lord on their crest;
When I dwell on them, my wilderness march
I can lean on His love for the rest.

He emptied my hands of my treasured store,
And His covenant love revealed,
There was not a wound in my aching heart,
But the balm of His breath hath healed.

O! tender and true was the chastening sore,
In wisdom, that taught and tried,
Till the soul that He sought was trusting in Him
And nothing on earth beside.

He guided by paths that I could not see,
By ways that I have not known,
The crooked was straight and the rough made plain,
As I followed the Lord alone.

He led Him still for the pleasant palms,
And the water springs by the way;
For the glowing pillars of flame by night,
And the sheltering clouds by day.

There is light for me on the trackless wild,
As the wonders of old I trace;
When the God of the world and the Father
To search me a resting place.

Has He changed for me? Nay! He changes not,
He will bring me by some easy way,
Through fire and flood, and each crafty foe,
As safely as yesterday.

And if to warfare, He calls me forth,
He buckles my armor on;
He greets me with smiles, and a word of cheer,
For battles His sword hath won.

He wipes my brows as I droop and faint,
He blesses my hand to toil;
Faithful is He, as He washes my feet,
From the trace of each earthly soil.

Never a watch on the dreariest hall,
But some promise of eternal life, none denied,
I read from the past, that my future shall be Far better than all my fears.

Like the golden pot, the blossoming bread,
Laid up with the blossoming bread,
All safe in the ark, with the law of the Lord,
Is the covenant care of my God.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST AT HAND—The Holy Scriptures speak of two different glories; there are celestial bodies and bodies terrestrial; there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body (1. Corinthians, xii., 48-41). Jesus said, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live (with a spiritual body). And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die. Believest thou this?" (These will keep their natural bodies, made immortal). (St. John xii., 25, 26, and 1. Corinthians, xii., 51, 52, 53). And it is that Israel that have subscribed into the Lord (Isaiah, xli., 5), and have kept both law and Gospel, which natural bodies will be made immortal, and will receive the Lord at His second coming. Books (two different copies) containing the above doctrine will be sent by mail for 12 cents each. Address J. WIELE, No. 143 North Sixth st., Brooklyn, New York.

Notes and Suggestions FOR BIBLE READINGS.

BY S. R. BRIGGS AND J. H. ELLIOTT.

Acknowledged to be the very best help for Bible Readings in print. Introductory chapters by L. W. Whittle, Rev. Lyman Abbott, Rev. J. H. Brooks, D. D., Rev. Stewart Robinson, D. D., Rev. J. Erdman, Rev. A. Somerville, Rev. J. H. Fiske, D. D., and Over Six Hundred BIBLE READINGS AND BIBLE STUDIES by some of the most eminent Bible students of the day.

This volume is without doubt the most complete and satisfactory as well as the largest and cheapest book of Bible Readings published.

One very valuable feature of this work and wherein it differs from other books of a somewhat similar character, is in the line of thought being given with very nearly every scripture reference quoted, without which the Bible Readings are of little more help than an ordinary concordance in preparing for this useful branch of Christian instruction.

292 pages, large 12mo, with complete Index. Bound in cloth, Library Edition, $1.00; cheap paper cover edition, 50 cents.

Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, to

MR. HAMMOND needs no introduction from us to our readers. Most of them have had an opportunity of hearing him for themselves, and have had facilities for judging of his methods and the value and permanence of his work. We are cognizant of all that is alleged against Mr. Hammond's work, but it is due to him to say that where complaints are made that the children have fallen back into the world after making a profession of conversion under his preaching, it is generally found that after Mr. Hammond's departure there was no special and organized effort made to build them up in the faith. Mr. Hammond's work is essentially a work of beginnings, and he, more than any evangelist we know, needs to be followed by earnest, loving, persistent, and patient successors.

Edward Payson Hammond was born in Ellington, a secluded little town in the valley of the Connecticut River, on September 1st, 1831, and is therefore now fifty-four years of age. He was the child of religious parents. At the age of seventeen he attended school at Southington, and there a powerful revival of religion took place, in which many young people were converted.

CONVERSION.

The first Sunday of his stay in Southington was communion day. It seemed to him that all his friends and relatives, and new acquaintances, were gathered around the table of the Lord. Among the few who passed out were none whom he knew. The thought of the judgment day suddenly flashed across his mind, and the awful scenes of that final separation passed like a panorama before his view.

On returning to his lodgings that night a lady handed him James's "Anxious Inquirer" to read. He glanced his eye hastily over a few of its pages, but thinking it too dry a book for him, he threw it down. But this did not extract the arrow of conviction that had pierced his heart. He felt that he was a sinner, hastening on to the great judgment day unprepared. "For two weeks," he says, "I wept and prayed, and read my Bible." During these dark days he read James's "Anxious Inquirer," and he looked upon it no longer as a dry book, but as a guide to Christ and heaven. It was not long before he surrendered himself to Christ.

COLLEGE LIFE.

He subsequently entered Phillips's College, Andover, and there God blessed his faithfulness to the conversion of souls in the institution, and in neighboring villages in which, with other students, he established Gospel meetings. He entered Williams's College in 1854, and there, without neglecting his studies, he labored earnestly and successfully for the conversion of his classmates. In the spring of 1855 he went among the Alleghany Mountains, and planted several Sunday-schools during his vacation, which in some instances proved to be the nucleus of churches. In 1858 he became a student in Union Theological Seminary, New York, and continued his home missionary work among the destitute. In this same year he received the degree of B.A., and in 1861 that of M.A.

COLLISION WITH AN ICEBERG.

Having planned a trip to Europe in the year 1859, he sailed in the ship Edinburgh. A few days later the vessel struck an iceberg (see picture on first page), and startled all on board by the tremendous shock. At first it was hoped the vessel had not sprung a leak. The pumps were sounded, and in ten minutes the words "she leaks!" rang like a knell of doom from stem to stern. Many of the passengers fainted. Some were soon found upon their knees crying for mercy, and among these was one who, with atheistic audacity, had only a short time before been rudely scoffing at prayer and God's Word.

The ship safely reached St. John's, Newfoundland, the next night at dusk, when unfeigned thanksgiving ascended from every heart to God.

Eventually the journey to Europe was finished, and having spent a few weeks in England and Scotland, Mr. Hammond went to Ireland, where he remained for two weeks, receiving a fresh preparation and impulse in his work of saving souls. Returning to Scotland after a tour on the Continent, Mr. Hammond found that expected remittances of money had not arrived from America, and he was therefore disappointed in his purpose of sailing for his native land. He therefore applied for permission to study in the Free Church College, in Edinburgh, which was granted him.

SERVICES AT MUSSELBURGH.

While studying there he visited, at the suggestion of Rev. W. L. Alexander, D.D., of the Congregational Church, a hamlet called Musselburgh, about six miles from Edinburgh, where he commenced services, at which a large number of children and young people attended and were much affected.

A CHILD'S MINISTRATION.

Mr. Hammond is fond of relating the following incident which occurred during the work at Musselburgh: "A girl who was working in Edinburgh as a hired help went to Musselburgh on a visit and attended Mr. Hammond's meetings, and got into conversation with a little girl, and the little girl began to talk to her about Christ, to the utter amazement and astonishment of this grown-up woman. She said to her, 'Lassie, where did you learn this?' After a little while the child, to her further astonishment, said: 'If you will kneel down, I will pray with you.' And, to use the woman's words, 'she just drappit down on her knees and I couldna but gang down too.' (See first page picture.) And the little girl prayed; and the woman, strongly moved, when they rose up, exclaimed: 'Lassie, who ever learned you to pray?' The child's answer was, 'Naeboddy learned me; I think the Lord just pilt's into me.' That was the means of that woman's conversion to Christ; she is now one who gives satisfactory evidence of being converted."

A PERSECUTED CHILD.

As a sample of the stories with which Mr. Hammond interests children, we reproduce the following: "Mary W., of West Virginia, was made savingly acquainted with God when she was eight years old. A year after her conversion her father, who was a very wicked man, fell out with her class-leader. The following Sunday morning, after Mary had dressed herself to go to church, her father said to her, 'Mary, where are you going?' 'I am going to class, father,' replied the little girl, meekly. 'You sha'n't go to class; I'm going to put a stop to it; you sha'n't go any more,' replied the father, in very harsh tones. 'Father,' said Mary, 'I must go to class. The Lord will be displeased with me if I don't go to class. You know, father, I love you, and I try to please you, but I must not displease the Lord.' 'If you go to class, I'll whip you, see if I don't,' said the father. What was the poor little girl to do? She felt that she would sin against the Lord if she went not to class [having been taught so, it may be presumed, by the class-leader], if she went, she would displease her father, and get a whipping.

"Little Mary was greatly affected, but in the midst of her tears said, 'Father, I would rather take a whipping than offend the Lord. I am your little girl, and you know I want to be good.' That should have moved a father's heart, but it only enraged him the more, and in a most violent tone he said, 'You saucy imp, if you go to class, I'll shoot you!' 'Well, father,' replied Mary, 'I would rather be shot than sin against the Lord,' and then immediately started on her way to class. The wicked father followed her outside the gate, and picking up a thorn bush, struck her with it, tearing her bonnet and dress (see picture No. 3 on first page), but she went on, and he returned to the house.

"When Mary came back from class, with her heart full of the love of Jesus, her mother met her at the gate, and said: 'Oh, Mary, don't go into the house; your father loaded the gun, and I am afraid he will shoot you.' The mother wept, but did not restrain her, so Mary walked into the house. The father had gone upstairs. When Mary went in she began singing one of her hymns. As she sang, her father called her, 'Mary, come up here!' She immediately obeyed, and went upstairs; to be shot by her enraged father. She had a martyr's spirit, and was not afraid to die. When she reached the top of the stairs her father said, 'Mary, that is a very pretty song; sing some more!' Then, overcome with emotion, he dropped on his knees, and said, 'Mary, will you forgive your wicked father?' 'Oh, yes, father!' said Mary, as she put her arms around his neck; 'I forgive you with all my heart.' 'Mary, pray for me!' he cried out. 'Oh, pray that God may forgive my sins!' She knelt by his side, and pleaded with the Lord for her father. The struggle was continued for hours, but resulted in the man's conversion to God. Mary continued to serve Jesus till the day of her death."

Following the Musselburgh services were meetings at Gifford, Haddington, Lowestoft, Gorleston, Skeine, Aberdeen, and other places in England and Scotland, which were largely attended, and many people, and a large number of children, professed conversion.

On October 8th, 1860, Mr. Hammond went to THE CITY OF EDINBURGH, to supply the pulpit of Richmond Place Chapel for four weeks, and addressed crowded meetings every night during that time. Many from all denominations flocked to the church. Dr. Alexander, Reginald Radcliffe, Richard Weaver, and others took part in the meetings. The Edinburgh Mercury published the following paragraph at this time:

"On Monday evening Richard Weaver was advertised to preach in Richmond Place Chapel at eight o'clock, but before seven o'clock the house was filled, and the services were conducted for an hour by Mr. Hammond. At eight o'clock Messrs. Weaver and Radcliffe entered, and Mr. Hammond was asked by them to go outside and preach to the thousands crowding the streets before the chapel. There was such a crush, however, that the only way he could get out was the novel one of walking upon the shoulders of the stalwart men who allowed him to do so, and who stood like a rock under him, so eager were they that he should preach outside (see picture No. 4 on first page). The services were continued in the streets until past eleven o'clock at night."

In February, 1861, Mr. Hammond began HIS LABORS IN GLASGOW, where over a thousand persons professed conversion at his services. From one of his addresses delivered at this time in Free St. Mark's Church, we extract the following incident, which he related to show how much parents are to blame in educating their daughters for the world and not for God. He said:

"There was a young lady in New York with whom the Holy Spirit had been striving until she became very anxious about her soul. Now, if she had gone on at this time, she would have really entered the kingdom, and been a child of God. But her father thought: a fine young girl like that, moping and talking about religion! It made him uneasy; and, as his daughter was very pretty, he thought to get her married to some rich man. That man was trading upon his child's good looks, just as many another father does. He said to his daughter she must go into society, must be gay and fascinating, just as she had been before what he called a serious fit came on.

THE PRICE OF A SOUL.

There was a fashionable assembly in the city which the father wished his daughter to attend; he promised her a rich dress and valuable jewels if she would do so; she with reluctance consented. She grieved the Holy Spirit and lost all conviction, and from that moment was 'past feeling.' She caught cold, and in two weeks was close upon death. She tried to think of her soul, but she could not. She had her rich dress spread out upon a table and the costly jewels placed beside it, and, sending for her father, pointed with her fevered hand, and said these dreadful words: 'There is the price of my soul. I see plainly that what I've often heard is true. I have grieved the Holy Spirit, and He has left me.' And in darkness that young creature sank into eternity, the victim of her father's worldliness. (See picture No. 5 on first page.)

In April, 1861, Mr. Hammond took a trip through Europe. He visited Geneva, Milan, Genoa, Leghorn, and other places in Italy, and in June

RETURNED TO AMERICA.

He arrived about the beginning of July, and at once commenced to hold meetings in Boston, Portland, and other places. In the autumn Mr. Hammond received an invitation to conduct some services in the Church of the Pilgrimage, Plymouth, Mass., and in the following March he held his first meetings there. These, too, like the meetings in Europe, were very successful. Subsequently, in 1862, he held services in Montreal, Canada, where one thousand five hundred persons sought an interest in the prayers of God's people, and large numbers were converted. In the following winter he was as a minister and evangelist by the Presbytery of New York, and has ever since labored as an evangelist among the churches.

AN INFIDEL SOLDIER

attended Mr. Hammond's first meeting in Elmira, N. Y., on purpose to scoff. Mr. Hammond says: "The truth reached him, and for several days he was very unhappy. One night, as he was going home from the meeting, he felt, for the first time in his life, as if he would like to pray; but he was driven back by the thought of encountering the scoffs of his old companions. Next day he was placed on guard, and he studied the matter all day; but that night, as he paced his beat, he stopped and looked up at the moon and stars, and as he thought how beautiful they were, he seemed to hear the words, 'Come to Jesus.' 'I will,' he said; and there, leaning on his gun, he offered his first prayer (see picture No. 6 on first page), yielding himself to Jesus, and resolved to bear all for His sake—'and,' he remarked, 'Jesus took me.' He became a hard-working Christian, and his influence was, and still remains, very great among the soldiers."

In 1866, just after his marriage, Mr. Hammond revisited England and Scotland. At the invitation of Mr. George Muller, he visited the orphanages at Ashley Down, and addressed the children there, with the most gratifying results. In June, 1867, at the invitation of the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel and others, he began a series of services in London, which were sustained, amid indications of Divine approval, for four months. Among the places visited was the when his colossal edifice was crowded with children, to whom Mr. Hammond preached.

In 1874-'75 Mr. Hammond was working where he spent about nine months. At San Jose some meetings were held, which proved to be eminently successful in leading large numbers of backsliders to renew their dedication to Christ, whom they had dishonored by their desertion. In his search for perishing souls, Mr. Hammond visited a Californian gaol, and held a Gospel service among the prisoners. He talked and prayed with a man named Vasquez, a notorious robber, who had been recently convicted of murder and sentenced to be hanged. (See picture No. 7 on first page.) The condemned man was ultimately constrained to seek mercy, and died in hope that God had pardoned him for Christ's sake.

Mr. and Mrs. Hammond, with a party of friends, visited Alaska, in the summer of 1875. The object of their visit was not only to preach to the Indians, but especially to awaken an interest on the part of Christians in the United States to send missionaries among them. On his return, by his pen and voice, Mr. Hammond did much to call attention to the need of work in that territory.

Having labored in Brooklyn at Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle, and in various cities in the South and West, as reported from time to time in our news columns, Mr. Hammond, in the fall of last year, again crossed the Atlantic, and in the month of December conducted a series of meetings in Liverpool and Leicester, which were crowned with great blessing. At their conclusion he went to Glasgow, and labored in different districts of that large and enterprising city for three months. India, we are informed, is to be the next sphere of Mr. Hammond's labors.

THE TIME OF THE END.

An Address by Rev. Miles Grant, of Chicago.

The Key to the Two Thousand Three Hundred Days—Useless until the Time of the End—How that Time is Known—The Crisis in the Mohammedan World—The Significance of the Mahdi's Appearance—His Immense Power—The End of Ottoman Rule.

IN the eighth chapter of Daniel we read of a ram with two horns, and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last—the ram pushed southward, northward, and westward, so that no beasts might stand before him, etc. In the thirteenth verse Daniel asks how long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the abomination of desolation, when both the sanctuary and the host shall be trodden down? The symbols of the horns were explained by the angel, but the two thousand three hundred days were not explained in the eighth chapter.

A KEY WAS GIVEN,

however, by which these two thousand three hundred days might be understood, but the key was not to be used until the "time of the end" (Dan 12: 9). Daniel was urging Gabriel to give him some information, but all the answer he could obtain was, "The words are closed up till the time of the end." Thus, readers of prophecy before "the time of the end" could not get a right interpretation. Of such were Clarke, Usher, Astringham, Hale, Newton. All wrote before "the time of the end," and therefore could not get light upon this part of prophecy. Most students and expounders have followed their writings, and therefore we have had all sorts of explanations of these Scriptures.

How can we know that we have reached "the time of the end"? Is there no event which will mark out the passing over of a certain limit? In Daniel 2: 40 we read, "At the time of the end the king of the south shall push at him." If I can find that event in the past I shall know we have reached "the time of the end." If we have not reached that time, then we might as well keep silence on this subject, because these things are sealed till "the time of the end."

I purpose giving some brief evidence that

WE HAVE REACHED "THE TIME of the end." I quote from Sir Isaac Newton, who was born in 1642. On Daniel 4: 10 he writes: "It is a part of this prophecy that it should not be understood before the last age of the world. About 'the time of the end' in all probability a body of men will be raised up, who will turn their attention to the prophecies, and insist upon their literal interpretation in the midst of much clamor and opposition."

THE BEGINNING OF THE PUSHING.

Bugher says: "In 1832 the Egyptians rebelled against Turkish rule and had such success that the very existence of the Turkish Government in Europe was threatened." At this date "the time of the end" began. Preaching on the subject, too, it is remarkable, was begun at the same time. Mr. Miller began to preach in 1831. In 1835 Archdeacon Brown said: "I am strongly impressed with the conviction that our lot has fallen under the solemn period emphatically designated in Daniel as the 'time of the end.'"

Again, in "the time of the end," we read, "He (the king of the north) shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown; but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom and Moab and the chief of the children of Ammon" (Daniel 2: 41-43).

ALL THIS HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED.

Dr. Scott says: "The king of the north (the Ottoman Empire) was never able to subdue the Arabian tribes or the mixed people, which inhabited the regions formerly occupied by Edom, Moab, and Ammon—and the Ottoman emperors now pay the Arabs an annual pension of 40,000 crowns for the safe passage of their pilgrims to Mecca."

Who will arouse the king of the north? Surely there is sufficient cause in the proclamation of the Mahdi—the false prophet of the Soudan. He says in that proclamation to India, "Learn ye that God hath chosen me for the Khilafat-el-Kuhana, i.e., Principal Vicegerent."

A GREAT CRISIS

in the Mohammedan world is at hand. The treading down of the sanctuary is near its end. The Moslems believe that their Mahdi will thoroughly purify Islam, and his coming will be a sign of the general resurrection. In anticipation of his coming the cleansing and repairing of the eastern minaret, called the Minaret of Jesus, of the great mosque at Damascus, was begun in 1882. From Mecca to Morocco the following prophecy was circulated: "On the first of the month of Moharrem, in the year 1300 (November 12th, 1882), will appear El Mahdi. He will be exactly forty years of age, and of noble bearing."

The Mahdi was born at Dongola in 1842. He is a noted orator. In 1878 he became a hermit, which gave him fame. He has absolved his followers from all allegiance to earthly potentates, and announced himself as the successor of Mohammed. He has now adherents in every land where Islam prevails, and General Stone says his influence is extending throughout the Moslem world. General Stone also asserts that the full success of the Mahdi would mean "at least the destruction of Turkish power in Arabia, Palestine, and Syria; probably also in Tripoli." A French paper states: "At the present moment it is not England only who is struck, it is the entire eastern world, it is

THE WHOLE OF CHRISTENDOM."

El Hazar, the greatest Mohammedan university, has pronounced in favor of the Mahdi's claims, which cannot fail to have an immense influence. The Mahdi has declared that the archangel Gabriel has commanded him to unsheath the sword of faith in order to reform the bad Moslem, and to found a Mussulman Empire which will be followed by universal peace. "At the time of the end—tidings out of the east shall trouble him."

This tends to show clearly the DISTURBED STATE OF THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE.

Something must stir up the king of the north to go forth with great fury. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the sea in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." The glorious holy mountain must be Mount Zion. At that time when the king of the north comes to his end—when I can see the Turkish power moving its forces to Palestine—then I will be assured that the Lord is nigh. We have entered a period of thrilling interest to prophetic students, such as they never had before. It impresses us strongly that we are very near the Great day of the Lord. Let us see to it that we are ready.

SOLD OUT.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money."—Isa. 52: 3.

The Bargain Uncompleted—A Cheating Purchaser—The Property Sold—Four Instalments—A Hoary Swindler—The World Compelled to Buy You—One Bargain—Some Famous Vendors—Business Closed—A Bad Investment—The Worth of the Article—A Suit of Replevin—The Lawful Tender—The Cost of the Suit—The Bid that Wins—The Alternative—Sold Out for Eternity—A Shipwreck.

THE JEWS had gone headlong into sin, and as a punishment they had been carried captive to Babylon. They found that iniquity did not pay. Cyrus seized Babylon, and felt so sorry for these poor captive Jews that, without a dollar of compensation, he let them go home. So that, literally, my text was fulfilled: "Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money."

There is enough Gospel in this text for fifty sermons; though I never heard of its being preached on. There are persons in this house who have, like the Jews of the text, sold out. You do not seem to belong either to yourselves or to God. The title-deeds have been passed over to "the world, the flesh, and the devil;" but the purchaser has never paid up. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

THE PROPERTY SOLD.

When a man passes himself over to the world he expects to get some adequate compensation. He has heard the great things that the world does for a man, and he believes it. He wants two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. That will be horses, and houses, and a summer resort, and jolly companionship. To get it, he parts with his physical health by overwork. He parts with his conscience. He parts with much domestic enjoyment. He parts with opportunities for literary culture. He parts with his soul. And so he makes over his entire nature to the world. He does it in

FOUR INSTALMENTS.

He pays down the first instalment, and one fourth of his nature is gone. He pays down the second instalment, and one half of his nature is gone. He pays down the third instalment, and three quarters of his nature is gone; and after many years have gone by he pays down the fourth instalment, and, lo! his entire nature is gone. Then he comes up to the world and says: "Good morning. I have delivered to you the goods. I have passed over to you my body, my mind, and my soul, and I have come now to collect the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars." "Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars?" says the world. "What do you mean?" "Well," you say, "I come to collect the money you owe me, and I expect you now to fulfil your part of the contract." "But," says the world, "I have failed. I am bankrupt. I cannot possibly pay that debt. I have not for a long while expected to pay it." "Well," you then say, "give me back the goods." "Oh, no," says the world, "they are all gone. I cannot give them back to you." And there you stand on the confines of eternity, your spiritual character gone, staggering under the consideration that you have sold yourself for nought.

A HOARY SWINDLER.

I tell you the world is a liar; it does not keep its promises. It is a cheat, and it fleeces everything it can put its hands on. It is a bogus world. It is a six-thousand-year-old swindle. Even if it pays the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for which you contracted, it pays them in bonds that will not be worth anything in a little while. Just as a man may pay down ten thousand dollars in hard cash and get for it worthless scrip—so the world passes over to you the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in that shape which will not be worth a farthing to you a thousandth part of a second after you are dead. "Oh," you say, "it will help to bury me, anyhow." Oh, my brother! you need not worry about that. The world will bury you soon enough, from sanitary considerations. After you have been deceased for three or four days you will compel the world to bury you.

Post mortem emoluments are of no use to you. The treasures of this world will not pass current in the future world; and if all the wealth of the Bank of England were put in the pocket of your shroud, and you in the midst of the Jordan of death were asked to pay three cents for your ferriage, you could not do it. There comes a moment in your existence beyond which all earthly values fail; and many a man has wakened up in such a time to find that he has sold out for eternity, and has nothing to show for it. I should as soon think of going to Chatham Street to buy silk pocket-handkerchiefs with no cotton in them, as to go to this world expecting to find any permanent happiness. It has deceived and deluded every man that has ever put his trust in it.

ONE BARGAIN.

History tells us of one who resolved that he would have all his senses gratified at one and the same time, and he expended thousands of dollars on each sense. He entered a room, and there were the first musicians of the land pleasing his ear, and there were fine pictures fascinating his eye, and there were costly aromatics regaling his nostril, and there were the richest meats, and wines, and fruits, and confections pleasing the appetite, and there was a soft couch of sinful indulgence on which he reclined; and the man declared afterward that he would give ten times what he had given if he could have one week of such enjoyment, even though he lost his soul by it. Ah! that was the rub. He did lose his soul by it! Cyrus the Conqueror thought for a little while that he was making a fine thing out of this world, and yet before he came to his grave he wrote out this pitiful epitaph for his monument: "I am Cyrus. I occupied the Persian Empire. I was king over Asia. Begudge me not this monument." But the world in after years ploughed up his sepulchre.

FAMOUS VENDORS.

The world clapped its hands and stamped its feet in honor of Charles Lamb; but what does he say? "I walk up and down, thinking I am happy, but feeling I am not." Call the roll, and be quick about it. Samuel Johnson, the learned! Happy? "No. I am afraid I shall some day get crazy." William Hazlitt, the great essayist! Happy? "No. I have been for two hours and a half going up and down Paternoster Row with a volcano in my breast." Smollett, the witty author! Happy? "No. I am sick of praise and blame, and I wish to God that I had such circumstances around me that I could throw my pen into oblivion." Buchanan, the world-renowned writer, exiled from his own country, appealing to Henry VIII. for protection! Happy? "No. Over mountains covered with snow, and through valleys flooded with rain, I come a fugitive." Moliere, the popular dramatic author! Happy? "No. That wretch of an actor just now recited four of my lines without the proper accent and gesture. To have the children of my brain so hung, drawn, and quartered, tortures me like a condemned sinner."

BUSINESS CLOSED.

I went to see a worlding die. As I went into the hall I saw its floor was tessellated, and its wall was a picture-gallery. I found his death-chamber adorned with tapestry until it seemed as if the clouds of the setting sun had settled in the room. The man had given forty years to the world—his wit, his time, his genius, his talent, his soul. Did the world come in to stand by his death-bed, and clearing off the phials of bitter medicine, put down any compensation? Oh, no! The world does not like sick and dying people, and leaves them in the lurch. It ruined this man, and then left him. He had a magnificent funeral. All the ministers wore scarfs, and there were forty-three carriages in a row; but the departed man appreciated not the obsequies.

I want to persuade my audience that this world is a poor investment; that it does not pay ninety per cent of satisfaction, nor eighty per cent, nor twenty per cent, nor two per cent, nor one; that it gives no solace when a dead baby lies on your lap; that it gives no peace where conscience rings its alarm; that it gives no explanation in the day of dire trouble; and at the time of your decease it takes hold of the pillow case, and shakes out the feathers, and then jolt down in the place thereof sighs, and groans, and execrations, and then makes you put your head on it. Oh, ye who have tried this world, is it satisfactory portion? Would you advise your friends to make the investment? No. "Ye have sold yourselves for nought." Your conscience went. Your hope went. Your Bible went. Your heaven went. Your God went. When a sheriff under a writ from the court sells a man out, the officer generally leaves few chairs and a bed, and a few cups and knives but in this awful vendue in which you have been engaged the auctioneer's mallet has come down upon body, mind, and soul: Going! Gone "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

WHAT IS IT WORTH?

How could you do so? Did you think that your soul was a mere trinket which for a few pennies you could buy in a toy shop? Did you think that your soul, if once lost, might be found again if you went out with torches and lanterns? Did you think that your soul was short-lived and that, panting, it would soon lie down to extinction? Or had you no idea what your soul was worth? Did you ever put your forefinger on its eternal pulses? Have you never felt the quiver of its peerless wing? Have you no known that, after leaving the body, the first step of your soul reaches to the stars, and the next step to the furthest outposts of God's universe, and that it will not die until the day when the everlasting Jehovah expires? Oh, my brother, what possessed you that you should part with your soul so cheap? "Ye have sold yourselves for nought."

A SUIT FOR REPLEVIN.

But I have some good news to tell you. I want to engage in a litigation for the recovery of the soul of yours. I want to show that you have been cheated out of it. I want to prove, as I will, that you were crazy on that subject, and that the world, under such circumstances, has no right to take the title-deed from you; and if you will join me I shall get a decree from the High Chancery Court of Heaven reinstating you into the possession of your soul. "Oh," you say, "I am afraid of law-suits; they are so expensive, and I cannot pay the cost." Then have you forgotten the last half of my text? "Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money."

Money is good for a great many things, but it cannot do anything in this matter of the soul. You cannot buy your way through. Dollars and pounds sterling mean nothing at the gate of mercy. If you could buy your salvation, heaven would be a great speculation, an extension of Wall Street. Bad men would go up and buy out the place, and leave us to shift for ourselves. But as money is not what is? I will answer: Blood! Whose? Are we to go through the slaughter? Oh, no; it wants richer blood than ours. It wants a king's blood. It must be poured from royal arteries. It must be a sinless torrent. But where is the king? I see a great many thrones and a great many occupants, yet none seem to be coming down to the rescue. But after awhile the clock of night in Bethlehem strikes twelve, and the silver pendulum of a star swings across the sky, and I see the King of Heaven rising up, and He descends, and steps down from star to star, and from cloud to cloud, lower and lower, until He touches the sheep-covered hills, and then on to another hill, this last skull-covered, and there, at the sharp stroke of persecution, a rill incarnadine trickles down, and we who could not be redeemed by money are redeemed by precious and imperial blood.

We have in this day professed Christians who re so rarefied and etherealized that they do not want a religion of blood. What do you want? you seem to want a religion of brains. The bible says: "In the blood is the life." No yonement without blood. Ought not the postle to know? What did he say? "Ye are redeemed not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold; but by the precious blood of Christ." You put your lancet into the arm of our holy religion and withdraw the blood, and you leave it a mere corpse, fit only for the grave. Why did God command the priests of old to strike the knife into the kid, and the goat, and the pigeon, and the bullock, and the lamb? It was so that when the blood rushed out from these animals on the floor of the ancient tabernacle the people should be compelled to think of the coming carnage of the Son of God. No blood, no atonement.

THE ACCUSING BLOOD.

I think that God intended to impress us by the vividness of that color. The green of the grass, the blue of the sky, would not have startled and aroused us like this deep crimson. It is as if God had said: "Now, sinner, wake up and see what the Saviour endured for you. This is not water. This is not wine. It is blood. It is the blood of my own Son. It is the blood of the immaculate. It is the blood of a God." Without the shedding of blood is no remission. There has been many a man who in courts of law has pleaded "not guilty," who nevertheless has been condemned because there was blood found on his hands, or blood found in his room; and what shall we do in the last day if it be found that we have crucified the Lord of Glory and have never repented of it? You must believe in the blood or die. No escape. Unless you let the sacrifice of Jesus Christ go in your stead you yourself must suffer. It is either Christ's blood or your blood.

THE COST OF RECOVERY.

"Oh," says some one, "the thought of blood sickens me. Good. God intended it to sicken you with your sin. Do not act as though you had nothing to do with that Calvarian massacre. You had. Your sins were the implements of torture. Those implements were not made of steel, and iron, and wood, so much as out of your sins. Guilty of this homicide, and this regicide, and this decide, confess your guilt to-day. Ten thousand voices of heaven bring in the verdict against you of guilty, guilty. Prepare to die, or believe in that blood. Stretch yourself out for the sacrifice, or accept the Saviour's sacrifice. Do not fling away your one chance.

It seems to me as if all heaven were trying to bid in your soul. The first bid it makes is the tears of Christ at the tomb of Lazarus; but that is not a high enough price. The next bid heaven makes is the sweat of Gethsemane; but it is too cheap a price. The next bid heaven makes seems to be the whipped back of Pilate's hall; but it is not a high enough price. Can it be possible that heaven cannot buy you in? Heaven tries once more. It says: "I bid this time for that man's soul the tortures of Christ's martyrdom, the blood on His temple, the blood on His cheek, the blood on His chin, the blood on His hand, the blood on His side, the blood on His knee, the blood on His foot—the blood in drops, the blood in rills, the blood in pools coagulated beneath the cross; the blood that wet the tips of the soldiers' spears, the blood that plashed warm in the faces of His enemies." Glory to God.

THAT BID WINS IT!

The highest price that was ever paid for anything was paid for your soul. Nothing could buy it but blood! The estranged property is bought back. Take it. Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money." Oh, atoning blood, cleansing blood, life-giving blood, sanctifying blood, glorifying blood of Jesus! Why not burst into tears at the thought that for thee He shed it—for thee the hard-hearted, for thee the lost? "No," says some one; "I will have nothing to do with it except that, like the Jews, I put both my hands into that carnage and scoop up both palms full, and then throw it on my head and cry: 'His blood be on us and on our children!'" Can you do such a shocking thing as that? Just rub your handkerchief across your brow and look at it. It is the blood of the Son of God whom you have despised and driven back all these years. Oh, do not do that any longer. Come out frankly, and boldly, and honestly, and tell Christ you are sorry. You cannot afford to so roughly treat Him upon whom everything depends.

I do not know how you will get away from this subject. You see that you are sold out, and that Christ wants to buy you back. There are three persons who come after you to-night: God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost. They unite their three omnipotences in one movement for your salvation. You will not take up arms against the Triune God, will you? Is there enough muscle in your arm for such a combat. By the highest throne in heaven, and by the deepest chasm in hell, I beg you look out. Unless you allow Christ to carry away your sins, they will carry you away. Unless you allow Christ to lift you up, they will drag you down. There is only one hope for you, and that is the blood. Christ, the sin-offering, bearing your transgressions. Christ, the surety, paying your debts. Christ, the divine Cyrus, loosening your Babylonish captivity.

THE ALTERNATIVE.

Would you not like to be free? Here is the price of your liberation—not money, but blood. I tremble from head to foot, not because I fear your presence, for I am used to that, but because I fear that you will miss your chance for immortal rescue, and die. This is the alternative divinely put: "He that believeth on the Son shall have everlasting life, and he that believeth not on the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." In the last day, if you now reject Christ, every drop of that sacrificial blood, instead of pleading for your release as it would have pleaded if you had repented, will plead against you. It will seem to say: "They refused the ransom; they chose to die; let them die; they must die. Down with them to the weeping and the wailing. Depart! go away from me. You would not have me, now I will not have you."

"SOLD OUT FOR ETERNITY."

O Lord God of the judgment day, avert that calamity! Let us see the quick flash of the scimitar that slays the sin but saves the sinner. Strike! Omnipotent God, for the soul's deliverance. Beat! O eternal sea, with all thy waves against the barren beach of that rocky soul, and make it tremble. Oh! the oppressiveness of the hour, the minute, the second, on which the soul's destiny quivers, and this is that hour, that minute, that second!

I wonder what proportion of this audience will be saved? What proportion will be lost? When the Schiller went down, out of three hundred and eighty people only forty were saved. When the Ville du Havre went down, out of three hundred and forty, about fifty were saved. Out of this audience, to-day, how many will get to the shore of heaven? It is no idle question for me to ask, for many of you I shall never see again until the day when the books are open.

A SHIPWRECK.

Some years ago there came down a fierce storm on the sea-coast, and a vessel got in the breakers and was going to pieces. They threw up some signals of distress, and the people on the shore saw them. They put out in a life-boat. They came on, and they saw the poor sailors, almost exhausted, clinging to a raft; and so afraid were the boatmen that the men would give up before they got to them, they gave them three rounds of cheers, and cried: "Hold on, there! Hold on! We'll save you!" After a while the boat came up. One man was saved by having the boat-hook put in the collar of his coat; and some in one way, and some in another; but they all got into the boat. "Now," says the captain, "for the shore. Pull away now, pull!" The people on the land were afraid the life-boat had gone down. They said: "How long the boat stays. Why, it must have been swamped, and they have all perished together."

And there were men and women on the pier-heads and on the beach wringing their hands; and while they waited and watched, they saw something looming up through the mist, and it turned out to be the life-boat. As soon as it came within speaking distance the people on the shore cried out: "Did you save any of them? Did you save any of them?" And as the boat swept through the boiling surf and came to the pier-head, the captain waved his hand over the exhausted sailors that lay flat on the bottom of the boat, and cried: "All saved! Thank God! All saved!" So may it be to-day. The waves of your sin run high, the storm is on you, the danger is appalling. Oh! shipwrecked soul, I have come for you. I cheer you with this Gospel hope. God grant that within the next ten minutes we may row with you into the harbor of God's mercy. And when these Christian men gather around to see the result of this service, and the glorified gathering on the pier-heads of heaven to watch and to listen, may we be able to report all saved! Young and old, good and bad! All saved! Saved from sin, and death, and hell. Saved for time. Saved for eternity. "And so it came to pass that they all escaped safe to land."

The War on Indecent Literature is being vigorously waged in Connecticut. A statute has been passed by the legislature and signed by the Governor which imposes a fine of $50 or less and imprisonment for three months or less, or both, at the discretion of the court, upon every person who shall sell, lend, give, or offer, or have in his possession, with intent to sell, lend, give, or offer, any book, magazine, pamphlet, or paper devoted wholly or principally to the publication of criminal news or pictures and stories of deeds of bloodshed, lust, or crime.

The New Mission Church in Broome Street, New York, to which we recently referred, is to be called "the Broome Street Tabernacle." It was originally intended to call it "the Dodge Memorial Church," in grateful recollection of the late Hon. W. E. Dodge, but it is understood that the name was changed in deference to the wishes of the family. A few years ago, when the City Mission began to raise money especially for building churches for the people, Mr. Dodge was among the earliest and most generous subscribers to the fund, and he left by will to the City Mission a legacy of $20,000 to be applied to the erection of a church for the people. To the Building Fund the widow of Mr. Dodge has given a sum of money equal to that of her husband's legacy.

The Resignation of the Presidency of Cornell University, which the Hon. Andrew D. White has been for some time pressing on the Board of Trustees, was at length accepted last week, with profound regret. Mr. White, who is also Professor of History, has been connected with the university from its inception, and was the chosen and intimate adviser of its founder, the Hon. Ezra Cornell, in all the plans for the realization of his generous scheme. He takes the ground that his service of twenty years and the present prosperous condition of the university entitle him to seek relief from executive work, and the complete restoration of his health, which is somewhat impaired. He has publicly stated that when he retires from the university presidency it will be to devote the remainder of his life to preparing for publication the historical and social science material which he has for many years been gathering at home and abroad. The Board of Trustees have requested Mr. White to accept the nomination of the board to act as the Honorary President of the university, and will apply to the New York Legislature to amend the charter of Cornell so as to make Mr. White a life member of the Board of Trustees.

THE INTERNATIONAL FAITH-HEALING CONFERENCE.

ON Monday, June 1st, the first of the five days' session of this Conference, was opened at Bethshan, London. There was a numerous attendance, and some time having been spent in prayer, Rev. W. E. Boardman, who presided, announced that brethren were present from America, Australia, France, Germany, Holland, India, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland. For some time it had been earnestly desired by a number of zealous inquirers to know more of faith-healing than they had learned from the accounts which had come under their notice. It was hoped that this Conference, in which it was intended there should be full inquiry, but no controversy, would be found useful to such.

Pasteur Schrenk (Germany), said he had come from attending a funeral—that of his own dogmatism—and he should advise all who wished to arrive at the truth to bury their own notions on the subject, and to listen to the voice of the Lord. Pastor Hussey, of Chicago (whose portrait appeared last week on page 412), Captain Dennis, Dr. Woods Smyth, and others expressed the conviction that the gifts of holiness and healing should never be separated, inasmuch as sanctification or wholeness is a gift pertaining to body, soul, and spirit. In the afternoon there was a large attendance of visitors at the Agricultural Hall, when Captain Dennis presided, and stated that the object of the gathering was that those who had been healed might bear their testimony. As, however, there were about two thousand persons present, it would be necessary for them to speak briefly and clearly. A speaker testified that his daughter, who had been very ill, had been immediately cured at Bethshan. Dr. Hamilton said that after living for several years a life of mere nominal Christianity, a brother had anointed him, and he had received the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Another spoke of suffering from hernia, but he had been healed, and been able ever since to do without the instrument he had been wearing.

Miss Hefwood described how, when the doctors had failed after attending her for nine years, and when, after all the treatment she had received, she could only move on crutches, she had been healed. She was one day led to pray for healing of the spinal disease from which she was suffering, and while in prayer she distinctly heard a sharp "crick" in her back. She did not know that she was healed. Half an hour afterward she was able to stand as upright as she did now, for the Lord had given her strength. In the evening there was a very large attendance.

TUESDAY'S MEETINGS.

As a considerable number of persons on Monday were unable to gain admission to the opening meeting in Bethshan, it was resolved to hold the morning meetings in future in the Agricultural Hall. Rev. W. E. Boardman again presided, and after the meeting had been opened in the usual way, spent some time in answering questions which had been sent in to him in writing by some who wanted explanations of difficulties in regard to Faith-healing. The Rev. Dr. Simpson, of New York, spoke upon the various phases of the gift of the Holy Ghost, as taught in the Fourth Gospel, and was followed by the Rev. Mr. Sanford, from Boston, Mass., whose address had reference to the reception and retention of the Divine gift.

In the afternoon there was a far larger gathering than on the preceding day, and the chair was occupied by Dr. McKilliam, who said that the meeting was intended chiefly for testimony from those who had been healed. Three or four questions had been sent in, to which, as they might be causing some anxiety, he thought that answers should be given. He did not believe it to be God's will that His people should continue invalids. In reference to St. Paul, who had the gift of healing, leaving Epaphroditus ill, he said this was quite as exceptional a case as it is now for men to get healing.

Among the testimonies given was one from a man who, having worked for a considerable time among metals which had emitted poisonous fumes, had contracted blood-poisoning. For twelve years he was deemed a hopeless incurable, and was given up by doctor after doctor. Sea voyages and other means were resorted to, but without benefit, and death at length seemed imminent. When looking into the face of death, however, he looked also into the face of God, and cried for healing. His nervous state was such that he could not even bear the ticking of his watch; but God heard his cry; he was healed, and since that time he had not had one sleepless night, and to-day felt a new man.

Another speaker said he had long suffered from nervous affection of the heart. He was present to testify that he had been made strong, and was able to go about his ordinary work in the city.

Another case was that narrated by Mr. Moody, of Grimsby, who had a paralyzed leg. After various means had been tried by medical men, who had done all they could for him, amputation was advised as the only way of saving him. He had refused, however, and grew worse. He went to hospital after hospital, but with no good result. At length he read of a cure effected by faith-healing, and though he had been on crutches for a long time, with his foot never touching the ground, he resolved to try the remedy for himself, and he stood before them to-day healed. Among other cases of cure were the following: A young man who had been given up by the doctors; a woman who had suffered great pain for many years; another who had been ill for eighteen years, who had come from Italy to London, having heard of the wonderful cures effected; and yet another who testified to having been treated in a house in Dusseldorf similar to Bethshan.

In the evening there was a large attendance; and after the meeting had been opened by the Rev. E. W. Boardman, Mr. Wood gave an account of the work of healing in South Australia, where, he said, results had been witnessed of quite as striking a character as any which had been seen in England.

WEDNESDAY'S MEETINGS.

The attendance at the hall was even larger than that of the preceding day, and after the meeting had been opened with prayer, Mrs. W. E. Boardman stated that it was proposed to open a home in Bombay, in which the work of healing might be carried on among missionaries laboring in India. M. Schrenk, a Swiss evangelist, in the course of an address, maintained that the way of holiness and healing, to which they were bearing witness in the Conference, was the old way which had been taught by Christ. Addresses were also given by Miss Sisson, Miss Murray, and the Rev. W. E. Boardman, who told of the way in which they had been led to believe in faith-healing.

In the afternoon, as it was expected that after the testimonies had been given, there would be a meeting for "anointing," the galleries were crowded as well as the area of the hall. Near the platform some invalids were reclining on extemporized couches, and others were in invalid chairs. The blind and the lame were seen in considerable numbers among the audience. In consequence of the large number desirous of being anointed, the usual testimony of those who had been healed was dispensed with, and in its place there was an impressive address by the Rev. A. B. Simpson upon the ceremony of anointing. He showed that the solemn dedication of the body to the Lord in the ceremony, amounted to nothing less than an entire surrender of man's tripartite nature of body, soul, and spirit, by an everlasting covenant to his Creator and Redeemer.

THE ANOINTING SERVICE.

Mr. Boardman then left the platform for the area of the hall, accompanied by four gentlemen, and Mrs. Baxter, accompanied by two ladies, followed them. Perfect silence reigned in the hall as they moved from row to row among those waiting to be anointed. Mr. Boardman touched the head of each—about two hundred and fifty in all—with oil, while his coadjutors followed, placing their hands upon the heads of those who had been anointed. At the close of the anointing service the entire audience joined in repeating the opening verses of the 102d Psalm.

In the evening the hall was crowded in every part, and after the meeting had been opened, testimonies were given by several in various parts of the hall—all to the effect that they had received healing in the anointing service in the hall. Their voices, however, were so imperfectly heard that the Rev. W. E. Boardman suggested that those who had to-day received healing should bear testimony by standing up. Between forty and fifty responded. The meeting was then addressed by Dr. Baderer, Rev. D. D. Smith, of Wilmington, Del., and others.

THURSDAY'S MEETINGS.

At the opening of the Conference to-day, the Rev. W. E. Boardman said that those who had sent in requests for prayer, might rest assured they would not be forgotten. In answer to a question whether there is any scriptural authority for believing in gradual and imperfect healing, Mr. Boardman repeated what he had said at an early stage of the Conference—that they had the very same grounds for believing in physical healing as a Divine gift as for believing in spiritual blessings. If in any case there was imperfect healing, they might be sure there was imperfect faith. All who sought healing should take a full Christ for body, soul, and spirit, for only as they had a full Christ would they find a full salvation.

Mrs. Baxter remarked that in the work of faith-healing they should be careful not to follow the example of the heathen, who in prayer thought they would be heard for their much-speaking. She received hundreds of requests for prayer; but nine tenths of them were marked by this mistake.

In the course of the day the testimonies by those who had received faith-healing were quite as remarkable as any which had already been given. One speaker stated that for twenty years she had been lying a helpless cripple, but while in this condition it seemed to her as if a voice had spoken to her saying, "I will heal you." She said, "I knew nothing of faith-healing. I had not even heard of it; but while lying in a helpless condition, a verse of Scripture came into my mind. 'Whatever things ye desire when ye pray believe that ye receive.' On that verse I literally lived for a long time, and at last in full faith I laid aside my crutches, rose from my couch, and God gave me back the use of my limbs and eyes. In that faith I stand before you whole to-day." Another stated that having been cured he had felt it his duty to come many miles to testify. There was a time when from the top of his shoulder to his feet he was afflicted with chronic rheumatism. He could not bear being touched however lightly without experiencing the sharpest agony. His creed was that Christ is the Saviour of both body and soul.

In the afternoon many cases of healing were cited. One appeared to excite considerable interest. It was that of a woman who on the preceding day had entered the hall suffering from a diseased hip. She had been suffering from this for twenty years, and had been unable to walk without her crutch. At the anointing service, however, she had been healed, and the chairman exhibited the crutch as a trophy. The woman herself, who had come from Birmingham, rose and spoke a few words. "I am thankful to say I am healed," she said. "When I found that I was so, I cried for joy to think that I had healing of body, soul, and spirit. I can stand without my crutch, which I have not been able to do for twenty years."

A yet more remarkable testimony was that of a lady who said that for years she had not been able to do without a physician, who had repeatedly told her that she could not possibly get over the fibrous tumor from which she was suffering—a tumor which weighed twenty pounds, and occasioned her intense pain. Ten months ago she had prayed the prayer of faith, and had deliberately consecrated her body to the Lord as she had already consecrated her soul years ago. She closed her statement by saying, "I am perfectly well, and have been able to attend three services on Sunday since last week." Several cases quite as remarkable were given in the course of the afternoon, namely, those of Mrs. Brodie, of Honduras; Miss Gordon and Miss Morehead, of America. The conference was resumed in the evening, when addresses on the general subject were given.

FRIDAY'S MEETINGS.

On Friday morning Miss Murray, of Bethshan gave a very interesting address on "Forgetting Those Things which are Behind." At the coming of the Messiah the Jews were dwelling so much upon their own cherished notions concerning Him—remembering those things which were behind that they knew Him not when He did appear among them. We are in expectation that God is about to send another mighty message to the world. We are therefore to forget the things which are behind.

Pastor Schreck then gave an able address, after which Mr. Green, of Highgate, and others spoke. A Lady from Dr. Cullis's Home, at Boston, Mass., related how, after years of suffering: "One night alone in my room I shut the door, resolving to remain there until He had healed me. I could only pray, 'Lord, help me,' and as I was praying I seemed to hear a voice, which said, 'Rise up and walk,' and with it came power, and I arose and walked, and was healed."

Mrs. Incomb, of Croydon, related how the Lord had healed her after ten years of suffering from disease of the lungs and heart, and nervous debility, and internal tumor several inches in circumference, the pressure of which caused intense pain. The pain all disappeared at healing. The tumor vanished in a few days. She also left off spectacles.

The Rev. Mr. Sole said, "God has been showing me that in the breaking up of the human there will be the revelation of the Divine. After three years of suffering God has been restoring me to health. During this week I have been enabled to do more than for three years before."

On Friday afternoon an anointing service was held, at which, before a large audience many were anointed with oil, and hands were laid on them. In the evening another large meeting was held.

MDME. MALHERBE, OF HAUPTWEIL, the co-worker of Pasteur Stockmeyer, gave the following testimony in German, which Mrs. Baxter translated for the audience: "From my infancy the Lord has drawn my attention to His truth in the fifth chapter of James, but I lent no serious attention to it. Ten years ago, however, I became very ill, and became worse and worse. Continually I tried all the remedies possible, but at last I was obliged to keep my bed, and I felt that death approached. One day, when they had left me quite alone in my room, when I could no longer support the slightest noise, I was remaining in the silence and conversing with my God. I heard all at once the sound of sobs, and I found that it was my daughter and servants who were expecting my last moments. In fact I had gone quite cold, and when I understood that my last hour was come I sought to look to God in quite a new way. Then the Lord made my life pass before me. It was like a great picture which unrolled itself before my eyes, and from that vision one thing became quite clear to me. It was that I was dying because I had been rejecting a grace from God. The Lord showed me that I had been rejecting since my infancy His truth in James 5, and that thus I had grieved Him, and that I was under His judgment. Then arose a cry in my heart; I cried to the Lord inwardly, and I said to Him, 'Lord, I yield to Thee; I take Thee for my doctor. I never will go to another than to Thee. Do with me what Thou wilt.'

"I made a sign to my daughter to throw away all my medicine, and the same day I felt life return in body, and every day I felt stronger. Four days afterward Mr. Stockmeyer came to pay me a visit. I had not let him know anything; I did not even know he was in the habit of laying on hands. When he was there I told him what had passed and asked him for the laying on of hands. He laid on hands and instantly my strength returned as in my youth. I could rise, I could act. I could go and walk in my garden which I was very fond of. But when I sat under the shade and looked at the flowers which I had been so fond of caring for something strange took place. I seemed to hear thousands of voices which seemed to come from the plants, the leaves, the flowers, and the trees, and which all said to me, 'Don't be occupied longer with the earth; you have no longer strength for us, you belong only to the Lord, you are but for God and you have to live for Him only.'

Mrs. Baxter observed: I should like to add to that testimony, that about eight days after the day Mdme. Malherbe speaks of, I saw her myself. I had heard she was in a dying state from hemorrhage and all the blood seemed gone from her. I saw her the week after, and she was far stronger looking than she is to-day.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Sailors in Good Company.—At a Recent meeting Mr. J. G. Forbes said: "It is gratifying to meet with the results of the labors of others in the same cause. The other night I spoke to two German sailors who had attended the meeting at Brownfield, Glasgow, regularly for some time. They told me that when their ship had visited Marseilles they had gone to a Gospel meeting. Their knowledge of English was very slight, and so they did not understand much that was said, but simply came to the meeting to enjoy the company of fellow-Christians, for, as they said, 'Your Jesus, our Jesus.'"

A Wife's Solitude Rewarded.—The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "I heard of a woman who had a very kind husband, but who was not a Christian, and who would on no account be spoken to on the subject of religion. His wife, who was a godly woman, was anxious about her husband and thought of a plan which she soon put into practice. She learned a verse of Scripture daily that she thought would touch his heart, and every night, just before retiring to rest, she whispered it into his ear. Eventually she had the joy of leading him to the feet of the Saviour, and they are now heirs together of the grace of life."

A Prize Found in a Meadow.—Mr. Ralston narrated that a Wesleyan minister was on his way home from preaching one Sunday night, and when crossing a meadow he met a man who said, "I am lost!" The preacher took the man's own text, and preached to him Christ. Then both getting down on their knees in the dark meadow, the preacher pleaded with the Lord for the man's soul, and rising from the grass, the man joyously exclaimed, "I am so light, I am so light; the burden has gone." Yes, dear friend, it was laid on Jesus, the burden-bearer. "He bore our sin in His own body on the tree," and gives perfect rest and safety to all who trust Him.

Both Ways at Once.—The Rev. Mr. Ross Related: "Some time ago two travellers went to Africa. Coming to a lake, one sought to find whither the current tended by throwing a float on its surface, and slowly but surely it floated eastward. 'The current is eastward,' said the traveller, satisfied with his discovery. Some time afterward another traveller stood by the same lake asking himself the same question: 'Whither does the current tend?' He, too, cast a float upon the surface of the water, which at once floated westward. 'The current is toward the west,' he said, and following out his discovery, he gained its outlet, and so traced it to where it emptied itself into the Atlantic Ocean. Dear friends, let us see to it that our life is not uncertain, like this lake, at one time seeming to be going heavenward, and at another seeming to be going with the world. But rather, may we who bear the name of Jesus let our lives run like a quiet and steady stream, and as we go leave a bright record of our lives behind us."

An Angel in the Marble.—The Rev. Mr. Hood said: "It is remarked of Michael Angelo that at one time, coming upon a large piece of rough marble, he exclaimed: 'Ah! there is an angel here; get me a chisel.' And soon, cut out of the rough material, appeared a beautiful figure, representing an angel. Might I, therefore, suggest to ministers, to Sunday-school teachers, or Christian workers, that they may have rough material to work with, but if they will look at it with the eye of Michael Angelo, they will see something better and purer than they otherwise would have done?"

A Terribly Vivid Dream.—The Rev. Mr. Brown remarked: "I once read a poem in Addison's Spectator, which gave a vivid description of a dream in which the writer had dreamed he was in hell alone with his accusing conscience, and he describes it as the most terrible agony he had ever experienced. And the poem goes on to say that he does not know what hell in reality may or may not be, but he concludes, 'To sit alone with my conscience was hell enough for me.' Yes, it is true; all the tortures of the Spanish Inquisition are not comparable to the scorpion stings of a guilty conscience. There is happily cleansing and peace in the precious blood of Christ."

A Puzzled Child.—"Many Years Ago a woman died, and left one little girl, whom we took to live with us, until after the funeral. On that day, putting her little arms around my neck, she said, 'I saw mother's coach to-day, and they tell me they are going to put her into the earth.' 'Yes, dear,' I replied, 'Jesus has taken mother to be with Himself in heaven.' 'But,' argued the child, 'how can mother be in the ground, and yet in heaven with Jesus?' Can we wonder that a child did not understand the separation of the soul from the body, when sometimes older people do not? But I shall never forget her simple faith, as I explained to her the way of life. Oh, tell the children of Jesus' love when they are young, for they delight to hear of Him!"

A Russian Taken Prisoner.—"One Night a Christian worker conversed with a man who, though a foreigner, spoke English perfectly. For a long time the worker could get no satisfaction, a dumb spirit apparently having taken possession of the man. Feeling it was hopeless to speak to him any further, the worker left him, but half an hour later he saw the man standing in the same place, and thinking that perhaps the internal struggle might now be over in the man's mind, he spoke to him again, pressing upon him the need of immediate decision for Christ. Suddenly the man put out his hand, and grasping that of the worker, cried: 'I will.' When the first outburst of feeling was over, he told us that he was a Russian, and that when he returned home he would confess Christ as the Saviour to his countrymen."

A Sailor's Hand Healed by Christ.—Another Christian friend observed: "One night a French sailor was converted in a Gospel meeting near the docks, and, while he remained in port, his efforts to bring others to the Saviour were very pleasing. His conversion was brought about in a singular way. During his last voyage he so injured his hand that he could not ship again as he intended. A kind brother spoke to him in the open air about the need of salvation, but the sailor, pointing to his hand, said, in a most bitter tone, 'If Jesus would heal my hand He might be of some use to me.' 'Jesus can heal your hand if you will trust Him to do so,' said the worker. 'Bah,' was the scornful answer. But he slipped inside the meeting once or twice, and not only was he converted to Christ, but his hand began to heal, and lately he has shipped for another voyage, his injured limb having been made quite whole by the Great Physician."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Long-Anticipated Appointments in the New York Custom House were made last week. The President, on June 27th, appointed Edward L. Hedden, Collector, Hans S. Beattie, Surveyor, and Silas W. Burt, Naval Officer of the Port. Necessarily a great number of Democrats are disappointed. There were several candidates for the coveted office of collector, which is worth $12,000 a year, and each of the candidates had influential supporters. It is assumed, and apparently with some show of reason, that the appointments are a concession to the County Democracy. One of the most zealous of the President's supporters in the press remarks that the selections will have to be justified; they are not of the kind that justify themselves. The men are comparatively unknown, but if they prove efficient, their selection will be amply justified. The impression is growing among the people that political prominence is not the best qualification for office; and though the President has failed to satisfy the politicians and his party, he will be indorsed by the public if the men appointed prove honest and efficient. Judge Robertson, who now leaves the Custom House, has been, in spite of the sad circumstances connected with his appointment and his curious political action, a popular collector. It reflects credit on ex-President Arthur that he was allowed to complete his term, notwithstanding the vigorous action General Arthur took against his confirmation.

Two Conspicuous Criminals Received Sentence last week. On June 23d C. A. Buddensiek, the contractor who was building the row of eight five-story tenement houses in West Sixty-Second Street, New York, which collapsed on April 13th, before they were completed, and caused the death of one man and serious injury to others, was brought up for sentence. His counsel pleaded for mercy on the ground that there was no evil intent, but the Recorder replied that he was actuated by "a base motive to derive money without giving any adequate return," and that as there were several other contractors at work with similar principles, it was necessary to make an example for the public good. He therefore sentenced Buddensiek to pay a fine of $500, and to be kept at hard labor in the State prison for ten years. The second criminal was James D. Fish, the President of the Marine National Bank, which suspended in May, 1884. Mr. Fish was found guilty of misapplying the funds of the bank and of making false entries in the books. On June 27th he was brought up for sentence, and was condemned to serve ten years in prison. The judge reminded the ex-bank president that he was liable to have served ten years for each of the seven counts, but in merciful consideration of the fact that he is over sixty-five years of age, the sentence was not made cumulative.

Increased Uneasiness Among the Indians is reported. A telegram to the New York Times states that Geronimo is trying to excite the Mescalero Apaches in New Mexico to rebellion, the Southern Cheyennes are putting on war paint, and there are indications of serious trouble among the Utes in south-eastern Colorado. The cowboys near the Southern Ute reservation have killed six Indians, and the Utes have killed at least two white men. The cowboys declare that the Indians committed the first of the murders, but the Indians and their agent assert that the cowboys began the fight by killing Indians who were not on the Reservation. The Indian version of the trouble is confirmed by other and independent sources. General Crook is not trying to compel Geronimo and his band to return to the reservation, but intends to kill or capture them.

The Rebellion in the North-West may be considered at an end, and General Middleton has decided not to pursue Big Bear further. The chief's band is splitting up into small parties, and it would be almost impossible to catch him. Middleton learned from the Crees, who have deserted Big Bear, that the country over which Big Bear has gone cannot be got over by the troops in any way. It is thought by the general that Big Bear will soon get into such a destitute state that he will be compelled to give himself up, and the expense of pursuing him will thus be avoided. The real object of the pursuit was to release the McLean family. They have been aided by the Crees to escape, and have been brought safely into General Middleton's camp. It was owing to the Crees that they were preserved all through, Big Bear and his band wishing to kill them. The Misses McLean and their mother are terribly broken down in health by exposure and rough usage. They had been compelled to travel on foot with Big Bear's band.

The Conservative Administration in England was formally installed last week. The cablegrams indicate that the Queen's influence has been the chief factor in this settlement of the crisis. The Marquis of Salisbury was averse to taking office, knowing that a majority of the House of Commons was opposed to his policy. The Queen, however, urged him to accept the Premiership, and attempted to arrange an agreement with Mr. Gladstone, by which the Marquis could be assured of liberal support for non-partisan measures. Mr. Gladstone, however, declined to pledge himself and his followers. Lord Salisbury, at length, urged by the Queen and by the more ambitious members of his own party, yielded, and has formed his cabinet. The administration bears little resemblance to the Tory ministries of the past. The men who formerly occupied the chief places are dead, or have been removed to the House of Lords, and comparatively new men occupy their places. Lord Randolph Churchill, who seems to be the most energetic member, is an erratic politician, who has yet to make his reputation as a statesman. He has considerable abilities, but is reputed deficient in prudence. Sir Stafford Northcote, who since Mr. Disraeli quitted the House of Commons has been the acknowledged leader of the party in that House, is raised to the peerage, and makes way for a more vigorous leader in Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who becomes Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, as we denominate that official, Secretary of the Treasury. The loss of Earl Cairns, who died a few months ago, will be severely felt, as the Conservatives possess, no man equal to him in debating power. The office of Lord High Chancellor, which Lord Cairns so ably filled, is given to Sir Hardinge Giffard, a man of a very different type, who was formerly Attorney-General. Altogether, the Cabinet is not regarded as a strong one, and even by Conservatives, is not greeted with enthusiasm. Its hope of life consists in the fact that it may win support from moderate Liberals, who would rather see the country governed by Conservatives than Radicals. It may also receive help from the Parnellites, who are ready to treat with any statesman on the basis of conciliatory measures in return for Irish votes.

The Rapidity with which the Cholera is spreading in Spain is alarming. A comparison made by the European correspondent of the New York Times with the epidemic of 1884 shows how much worse is the disease this year. He states that there have been four thousand two hundred deaths reported from eight provinces of Spain, which is much more than half the entire number of deaths in all of France last year. From the start the rate of mortality in Spain has been far greater than it was in France, and lately it has become greater than it was last year, even in Naples. The average ratio of deaths to cases now is about four in nine throughout Spain. Roughly speaking, the death ratio was two to seven in France last year, and three in seven in Italy. Within the last week, and notably has this been the case in Murcia, more than half the people attacked have died, and in the new provinces where the pest has appeared within the last few days escapes have been the exception. The plague finds ninety-nine in a hundred of its victims in the slums or poor villages, where hygiene is an unknown word. The city of Murcia, where the plague is peculiarly malignant, is surrounded by a perfect network of crowded hamlets, constituting one vast tropical garden, irrigated by a system which permits not a drop of water to reach the sea—a system which is most marvellous from the engineering point of view, but is simply murderous now when the summer's sun makes every trench a dispenser of the plague and of death. Refugees from the cities were quick to spread the disease through these villages.

A Large Accession to the English House of Lords has taken place, as is usual when there is a change of administration. The incoming Cabinet has to arrange its offices, and where a member of the party is offered an office which he considers below his merits, he is sometimes placated by making him a lord, with a seat in the Upper House for himself and his heirs after him. The outgoing Cabinet also generally contributes to the House of Lords some of its members or friends. In this case one notable addition has been made. A few for the first time takes his seat in the House of Lords. It is true that other peers have been of Jewish birth, as the Earl of Beaconsfield was, but now there is to be a peer of Jewish faith. That is Sir Nathaniel de Rothschild, upon whom, at Mr. Gladstone's request, the Queen has conferred a peerage.

A Prisoner Escaped from the Mahdi has Arrived at Dongola. He is the Rev. Luigi Bonomi, an Italian missionary priest, and he has been for a long time a captive in the Mahdi's camp. Father Bonomi reports that all the priests made prisoners during the rising in the Soudan and the march of El Mahdi are in good health. The magnitude of the revolt in Kordofan has been very much exaggerated, says Father Bonomi, but he confirms the truth of the reports that the forces of El Mahdi have been repeatedly defeated by the garrison of Senaar. Father Bonomi states, however, that famine and disease are ravaging, making a waste of Kordofan. It is expected that the withdrawal of the British troops from the Soudan, will continue in spite of the advent of the Conservatives to power. The French Government demands also that England shall evacuate Egypt itself.

The Evangelical Alliance of the United States of America has been incorporated. Its purpose is to further religious opinion with the intent to manifest and strengthen Christian unity, and to promote co-operation in Christian work without interfering with the internal affairs of denominations. The corporators are Philip Schaff, S. Irenaus Prime, William L. Harris, George R. Crooks, A. H. Burlingham, Samuel B. Schieffelin, John Jay, Enoch L. Fancher, James M. King, William E. Dodge, S. D. Burdard, G. W. Samson, Edward Colgate, John D. Slayback, G. L. Shearer, James S. Chadwick, Cephas Brainerd, and Henry B. Chapin. It is to have forty managers.

Mr. Moody's Associate in Evangelistic Work is, according to an announcement made in the New York Weekly Witness, "Mr. D. B. Townner, late chorister of Union Chapel, Covington, Ky. The engagement is for five years. The prayer of many will be that their united labors may be crowned with the richest spiritual results."

A Lady Preacher was Ordained as a Baptist minister recently in Nebraska. A dispatch from that State published in the New York Sun states that Miss Frances E. Townsley was ordained by a council of Baptist churches. This is the first instance, so far as we know, of a lady being regularly ordained in the Baptist Church. It is decidedly a new departure, which we may hope will be followed by good results.

An Invitation from Mr. Moody to Christian workers has been issued to a convention at Northfield, Mass., commencing August 5th, closing August 15th. The buildings of the Northfield Young Ladies' Seminary, and of the Mt. Hermon Boys' School, will be thrown open to visitors. Accommodations can be had at the hotel and at the houses of the citizens of Northfield. The railroads will run special trains to convey visitors to the adjoining towns of Brattleboro, Greenfield, Keene, etc., where ample accommodations can be found. Christian workers are invited from all parts of the country. Applications for accommodations will be received until July 10th, addressed to D. L. Moody, Northfield, Mass.

An Innovation in Church Excursions was effected last week by Dr. Talmage. About seven hundred members of the Brooklyn Tabernacle congregation went to Niagara, setting out on Tuesday, June 23d, and returning Thursday, June 25th. The large party caused a sensation at the Falls, where an ovation to the famous preacher was organized. People came from the towns and villages around until over two thousand were crowded in the hotel where the church party was staying. Dr. Talmage had an exhausting experience in supplying the demand for his autograph, and in shaking hands with his visitors. Village bands for miles around serenaded him, and the firemen tendered him a complimentary parade. The party viewed the cataract from the various vantage points, spent a pleasant evening in the hotel, and returned the next day to Brooklyn without mishap. On Saturday Dr. Talmage sailed in the Aurania for England.

A Seaside Summer School of Philosophy will be held under the auspices of the Institute of Christian Philosophy, at Asbury Park, N. J., from the 21st to the 28th of July, and at Key-East, N. J., from July 29th to August 1st, and a "Mountain" meeting at Richfield Springs, N. Y., from August 20th to August 26th. Among the speakers at these different sessions we note the names of Dr. T. T. Munger, Dr. Washington Gladden, President Buttz, of Drew Seminary, and Dr. Deems, the President of the Institute.

A Month of Special Bible Study, Under the auspices of the Bible Work of Chicago, has just closed. Evangelists, missionaries, Bible readers, colporteurs, and other Christian workers met for the exposition of Scripture and the systematic study of doctrine and of church history, under the leadership of Professor W. G. Moorehead, D.D., of Xenia, Ohio. Four mornings and four evenings of each week were devoted to the regular sessions. The enrolled members of the class attended regularly throughout, and the number of those who could attend for a few days only steadily increased. It is hoped that a similar Bible Institute will be held in the fall or early winter.

An Octogenarian's Record was the Subject of eulogium at a meeting of the directors of an insurance company in New York last week. The president of the company had at that meeting tendered his resignation. He was twenty years old when he entered the office as a clerk, and he had served continuously for sixty years, rising to the highest place in the association. He said that in three-score years he had not taken a single day's vacation. He had never been to Long Branch, and he knew Coney Island only through the newspapers. He went to Albany once on business for his company, and that was the extent of his travels. It is doubtful whether any company in the Union has on its records an example of devotion to its interests equally constant and protracted. Some mark of practical appreciation will doubtless be tendered him by the directors. In God's service there are few such devoted workers. Yet there is less excuse for Christians taking holidays, because though they may wisely leave their special work for a brief time occasionally, they need not discontinue service for the Master, who provides those who seek them with opportunities of doing good wherever they may go, and in that service work recaptures the worker (Isa. 40: 31).

A Prison Instead of a Church was the Destination at which an immigrant in New York arrived last week through a mistake. On Sunday, June 21st, a newly arrived Irish girl went out intending to go to church. As she passed along Clinton Place she noticed a crowd of women, about forty in number, walking ahead of her. Thinking they were also on their way to a place of worship, she followed them, and went with them into the imposing edifice at the corner of Ninth Street and Sixth Avenue, which she not unnaturally supposed was a place of worship. She was soon undeceived. Entering with the women, and taking her seat on the benches among them, she saw a policeman lock the door, and then she realized that she had made a mistake. She was with a number of prisoners awaiting trial, and was unable to convince the policeman that she was not one of those arrested. Half an hour afterward, when the judge entered, she told her story, and he sent a policeman to investigate. As her account of herself was confirmed, she was released in time to attend evening service. She will probably be more careful how she follows a crowd again. In her spiritual walk unhappily she will find also that the path most thronged is not the safe one (Matt. 7: 13).

A Prayer in the Jury Room, Offered by One of the jurors, is the ground on which a lawyer in Kansas relies in his attempt to have a verdict set aside by the Supreme Court of that State. It appears that at a recent trial, when the jury retired to deliberate upon its verdict, one of the jurors proposed that their deliberations should be opened with prayer, and, with the consent of his associates, he led them in supplication to God for divine guidance in making up their judgment upon the matter submitted to them. The counsel for the beaten party moved to have the verdict set aside on the ground of "undue influence exercised by one of the jurymen by means of public prayer in the jury room." He concedes that there can be no valid objection to "a private petition to the throne of grace earnestly offered by a conscientious juror, with a motive of freeing his own mind from prejudice and passion." But he claims that "a public prayer in such a place," made in the hearing of his associates, is not legally admissible. He may be right as to the illegality of the proceeding, but as the juror seems to have prayed for divine guidance simply, and not for the success of either litigant, the lawyer's contention suggests curious inferences as to the character of his client's case, and is also a testimony to his belief in the efficacy of prayer. We should judge, from the nature of the verdicts rendered in some noted cases recently, that the practice is not a common one (Prov. 28: 5).

A Belated Pardon Arrived at the County jail of Louisville, Ky., on June 11th. The jailer on that day received a large, important-looking envelope with the United States official stamp on it. When it was opened it was found to contain a pardon for a prisoner named Meredith, signed by President Cleveland. A search was made through the jail for Meredith, but he could not be found. A look over the records of the jail showed that Meredith's time had been served and the man released on May 11th, just one month before his pardon arrived. Meredith was sent for trial in the United States Court for illicit distilling. He was convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a fine of $500. He served his six months and one additional month for the $500, and then took the insolvent's oath and was released. During this time his friends were at work in Washington trying to obtain a pardon for him, in which they were successful. The pardon was granted, but did not arrive in time to benefit the prisoner. Thus the efforts of his friends were wasted. That can never happen in the case of the penitent sinner. Though condemned, he may obtain pardon through Christ before his sentence is executed (Rom. 5: 18).

A Curious Race with a Snake is Reported from Hawley, Pa. A lady who lives near that place went out on the hills a few days ago to look over the huckleberry barrens. While standing at the side of an old road she heard a rattlesnake sound its rattle immediately behind her, and then felt a tug at the skirt of her dress. She looked around quickly, and saw that a big rattlesnake had struck at her, and that its fangs were fast in the bottom of her dress skirt. She instantly started on a run for home. The snake's fangs were so securely fastened in the dress that the snake was carried along. The lady ran so fast that the rattlesnake was whipped and tossed about like the tail of a kite. The distance to the house was a quarter of a mile, and when the lady reached her door she was exhausted, and looking around and seeing the snake still pursuing her as she supposed, she fell down fainting with fright on the steps. When the neighbors came to her assistance, the snake was found to be dead. Its life had been beaten out of it by its involuntary rough journey over the stones. So it will be with the Christian when, at the end of his race, he is at the door of his heavenly home. The old serpent he has dreaded and fled from will have lost his power to harm him (Rom. 16: 20).

The Defective Memory of a Buffalo Official caused him some chagrin while in New York recently. The Buffalo Courier states that the gentleman visited New York on important business connected with his office, and having transacted it to his satisfaction, he determined, in furtherance of a political or some other end, to give before he returned home an elaborate dinner to a numerous and distinguished company. The appointed evening arrived, the collation, an elegant one, was all ready to be served, but the guests came not. Half an hour passed, still they did not come, and the host became really uneasy. When the delay had grown to an hour and not a man of them had shown up, his feelings were indescribable. He speculated on the causes which might have prevented this or that guest coming, but none that he could imagine would account for what appeared an organized plot of all his friends to insult him. Deeply mortified, he returned to his hotel room, and there discovered the cause. Happening to open a drawer, he found therein the whole bundle of invitations, which he had forgotten to send out. Vexed and annoyed as he was with himself, he was relieved by the discovery that his friends had not plotted to humiliate him. It is not from any such cause that the Gospel banquet is unfurnished with guests. Those who were invited were too much occupied with business or pleasure to come (Luke 14: 16-21).

ISRAEL AND BRITAIN. A NOTE OF WARNING.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But though he had done so many miracles before them, yet they believed not on him; that the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled, which he spake, Lord, who hath believed our report? and to whom hath the arm of the Lord been revealed? Therefore they could not believe, because that Esaias said again, He hath blinded their eyes, and hardened their heart; that they should not see with their eyes, nor understand with their heart, and be converted, and I should heal them. These things said Esaias, when he saw his glory, and spake of him."—JOHN 12: 37-41.

Isaias's Loss of the Senses—The Paul of the Old Testament—I. Isaias and His Ministry—He saw the Coming Glory—His Lips Touched—He Spoke of Him—What we Need—II. The Nation to which Isaias Spoke—Dead to His Teaching—The Terrible Destruction—A Parallel Feared—England's Deliverances—Her Present Degradation—Vice in Court and Palace—Indifference to Religion—Preachers Making Infidels—The Holy Tithe.

The blindness of Isaias concerning our Lord was sadly remarkable. It was a blindness of the eyes, for they saw His many miracles, and yet believed not; their ears also seemed to be stopped, for they heard His words and did not understand them; and their hearts also were heavy, for they did not relent under the plaintive admonitions of a Saviour's love. Their hearts were cruel toward the Messiah; they hated Him without a cause. No door was open to the heart of Isaias; they had hardened their heart, they had shut their eyes, they had stopped their ears, and even He that spake as never man spake gained no access to their souls. They went so far as to crucify Him, and cried as they did so, "His blood be on us, and on our children"—words so sadly verified when Jerusalem was destroyed, and her children slaughtered, sold as slaves, or scattered to the four corners of the earth. It was, indeed, which happened unto Isaias. How sadly far can men go in unbelief, prejudice, and hardness of heart! How dim can human eyes become when men refuse to see! How darkened the understanding when men are unwilling to comprehend! Let us tremble at this, lest we ourselves by imitating the chosen people in their unbelief should fall into like bondage to prejudice and ignorance, lest we by tampering with truth should come at last to be incapable of perceiving it. Isaias was informed that such would be the outcome of his ministry; the Lord bade him say to the people, "Hear ye indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not." This must have been a very sad business for so generous and tender-hearted a man of God. It was painful to him to be so clear and yet to be so little understood. He was the Paul of the Old Testament; to him belonged fullness of knowledge, clearness of vision, plainness of speech, and faithfulness of spirit, and yet none of these things could make the people understand his message and receive it into their hearts.

This morning I shall draw certain lessons for ourselves from the great evangelical prophet, his ministry, and the people to whom he ministered so vainly. Our first meditation shall be concerning Isaias and his ministry; and our second shall be concerning the people to whom he spake. Alas! I fear that we who speak in the name of the Lord in these last days have also to deal with hearts that are gross, ears that are heavy, and eyes that are dimmed. Upon this generation also there is falling a measure of judicial withdrawal of light and discernment; and we also have to cry, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?"

I. First, then, let me speak with you concerning

ISAIAS AND HIS MINISTRY.

Oh, that the Spirit of God may speak with power through me. Our text says two things of Isaias; first, that "he saw His glory," and secondly, that "he spake of Him." The first statement is that Isaias saw. Isaias was a great seer; his prophesy begins thus: "The vision of Isaias the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem." All prophets were more or less seers, and saw what they foretold; but Isaias above others was endowed with the seeing and foreseeing faculty. He had the clearest sight, and for that reason he had the clearest speech. When a man speaks so that you cannot understand him, the usual reason is that he does not understand himself; and when a man speaks so as to be readily comprehended, it is because the thought in his own mind is well defined. He that would speak well must see well. Mark the two things in the text—"When Isaias saw His glory, and spake of Him."

But what did he see? It is a most important thing that in these days you and I should see the same, for the same work lies before us among a people who are a repetition of that disobedient and gainsaying nation. Read, then, with care the sixth chapter of Isaias. First, what Isaias saw was the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up. When the prophet went abroad among the people he heard them speaking against the Lord God; some contending for one deity and some for another; some leaning upon an arm of flesh, and others despising the promise of Jehovah the God of Israel. All this, I say, he saw out of doors, and he was troubled. But when he went into the sanctuary of God he saw the Lord sitting upon a throne; still reigning, still glorious, undisturbed by opposition. I pray you, brethren, settle this in your hearts; our Lord is highly exalted as Lord of all. He that died upon the tree is crowned with majesty, and all the angels of God worship Him. "He must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet." Let us have no question about this; for, if we have, we shall not be prepared to speak in the Lord's name with this evil generation. Amid the anarchy of the ages we see the glorious high throne of our redeeming Lord unmoved, unmovable; this is the rock of our refuge when the unsettled times rage about us like the waters of the troubled sea. We cannot be afraid, for Christ is on the throne. In

HIS VISION

Isaias saw the flaming spirits that wait upon the Christ of God. He calls them "seraphims." The best interpretation we can give is "burning ones;" they burn in the sense of consuming. They burn up that which ought to be consumed, namely, all kinds of evil. There are powers around our Lord which will destroy evil. You ask me to tell you something about these seraphim; how can I? They have covered their faces, and covered their feet. Since nothing is to be seen, what can I tell you? Neither would it be right for us to speak concerning them, for manifestly it is their desire to be hidden. This vision of the body-guard of the Prince of peace was enough to strengthen Isaias; thus comforted He would calmly confront that rebellious generation. If the prophet, when he opened the young man's eyes strengthened his heart by making him see horses and chariots of fire round about Elisha, shall not we be comforted as we behold legions of burning ones surrounding our King, and standing ready to fulfil His decrees?

As I stand here this morning I also have visions of God, and the cross seems to me transformed into a burning throne, whereon justice is high and lifted up to the uttermost, as I see God Himself in Christ Jesus bowing His head to death, that He might be just, and yet the Justifier of Him that believeth. Around that cross I see troops of angels gathering, and I hear one crying unto another, and saying, "Holy, holy, holy, is Jehovah Jesus, the great Sacrifice for sin." Do you not unite in their reverent homage?

Then came the best part of the vision for Isaias. At the glorious sight, he felt, "Woe is me, for I am undone, I am stricken dumb. I can never speak again, for my lips are unclean, and I dwell among an unclean people." Then, swift as lightning flew a seraph, bringing a coal more burning than himself from off the altar of sacrifice, wherewith He touched the prophet's lip. Beloved, this is WHAT WE NEED.

We need to feel the atonement laid home to us, to feel the power of the great sacrifice of Christ, to hear a voice saying within our spirit, "Thine iniquity is put away, and thy sin is purged." Brother, if you are to proclaim the glory of your Lord, you must feel the sacrificial coal applied to the place where your impurity is most seen, even to your lips; you must know that you are forgiven; for your conviction that you are clean before God will give you confidence in telling out to others the story of the cross. This is what Isaias saw.

Listen for a minute to that further word that follows: Isaias when he saw His glory "spoke of Him." He that hath seen this sight must speak. He spake in deep humility. Never braver man than Isaias, but never one who walked in lowlier reverence before his God. He never forgot to his dying day that "Woe is me! for I have seen the king, the Lord of hosts." Yet, observe that he spake with very willing obedience. "Here am I," he said, "send me." He offers himself to be God's mouth to the people, whatever the message may be. He seems to say, "Here am I in the entirety of my being, purchased to thee by Thy great pardoning love; use me as Thou wilt, and send me where Thou wilt." He continued to report his Lord's message under constant rebuffs, and despite the ceaseless obduracy of Israel. Though he cried, "Who hath believed our report?" yet he continued that report. That chapter which begins with his complaint, has in it not only a continuation of the report, but a fuller version of it than he had ever given before. He was sad but resolute, grieved yet persevering, broken in heart, but not broken down in constancy. Brethren, it needs great grace to go upon a fruitless errand. One had need see the glory of the Lord to be enabled to fight a losing battle. I am sometimes afraid that I have to do this myself; but if it be so, it is not ours to bargain for success, but to yield implicit obedience.

II. I now ask your kind attention to the second part of my subject, which is a very painful one, concerning to which Isaias spake. Their terrible sin lay in this, that they were willingly blinded by the light which ought to have been to them a help to see Christ, and they were hardened by those very truths which ought to have melted them. They became more and more adverse to Christ through beholding in Him such a character as ought to have won their hearts. To the prophet's teaching they were entirely dead.

They went on from bad to worse as a nation; they turned aside grievously from God, and when they appeared to cleave to Him it was in name only, but not in heart, so that when Christ came they were unable to discern Him, for had they known Him they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. This blindness was in part a punishment for their long rebellion. If men willfully shut their eyes, do you wonder that they become blind? If men will not hear, do you wonder that they grow deaf? If men will not understand, do you wonder that they become stupid? He that perverts truth shall soon be incapable of knowing the true from the false. If you persist in wearing glasses that distort, everything will be distorted to you.

"Hear the just law, the judgment of the skies!"

He that hates truth shall be the dupe of lies."

But although this blindness was a punishment for former sin, it was itself a sin. They willfully rejected the testimony of God against themselves; they refused the self-evident Christ who would so greatly have blessed them. This wilful rejection was carried out so effectually that it became impossible to convert and heal them; they could not be instructed, or reformed, and therefore they were given over to destruction. Nothing remained but to allow the Romans to burn the temple and plough the site of the city. It was a dreadful thing that they should deliberately choose destruction, and obstinately involve themselves in the most tremendous of woes.

THE PARALLEL.

What I have to say this morning is this—that I am growingly fearful lest our own country should furnish a parallel to all this. Read the story of England, beginning where you will, and see how gracious God has been to us. Note well our great deliverances, from the destruction of the Spanish Armada to the overthrow of Napoleon. Do not forget how often this little country has been made victorious in wars against great peoples, who thought to swallow her up. Then reflect how God sent the light to us; how the Gospel spread all over England, and how it has in many ways been rejected. How often since the days of Cromwell Rome has been allowed to dim the light of our Protestantism, and how it labors to do so still! See how this people have received the truth of heaven, but again and again have proved false to it, turning at one time to superstition and at another time to infidelity. At this moment we are rich, and despite depression in business, we are less tried by it than any other nation.

And what comes of all this mercy but increased sin? Why, at this moment we have sin rampant among us almost beyond precedent. Think how the poor are oppressed and ground down with awful poverty in many parts of this great city. Shall not God answer the cry of starving women? Worse still, if worse can be; those who dare walk our streets after sundown tell us that Sodom, in its most putrid days, could scarce exceed this metropolis for open vice. To our infinite disgust and horror, the names of certain of the greatest in the land are at this hour openly mentioned in connection with the filthiest debauchery. This is not the place for details, nor can I mention the matter, or even think of it without feeling my very soul on fire.

VICE IN HIGH PLACES.

Faithfulness requires plain speech; but it is a hideous evil that the dregs of vice should be the chosen luxury of certain of our hereditary legislators and rulers. Woe unto thee, Oh land, when thy great ones love the harlot's house! Deep is our shame when we know that our judges are not clear in this matter, but social purity has been put to the blush by magistrates of no mean degree; yea, it is said that the courts of justice have lent themselves to the covering and hushing up of the iniquities of the great. Shall not God be grieved by such a nation as this? He who has read a certain story, which is but too-well known, must have felt his ears tingle and his heart tremble. What is coming over us? What horrible clouds are darkening our skies? There were judges once who would not have suffered the laws to be trampled on by the great, but would have dealt out equal justice to rich and poor; I cannot persuade myself that it will be otherwise now, and yet I fear the worst. O God, have mercy upon the land whose judgment-seats and palaces are defiled with vice.

This is not all; a general indifference to all religion is creeping over the country; at least over this vast metropolis. Ask those who visit from door to door among our crowded populations, and they will tell you that never before in their lifetime were there so few persons attendant upon the means of grace. Street after street of this city scarcely possesses more than one regular attendant upon the preaching of the word. The Sabbath is no longer a day of worship with millions. What continual efforts are made to rob us of the Sabbath-day; to degrade it into a common work-day, and to make a slave of the workingman.

SPIRITUAL TRAITORS.

To-day the revelation of God is treated with indifference, or talked of as if it deserved no reverence or credit. Unbelief has sapped the foundations of the social fabric. Worst of all—I must not hold back the charge, many of the avowed ministers of Christ are no ministers of faith at all, but promoters of unbelief. The modern pulpit has taught men to be infidels. What truth is there which has not been doubted by divines, questioned by doctors of divinity, and at length been denounced by the priests of "modern thought"? Nothing remains upon which a certain school of preachers have not spit their scepticism. The experience of the unbelief of Germany is being repeated here. Among those who are ordained to be the preachers of the Gospel of Christ, there are many who preach not faith but doubt, and hence they are servants of the devil rather than of the Lord.

Think not that I am aiming at the Church of England.* With all my objection to a State-church, I am not so unjust as to conceal my belief that I see in the Episcopal Church at this time less of unbelief than among certain dissenters; in fact, Nonconformity in certain quarters is eaten through and through with a covert Unitarianism, less tolerable than Unitarianism itself. So frequently are the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel assailed, that it becomes needful, before you cross the threshold of many a chapel, to ask the question, "Shall I hear the Gospel here to-day, or shall I come out hardly knowing whether the Bible is inspired or not? Shall I not be made to doubt the atonement, the work of the Holy Ghost, the immortality of the soul, the punishment of the wicked, or the deity of Christ?" I know by these honest rebukes, but I cannot help it. I am burdened and distressed with the state of religion; a pest is in the air; no truth is safe from its withering infection. No signs can be more alarming than the growing infidelity and worldliness which I see among those who call themselves Christians. Does this nation really intend to cast off the fear of God and the doctrines of Holy Scripture to follow the vain imaginings of the sophists and the fashionable follies of the great? Are we to see again unbelief and luxurious sin walking hand-in-hand? If so, there be some of us who mean to take up our sorrowful parable, and speak as plainly as we can for truth and holiness, whether we offend or please.

Be it ours still to thunder out the law of God, and proclaim with trumpet clearness the Gospel of Jesus, not bating one jot of firm belief in the revelation of God, nor winking at sin, nor toning down truth, even though we fear that the only result will be to make this people's hearts gross, and their ears heavy, and their eyes blind. If it must be so, my soul shall weep in secret; but still, oh Lord, here am I, send me.

Hearken yet again while I press this subject personally home to you. Has not this word a personal bearing upon some of you? Certain of you have heard the Gospel preached plainly and honestly, and yet you have never received it; is there not creeping over you a fatal indifference? Are not your hearts turning to stone? Possibly you are professors of religion, and yet you do not feel the power of it; what does this mean? If you are not a praying people, nor a holy people, and yet are a professing people, what an awful doom awaits you! May God in infinite mercy speak to you that you may believe in Jesus now, lest that should come upon you which is spoken of by the prophet, "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish!"

THE HOLY TITHES.

Ere I have done, hear the sweet whisper which closes the sixth of Isaiah. Notwithstanding all the terrible work that Isaiah had to do he was not left without comfort; the Lord said to him, "In it there shall be a tenth." You know how the prophet cried, "Except the Lord of hosts had left us a seed we had been as Sodom, and been made like unto Gomorrah." The Lord has His sacred tithes and these He will not lose. The tree has lost its leaves, for it is winter time; but still it is alive, and the sap will flow again, for its substance is in it!

Behold, He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him. Reject Christ if you will to-day, oh ye who think yourselves so exceeding wise, but there is a people who love Him, a secret people who cling to Him; and when He comes, as come He must ere long, they will welcome Him and partake in His glory. As for you that refuse Him this day, how will you stand when He appeareth? Whither will you flee? You shall ask the hills to cover you, but they will refuse. You shall bid the mountains hide you, but they will not yield a cavern for your shelter. Be wise now, therefore, and no more resist your Lord. "Kiss the Son lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way while His wrath is kindled, but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him!" May you and I and all of us be of that blessed number. Amen and Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

"THE DAYS OF MIRACLES NOT PAST,"

by the Rev. William Doss. In the twenty chapters of which this little work consists, the great question which is now engaging the attention of evangelical Christians, is argued with much force and modesty. Is it possible that to men and women of strong faith—with faith such as Christ described (Luke 17:6), which though only like a grain of mustard-seed, would cause a tree to be removed—is it possible that to such believers God will answer by miracle? That question Mr. Doss considers in all its bearings, showing what faith does for the soul; how the man who believes God, who takes Him at His Word, and expects that He will assuredly fulfil it, is transformed in heart and life. He shows how it operates in temporal affairs, as in the case of George Müller and others, and having proved beyond the possibility of contradiction, by facts which are open to the investigation of every one, that God has honored every draft made in the right spirit on the bank of faith, he naturally asks why we should draw the line where the Christian Church does draw it. God's power being unlimited, there is no reason when the object is for His glory and unalloyed with selfish motives or any desire for self-advancement, why Christian men should limit their requests by the boundaries of human possibility. In short, that God is ready now, as in past ages, to answer the believer's prayer by miracle as He answered Elijah centuries ago on Mount Carmel. Mr. Doss does not apply the question; he leaves that for his readers to do. But he is concerned to establish the principle that faith is now in its power what it was in the ages of the prophets and apostles, and that like faith, will bring like results. He gives several remarkable illustrations, showing that for many years the Church has been on the borderland of miracle, and that believing prayer has been answered over and over again, when to all human sense it seemed impossible that it should be answered. The capacity of the power the believer has in his hands is as Mr. Doss shows illimitable; it is for those who possess it to think how it may be applied. It is a most stimulating thoughtful work which deserves a wide circulation. Pp. 119. Price in paper covers, 35 cents; in cloth, 50 cents. "THE ERRORS OF EVOLUTION," by Robert Patterson. The theories of the evolutionists: The Nebular Theory, Geological Evolution, The Origin of Life, and Darwinism are successively examined here with the view of proving that the whole evolution system is "scientific superstition." The author contends that the system "is not founded on facts," that "its premises do not warrant the conclusions drawn from them;" and that "the theory is unfounded, absurd, and degrading."

The author is very much in earnest, and does not underestimate the difficulties of his task. We do not think his arguments would convert an evolutionist, but they may prevent young people who have become dazzled by the brilliant theories of Darwin, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and others, from embracing evolution doctrines. They may also be useful to Christians, young and old, who are sore under the taunts often flung at them that, if they knew more of science they would believe less of the Bible. Pp. 271. SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

AN interesting ceremony was witnessed on May 7th, when the Hon. James Russell Lowell, standing in Poet's Corner, Westminster Abbey, in the presence of a large assemblage of Americans and Englishmen, unveiled the bust of the poet Coleridge, placed there by the munificence of the late Dr. Mercer, of Newport, R. I. It was, as Mr. Lowell remarked, a significant sign of the consciousness of the two nations, that "we hold our intellectual property in common." It is fifty-one years since Coleridge died, and in the great Abbey where memorials of so many men of genius are placed, no monument was raised to this great poet and thinker until American gratitude supplied the omission. The bust stands there now appropriately in the vicinity of the effigies of Campbell and Southey, and only a few feet from those of Shakespeare and Burns. Our illustration shows the bust itself and its surroundings.

Coleridge was the son of a clergyman, and was born October 21st, 1772. He was educated at the Blue Coat School in London, and was sent to Cambridge University. After spending two years there, he left the place suddenly and enlisted as a common soldier in a cavalry regiment. At the end of four months he was glad to be released through the payment of a considerable sum of money by his family, and soon afterward, when still without income, he fell in love and married. He had written a few poems, which were published in 1796, the year after his marriage, and the following year he published another volume, the joint production of Lamb, Lloyd, and himself. In 1798 the "Lyrical Ballads" were published, and then the well-known poem of the "Ancient Mariner," which was contained in that volume, attracted public attention. He obtained journalistic work, and also produced The Fall of Robespierre, an historical drama, and Remorse, a tragedy, which was performed at Drury Lane Theatre. It was in 1816, when opium was fastening its fatal hold upon him, that he published "Christabel," the most musical of all his works. He shortly afterward went to reside with his friends, the Gillmans, at Highgate, who reverently and tenderly cared for him until he died in 1834. Probably the greatest service he rendered to his generation was that he performed during his retirement at Highgate. Frederick Dennison Maurice, John Sterling, Edward Irving, Talfourd and others came under his influence, and were held spell-bound under his brilliant conversational power. His abhorrence of atheism and materialism had its weight with them, and if it did no more, held them back from the fatal whirlpool. His negative influence in that direction was altogether beneficial, though of positive teaching he could give little. It is doubtful whether Coleridge himself knew what he believed, and it is very certain that no one else could learn it from him; but he was very clear that atheism was a deadly error, and at that time that truth was the one which the young men at Coleridge's feet most needed to be assured of.

Mr. Lowell, in unveiling his bust the other day, very aptly spoke of him as "the most striking example in literature of a great genius, given in trust to a nerveless will and a fitful purpose." Such Coleridge was—very learned, very brilliant, but utterly without aim and without energy to pursue an aim if he had one. That with his genius he might have accomplished much, every one who has read his works must realize; and while we regret that he accomplished so little, it is better that, as Mr. Lowell tenderly said, we do not "consider what he owed to himself, his family, or the world, but rather what we owe to him." For that we are grateful, and are glad that this tribute of homage to him comes from a countryman of our own.

THE SAILOR BOY'S FRIEND.

"COME below, boy, I want a word with you," said a wiry old seaman to a lad of about fifteen years of age, whose clean, fresh-looking uniform showed that he had but recently entered on a seafaring life. The boy followed the old sailor below deck, and stood waiting to hear what would be said to him, as the old man leisurely seated himself. "This is your first voyage, isn't it?"

"I never went to sea before," said the lad, "but I've had a year on shipboard on a lake steamer."

"Ah! you'll find this a different thing. Got a father and mother?"

"No," said the boy; "my father's dead. I've a mother and sister."

"Didn't your mother give you a Bible?"

"Oh, yes. It's in my locker."

"I'd like to see it, my boy."

The lad ran away, and in a few minutes returned with the book, which he handed to the old man.

"Ah! 'from his dear mother, who is praying for him.' Don't forget those words, my boy. I'll be bound her eyes were wet when she wrote them. I've faith in boys with praying mothers. Now, I dare say you wonder why I am asking you all these questions. Well, I'll tell you. Long before you were born—it's five and thirty years ago now—I had a mother praying for me. She loved me as a mother does love her only son. But I was a bad lad, and I believe I broke her heart. I was a wild, reckless lad, and never wrote to her when I was away, and never went to see her when I was ashore. Drink and pleasure as long as the money lasted, and then to sea again. My boy, that mother died praying for me. I had a letter from her minister one day when I got to New York, saying that she was dead, and that her last words were, 'Lord, have mercy on my dear boy. Dear Lord, save my precious boy.' She was dead, and I'd never shown her a single kindness. The Lord did save me soon after that, but she never knew. I've been to her grave, and I've thought when I stood there I'd give my life if I could only see her for five minutes to tell her how sorry I am for all my neglect of her, and that her prayers are answered now. But I can't tell her, and she died without knowing. Well, I thought, perhaps I can do something she'd like; so now if I see a boy just beginning sea life, I try to help him to begin right. I cannot make my mother glad, but perhaps I can do something for another mother. Now, I'm going to stand by you. There'll be plenty for you to bear when the men and boys see you read your Bible; but just you remember you've got a friend aboard, and bear it like a man. They all know me, and they wouldn't hurt you. They may laugh and fool with you, but they won't do you harm. Don't be down-hearted and don't give up your colors. I'll pray for you, too."

"Thank you," said the lad, quietly, but evidently under strong emotion; "I won't forget."

The old man was as good as his word. The fatherless boy was encouraged and watched and protected, and found the path smoothed for him in a hundred ways. Many a time, at his old friend's invitation, he brought his Bible and read aloud to him, and the two prayed together. They talked of the Saviour, and the boy's book knowledge was exchanged for the sailor's heart knowledge, and they were mutually helpful. At the end of the voyage the old man carried the boy off out of the temptations of the seaport, and took him to his mother. He needed no reward for the kindness which, as he had told the boy, sprang from his own remorse; but the widow overwhelmed him with gratitude, and into his lonely life there came the tender, elevating influence of a Christian woman's affection.

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

Lurid Clouds.

My little sister Sylvie and I were living at the beginning of 1870 in the quaint old city of Strasburg. We had gone there two years before, to live with our father's mother. It was all very strange to us, for we knew very little of the language, and the houses and the streets and all things around us were unfamiliar. It was like a new world to Sylvie and me, but after two years we were getting to feel at home in it, and had some friends there.

The way we came to be there was this. My father was born in Strasburg, and was very learned and clever, and he travelled about a great deal. About twenty years before, he went to England to lecture before a learned society, and, being well received, and becoming popular, he remained there for some time, and was a professor in a university. He met my mother, a blooming young English lady, and fell in love with her. She admired the brilliant young Dr. Kromer, and, as they became acquainted, she grew to love him dearly, and after a time they were married. I have seen many homes since that in different parts of the world, but I have never seen one that was so thoroughly happy as that one in which I was born. I was only fourteen when it was broken up, but I shall never forget its peace, and calm, and joy. My mother's refined, gentle nature would have made any place beautiful to live in if she ruled in it. My father was not grave with all his learning. He was as merry as a schoolboy when he came home, and would romp and play with me as if our games were the most serious business in life. I have seen grave, dignified men stand staring in amazement when they came to our house to consult the great Dr. Kromer about some profound scientific subject, and were asked to wait a few minutes till our game of marbles was finished. Then my father was the learned Dr. Kromer again, and while he was answering his visitors' questions, I could see how they wondered at his inexhaustible store of knowledge.

The Sailor's Compact.

But, as I have intimated, this happiness came to an end. My dear mother was taken ill suddenly, and died. I have never seen grief like that of my father. He was crushed. He seemed to grow old in a day. He moved about the house like a man in a dream. But after a few weeks there was a struggle, and he tried to resume the duties of his profession. But it was of no use, he could not bear the scenes that reminded him of his loss, and he gladly accepted an invitation to join an expedition up the Nile, hoping that in new surroundings he would recover his energy. Sylvie and I were his difficulty. He could not leave us alone among strangers, and yet he could not stay. At last an invitation came for us from our grandmother, my father's mother, who lived in Strasburg, and as there was an excellent Protestant Lyceum there where I could study, and a good school for Sylvie, it was settled that we should go until the expedition returned.

So we came to live at Strasburg. Our grandmother's house stood at a corner where four streets met. It was very ancient; built of immense black beams of timber from the Black Forest, with the spaces filled up with stone or brick. It was four stories high, besides the roof, which was very steep, like most of the houses about it, and with no less than three stories of attics in it. The very topmost was in the highest and steepest pitch of the roof, and in shape was something like a long, narrow tent; but nobody lived in it, for it was intensely hot in summer, and bitterly cold in winter.

In the two rooms below lived Lisbeth Bernhard, and Elsie, her little girl. She gained her living by ironing; and to my thinking, her attic was the pleasantest place in the house, though my grandmother always shook her head about the number of steps to climb up to it. There was something worth climbing for, I said. The casement was almost as wide as the room, and reached up to the ceiling, which was not more than six feet six inches high, so that I could easily touch it with my hand. But from the window, which caught all the earliest and latest light from the sky—the day lingering up there long after it was dark in the narrow street below—from the window, I say, you could see all down the broad valley of the Rhine, stretching southward, with the Vosges Mountains bounding it on the one hand, and the Baden hills on the other, with the wide, blue River Rhine winding along down toward the city, and flowing past it about a mile away.

Besides this, all the streets lay below you, like a map; and by leaning through the casement you could catch a sight of the citadel, which stood about half-way between the city and the river, beside other things well worth seeing. Near by were the pointed roofs of neighboring houses, with their queer attic windows row above row, and there were churches, and, above all, the tall spire of the famous cathedral, with its iron cross twenty feet high, towering up to the clouds, and the deep-cut, fine stone carving showing like delicate lace against the blue sky.

In the attic underneath Lisbeth's lived an old bed-ridden man, whom she waited on, and cooked for; but whom we never saw, as I will tell you afterward.

My grandmother was quite as pleased with her share of the house, as I was with Lisbeth's. She rented the second and third floors, which had windows opening upon beautiful balconies overlooking the street; pleasant places to spend the cool of the day in, on a summer's evening, when all the citizens strolled up and down the pavements, or when the soldiers of the garrison marched through with banners and music.

Gretchen, my grandmother's servant, kept the balustrades of the balconies as bright and polished as the handsome furniture within; for both she and her mistress were proud of the house, and all belonging to it.

My grandmother had lived there ever since she was married, and she thought there was no place on earth to compare with it. She and Gretchen were always seeking for some spot of dust or dirt to remove from it, though everything was in the greatest order. At first, Sylvie and I were often slipping upon the polished floors; and I could never bear to sit down on the white covers of the chairs in the salon. That was another reason why I enjoyed Lisbeth's attic so much. When my father left us, he told me I was to take his place, and be a son and protector to my grandmother; which at once made me feel older, and more like a man, than I had ever done before. She used also to talk to me as if I were grown up, and I need not tell you that was the very way to make me begin to put away childish things, as St. Paul says.

Of course, it is well known—only I never learned it from books, as I did from seeing the place—that Strasburg, though it is in France, is close upon Germany, with nothing but the Rhine between. Here were we, French citizens, with a French garrison and a French governor, while only a mile or so away was Germany. We spoke German, too, and we had dear friends on the other side of the river—friends who were in the habit of coming to visit the people of Strasburg, and whom they visited in return. There was no enmity between us, any more than between the English and the Scotch, who live close and good neighbors on the border, with only a line on the map to separate them.

That was how we were living together, up to the middle of July, last year. I suppose the emperor and the king, and their statesmen, knew that there was mischief brewing; but none of the citizens of Strasburg knew. Only the week before, the markets were as full as ever of German farmers and peasants, buying and selling, and bringing kindly little gifts. Sylvie and I had an invitation to pay a visit to a German country house, as soon as the vintage began.

It was on St. Swithin's Day that the emperor declared war against Prussia. Most of us were thinking of nothing more serious, than whether it would rain for St. Swithin's, and so foretell a wet harvest for forty days; little guessing what those forty days and more would be for us all. It was like an electric shock running through the whole city, when the news came. There were we behind our walls, foremost among the fortresses of France, in the very front of the coming tempest. Through our gates would march thousands upon thousands of the grand army, who were now shouting in Paris, "To Berlin! To Berlin!"

It was a grand time; all the city was astir, and the garrison was full of life. Only, here and there, a few old people shook their heads sadly and despondently enough. When they heard us say that the French would be in Berlin at the end of the month, these old people muttered sometimes, "The good God, He alone knows." The railway bridge across the Rhine had been built in such a way that each end would turn upon a pivot; so that with only a few hours' work the communication could be quite cut off between Strasburg and Kehl, a little German town on the other side of the river. The Germans turned their portion of the bridge at once; but they were not satisfied with this precaution as a measure of safety. We said in Strasburg, that they thought how easily the French could swing it back to its place, as soon as they got possession of Kehl; so they made up their minds it would be safest to blow it up altogether, though it had cost them a lot of money, and would cost as much to rebuild it.

I was sitting at home in the salon, preparing my studies for the next morning, when we heard a tremendous din and reverberation in the air. We sat stock-still, staring at each other for more than a minute; but a second roar of thunder made us fly. Sylvie and me, up the long flight of steps to Lisbeth Bernhard's attic.

I see it all this moment just as it looked then; though we scarcely paused for an instant before rushing in. The door was open, and Lisbeth was sitting at her ironing-table, but the cap she had held in her hands had fallen to the ground, and she sat like a statue of stone, as white and rigid, staring out through the open window as though she saw something exceedingly terrible. The child Elsie, a pale, delicate, pretty little creature about five years old, sat upon the low window-sill, with a close white cap on, giving her an old-fashioned look, only a fine fringe of curling golden hair hung from under it on her neck, and round her face. There was nothing to be seen beyond her save the deep blue sky, and her little head and face seemed to stand out with strange clearness against it. She was knitting away as quietly as if she had heard no noise, and the sun shone upon the white wool and steel needles in her tiny hands.

"What is the matter, Lisbeth?" cried Sylvie; while I pushed on to the window, and leaned out as far as I could reach, to see what was going on. There it lay in the July sunshine; the broad river, with its queer water-mills and bathing-places, both shores crowded as thick as bees with people pressing upon each other to see the sight. Time after time came the fine white cloud, and then the loud noise of powder exploding; and fresh portions of the bridge fell into the troubled waters. Before long the last bit of the masonry crashed down into the river.

"They've blown up their bridge!" I shouted. "The Germans know we shall conquer. Hurrah! hurrah!"

Neither Lisbeth nor Sylvie answered me a word. Lisbeth drew a long breath from time to time, and sat with her lips parted as if she could scarcely breathe; and Sylvie leaned against her, looking frightened and pale. At last some large tears rolled down Lisbeth's cheeks, and fell upon her ironing-table.

"They are dear friends of mine, some of them," she said, "and I cannot bear to think of there being war among them."

"Either they must be conquered, or we," I said.

"I suppose so," she answered; "but I should like to know why the emperor and the king could not go to law about their quarrels, as they make us poor folks do. They will not let us settle our disputes by fighting; and I ask you, Max, which is worse—for two men to fight, or two hundred thousands?"

"Oh, Lisbeth!" I said, "you do not understand the question at all. War brings glory!"

"Ah!" she answered, sighing, "but not the glory the angels sang, when the dear Lord Christ was born. Then it was glory to God, and peace on earth."

I did not know what to reply to that; so I held my tongue.

"It is no glorious thing for the poor," went on Lisbeth; "if there should be a siege, which God forbid! either in France or Germany, we poor will die by hundreds and thousands. The last war was no glory for the poor, nor will this one be, you will see, Herr Max."

"Why, you don't remember any great war," I said.

"No," she answered, "but my father was in Pfalzburg when it was besieged by the Cossacks in 1813, and he would tell you, if he was still alive, what war means to the poor, and to women and children, Max. There are not many people to whom it brings glory!"

I pretended not to hear, and put my head out of the window again to see the bridge, which showed a great gap now on the German side. Sylvie had stolen her arm about Lisbeth's neck, while Elsie went on knitting as if she had to get her living by it.

"What is Elsie doing?" asked Sylvie in a little while; and I drew in my head, for I was tired of leaning out, only I did not want Lisbeth to go on about the war.

The little creature looked up for a moment with her blue eyes, and a smile on her face, which I thought would break into a merry laugh, but it passed away into a grave look of importance.

"I am making a birthday present," she said, shyly.

"Whoever for?" asked Sylvie again.

The child hesitated for a minute, and then she said, in a very soft, low voice, "For the dear Lord Christ!"

"For the Lord Christ!" repeated Sylvie, while I felt a strange sort of feeling creep over me, as if it was almost an awful thing to say and hear.

"Yes," added Lisbeth. "Elsie was born on Christmas Day, the same day as the dear child Jesus, our Lord Christ. Last Christmas she asked me were the little children in heaven giving birthday presents to Him; and I said I was not sure, but perhaps they were. So she has been learning to knit all this year; and now she is knitting Him a warm white vest against next Christmas."

She had said all this aloud, in her clear, pleasant voice; and Elsie nodded her little head. But Lisbeth said in a much lower tone, only for Sylvie and me to hear: "She thinks somehow of Him as if He was only a young child like herself, born on the same day—only living in heaven, while she is down here in Strasburg; and in her childish way she tries to be like Him."

"The days are long and light now," said Elsie, as gravely as an old woman, "and it will not get soiled if I knit it in the sunshine. When it is quite, quite finished, we shall wrap it in some silver paper, and take care of it till His birthday; and then it will be as white as the snow on the hills. See how clean my hands are, and my frock!"

She opened her small, rosy hands for us to look at; and then she went on with her knitting, very slowly, stitch by stitch.

"But she cannot give it to Jesus Christ," said Sylvie, in a loud whisper, before I could put my hand over her mouth to stop her.

"Hush! hush!" whispered Lisbeth; "you can't think how quiet and content it keeps the child! And the Lord Christ will not be displeased with her, will He, Max? It is still a long time till Christmas, and perhaps she will be old enough and wise enough then to have it explained to her. My little Elsie loves her work," she went on, in a louder voice.

"And He knows Elsie is doing it!" said the child, with a very sweet smile all over her happy face.

"Yes, yes," answered Lisbeth; "He is watching every stitch, and knows it is all being done for Him. And He is sure to take care of Elsie and me all through the dreadful noise of the war. Elsie is His little sister, and He is sure to take care of her. We will not be frightened, will we, Elsie?"

"No, never!" said the child, looking up from her long task, and speaking in a very trustful voice. I felt so silent that I could not have spoken for the life of me, and after a while Lisbeth said again, in an undertone:

"She looks to me almost like a little angel, sitting so still there in the window. If ever she is the least bit naughty, I have only to tell her that the Holy Child Jesus is never like that. I think I am nearly as happy a Mary herself was when He was really only a young child."

These were such odd things for a woman to be saying, that still I did not know what or how to answer her. But Sylvie was not so shy.

"Oh, Lisbeth!" she said, "why do you call Elsie His little sister?"

"Is He not the brother of us all?" she said, gently. "He said Himself that if any one would do the will of God, the same was His brother, or His mother, or sister. And is not Elsie doing the will of God, when she tries to be like the child Jesus in heaven? If men only knew what it was to think of Him as their Master, and all men as their brethren, there could not be any more war in the land."

I was puzzled, but Sylvie, who was still only a child, seemed tired of such talk, and in a minute or two she said, quite in an ordinary, everyday tone:

"Oh, Lisbeth, to-morrow Max and some of his school-fellows are going to have a battle on the ramparts! Some of them are to be Prussians, come to storm Strasburg, you know; and the rest will be French, and beat them all back again, or take them prisoners. I hope Max will be chosen general! General Max sounds so! And grandmamma says Gretchen may go, and take me. Oh, I wish you would let little Elsie go with us!"

"We shall see," answered Lisbeth.

IDOLATRY ESTABLISHED.

S. S. Lesson for July 12, 1 Kings 12:25-33; 13. Golden Text, Ps. 106:36. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jeroboam's Difficulty—His People's Allegiance in Peril—His Plan to Secure It—Religion Provided at Home—Supported by the Government—The King Officiating—A Warning from God—The Messenger Scorned—The King's Hand Arrested—Forced to Seek God's Help—Royal Hospitality Rejected—An Invitation from a Prophet—Disobedience and Punishment.

Jeroboam was made king, and he built cities to strengthen himself; he might have owned to some faith in God, but he had far more faith in himself. A difficulty arose in his kingdom: God had commanded, "Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord thy God" (Ex. 23:17). "Unto the place which the Lord shall choose out of all your tribes to put His name there, even unto His habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come" (Deut. 12:5). Jeroboam began to feel that his interests clashed with those of God, a time of crisis must come, when he must either yield to God or openly rebel against Him. The rebellion began where it usually does, within. "Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David: If this people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, then shall the heart of this people turn again unto their lord, even unto Rehoboam King of Judah, and they shall kill me, and go again to Rehoboam King of Judah." What was become of the promise of God? Did he count the words of the Lord for "sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal"? A distinct promise had been made him of God that He would be with him, and build him a sure house, on the one condition that he would hearken to God and obey Him. But the king neither believed in the promise, nor fulfilled its conditions. He acted as though God were not in any way an interested party, and as though only his relations to Rehoboam were to be considered. Oh, how often, how almost universally men act thus.

LEAVING GOD OUT OF THE RECKONING, until some terrible trial forces them to cry unto Him! The king took counsel (not of God), and made two calves of gold and set them up, one in Bethel, on the frontier of Judah, and one in Dan, on the frontier of Syria. He then made a proclamation ostensibly full of regard for his people's welfare, concealing his own interested and sinful policy. "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." Then he went further—made priests of the lowest of the people, himself sacrificed to the golden calves, and ordained a feast to supply the place of those ordained of God, "in the month which he had devised of his own heart." Man-made religion is a miserable substitute for real communion with God, forms and ceremonies can never fill the void in a hungry soul.

King Jeroboam seemed at this time to carry all before him, he was the great man, and in the eyes of most of his people, God Himself was not practically greater, for they had to do with the king but not with God. God, however, did not ignore Jeroboam. His heart years after the most rebellious. "There came a man of God out of Judah, by the Word of the Lord unto Bethel: and Jeroboam stood by the altar to burn incense. And he cried against the altar in the Word of the Lord, and said: O altar, altar, thus saith the Lord; Behold, a child shall be born unto the house of David, Josiah by name; and upon thee shall he offer the priests of the high places that burn incense upon thee, and men's bones shall be burned upon thee." All this was fulfilled in the reign of Josiah (1 Kings 23:15-17). A prophecy of judgment, the execution of which might be far future, was not likely to have much effect on a man like Jeroboam. He would say, "The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are far off" (Ezek. 12:27). But God who spoke through His servant, was present, and the prophet gave a sign saying: "This is the sign which the Lord hath spoken; Behold, the altar shall be rent, and the ashes that are upon it shall be poured out."

The king, who was so openly at war with God, was not likely to deal gently with His faithful servant. He put forth his hand from the altar, and issued the command, "Lay hold of him." But the God whom he despised held absolute command over both his life and being, and that of the man who opposed him. The hand with which he intended to seize the man of God "dried up," so that he could not pull it in to him again. There he stood, a sorry witness of his own cause, a striking witness against himself of the presence of God. The same power which struck him with paralysis, rent the altar, and poured out the ashes. Whose was the invisible hand which did the work? The king knew, and to the humbling of his haughty spirit, instead of calling the state physicians to his aid, he was forced to ask help of God. In the presence of his body-guard, and of many whom he had led into idolatry, he was so pressed by his helpless, ludicrous position, that he said to the man of God, "Entreat now the face of the Lord thy God, and pray for me that my hand may be restored to me again." Why did he not go to the golden calves? Why did he not seek some of the priests whom he had made? It is not state patronage that gives power with the living God, and Jeroboam found it so. Oh, how full of grace is our God! Truly as the king deserved the chastisements, yet when he turned to God, even through another, the ear of God was open to his cry, and his hand was restored. Alas! even this merciful approach of God to him did not succeed in drawing him away from sin and self; "After this thing, Jeroboam returned not from his evil way."

But he was quite inclined to make much of God's instrument. Far from desiring now to take the life of the man of God, the king said: "Come home with me, and refresh thyself, and I will give thee a reward." Big people like to and somehow while receiving favors at their hands, God's children are not so free as at other times. When God leads us distinctly into the houses of the great, we need to be very specially under the close direction of the Holy Spirit, that we may serve God's purpose there. But the man of God had no word from above to bid him accept the king's hospitality. "If thou wilt give me half thine house, I will not go in with thee, neither will I eat bread, nor drink water in this place; for so it was charged me by the Word of the Lord. It was the place of witness for idolatry, no place for a man of God to be at home.

Every child of God, and especially such as He uses in His direct work with souls, must be exercised in faith by continuous trial. The man of God had come out of his encounter with Jeroboam with flying colors; faithfully and well had he executed his mission. But, after leaving the king, he sat down under an oak, still in the neighborhood of Bethel, to rest. God does not deny rest to His weary children, but He likes to choose for us our times of rest as well our times of service. An old prophet who had heard the report of his testimony against the king, of the rending of the altar, of the withering and subsequent healing of the king's hand, and of the royal invitation so decidedly refused, sent his sons to overtake the man of God and bring him back to him. But how should he induce a man so firm and strong in his principles to disobey his God, and to eat bread, and drink water at Bethel? Satan was at hand, and suggested that he should send him a lying message, purporting to be from God, that he was commanded to bring him back.

Oh, how often Satan, as an angel of light, speaks through those who have been a long time Christians! How often young, ardent, devoted spirits are led astray by succumbing to the influence of such as should be more acquainted with God than themselves! How often has their veneration for prominent Christians come between them and God! True men of God would be the last to lay claim to infallibility, and they are not to blame if men persist in putting them in the place of God. The old prophet of Bethel assumed to himself an infallibility in the way of guidance which should render null and void God's direct command to the man of God.

"TRY THE SPIRITS

whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world" (1 John 4:1). The leading of God can never be contrary to His own Word, the Spirit of God always sets forth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh.

The man of God fell into the snare which was laid for him, went back, and accepted hospitality at the hands of the old prophet, so disobeying the Word of the Lord to himself. We are never responsible for other people's guidance, but we are responsible for what the Lord says unto us. It was a false step. As they sat at table, a real message from God came to the old prophet against the man of God, exposing his own guilty duplicity. "Thus saith the Lord, Forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord, and hast not kept the commandment of which the Lord thy God commanded thee, but camest back, and hast eaten bread, and drunk water in the place of which the Lord said unto thee, Eat no bread and drink no water; thy carcass shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers." It was to the man of God, that the prophet who had deceived him should lend him his ass wherewith to make his journey. It did not save him from the judgment of God, for a lion met him and slew him. Yet God did not allow His servant to be the lion's prey, He withheld the savage beast, and the passengers who went that way brought the news to the old prophet how they had found the slain man, with the lion and the ass standing by, as though both were guardians of the body. Then the old prophet sent his sons to bring the carcass, and he had it carefully buried, leaving directions with his son, that at his death he should share the same sepulchre in token that he believed God would fulfil His predictions.

Idolatry continued to increase. How it might have been had these two prophets laid hold of God as Elijah did afterward, we know not, but this we know, that men of faith "subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens" (Heb. 11:33, 34). Satan cannot have it all his own way when men believe in the living God.

CONSECRATION.

H. W. BROWN.

Now ye have consecrated yourselves unto the Lord, come near and bring sacrifices and thank offerings into the house of the Lord.—1. Chron. 29:31.

Are you willing, wholly willing,
Just the little things to do,
Caring more to please the Master,
Than for what men may say of you?

Are you sure you are not able
Just a falling prayer to raise,
Choosing not your will and pleasure,
Of your Saviour it will praise?

Do you feel no obligation
To acknowledge Christ in you?
Have you never asked in earnest,
"Lord, what wilt Thou have me do?"

You have asked, and He has shown you,
But your shrinking heart cried, "No!
It is true, I asked for service,
But—that way I cannot go!"

While you choose, you are not willing;
We shall never dare to ask
Consecration means obedience
To the Spirit's every call!—

Meaneeth dying, meaneeth living,
(Death of self and life in God.)
Meaneeth work, or, at least waiting,
Or submission 'neath the rod!

Meaneeth such a full surrender,
We shall never dare to ask
Why God gives on faith such testing,
Or assigns so hard a task.

We are here to be perfected!—
Only Christ our needs can so;
Rarest gems bear hardest grinding,
God's own workmanship are we!

He loves harmony, not discord,
And what ever may befall,
Let a grand Psalm His is perfecting;
Let us praise Him for it all.

WORKS OF J. W. KIMBALL.

How to See Jesus with Fullness of Joy and Peace.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

This precious book has been the means of comfort to many a weary soul, and hoping that many more may be led to read its sweet exhortations, we give a few out of the many commendations we have received. A new edition has just been printed, and we send it forth earnestly hoping that it may be even more blessed in its ministrations than the former ones.

"I have been fifty years a member of the Presbyterian Church, and your 'How to see Jesus' has helped me to a better understanding of some things, and to a deeper interest in the Scriptures. Your words are so plain and simple that they come at once to the heart as food in season."—E. T., Utica, N. Y.

"I have read 'How to See Jesus' with much joy; it brings so much help to me."—O. O. O., California, California.

"I find in 'How to see Jesus' just the reading we need."—M. M., Erie, N. Y.

"How to See Jesus" is such a good book I want it to be comforting many who need it."—H. H., Mass.

"While in Des Moines, Iowa, I found your book 'How to See Jesus'—I have thought many times since the good Lord must have led me to it as I found in it just the comfort I needed. It will be a benefit to many of my friends, and I will make them a present of it; so please send me twelve."

"Thanks for the precious book 'How to See Jesus.' I have never read a book that has done me any more good."—S. A., Colorado.

"Many thanks for calling my attention to 'How to See Jesus.' I find it grandly helpful."—J. J., South Pueblo, Col.

Heaven: My Father's House.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

It is often said we know nothing of heaven, but Jesus says, "All things that the Father hath are mine; the Comforter shall take of mine and show it unto you." True to his promise, from the day I knew the Lord, the Comforter began to show me heavenly things. What I freely received, He bade me freely give. The hand of approval here recorded increased my obligation to Him, and not less my delight to share these joy-inspiring things with as many as I may. I pray God that each reader may find them his Lord's own revelations to himself.—P. P., Pa.

"I can surely say that, excepting my Bible, no book has ever done me so much good as 'Heaven: My Father's House.' After a day's sleep in the sick room trying to find the fevered brain in case theaching I think, you cannot imagine with what eagerness I turn that book for rest, and it never fails to bring it, and with it the prayer, 'Not as I will, O Father.'—E. E., Iowa.

"The book is full of beautiful ideas, consoling hopes, and brilliant representations of human destiny all presented in a chaste, pleasing, and very readable style."—New York Chronicle.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K.'s point of view, is a natural event in the order of the Christian's life. Instead of recoiling from the inevitable destiny, we are led by this more familiar view to look upon the change without fear, yea, with cheerfulness."—Rev. Dr. H. H. Hackett, Nelson Theological Seminary.

"Full of pointed illustrations, fresh, vigorous writing, nothing dull, short, crisp sentences, the reader is borne on rapidly; the writer speaks as though his thoughts rushed upon him, the fullness of nature, and joy in it runs through it."—S. S., N. Y.

THOMAS WILLIAM GLOVER, the Blue Ribbon Temperance orator, whose portrait appears on our front page this week, was born in the town of Ross, Herefordshire, England, on May 24th, 1844, so that he is now forty-one years of age. From a very early period his sympathies were enlisted on the side of total abstinence, and when a mere boy he became a member of the Band of Hope, and has kept his pledge unbroken to this day.

He was early deprived, by death, of his mother; but his father married a second time, and his stepmother from the time that he was twelve years of age, proved herself worthy of the love of her adopted family of eight little ones, of which Thomas is the eldest. Mr. Glover received a fair education at a local middle-class day-school, from which he went to Tetbury, his parents' native place, and was engaged with his uncle there in the conduct of a dry-goods business. At Tetbury he joined the Temperance Society, held the office of Secretary for five years, and made his maiden temperance speech as chairman of a public meeting in the common school.

FIRST EFFORTS.

Proceeding from his uncle's roof, under which he had been very happy, he went to London to gain experience in business. There he obtained a situation in a large retail concern, and occasionally rendered efficient service to the temperance cause in that populous quarter of London. He was constant in his visitation of meetings, and wrote an essay on "Is the Use of Intoxicating Liquors Consistent with the Christian Profession?" which he read before the Young Men's Association (see illustration), the result being that the association adopted the sentiments of the writer, and ordered the essay to be published.

Being unable to find a temperance society in the immediate neighborhood, he determined to start one himself, engaged the Stepney Temperance Hall, and arranged meetings on his own responsibility. But friends soon gathered round him, and a flourishing society was formed, with Dr. Edmunds as president and himself as secretary.

At length, after consulting with judicious friends, and with unshaking deliberation, he determined to devote himself entirely to the work, and immediately after having done so, he accepted an engagement as at Reading, where he labored assiduously and with success, for a period of five years.

In 1872, during his residence at Reading, he was instrumental, along with a few friends, in starting the first Good Templars' Lodge, and has since held nearly all the offices in subordinate lodges, and was for several years elected and re-elected District Chief Templar for the county of Hampshire, which office he holds, we believe, at the present time.

Mr. Glover is also an active member of St. Mary's (Canon Wilberforce's) Church of England Temperance Society, serving on the committee of one of the parochial branches. He is also a member of the Executive Committee of the Winchester Diocesan Branch, and Vice-President of the Southampton Temperance Society, besides holding other important and responsible offices. So that it is plainly evident that Mr. Glover has a pretty fair amount of hard work on his hands.

HE DONNED THE BLUE RIBBON in Jersey, at the hands of Mrs. Philip De Carteret, in 1881. He has since taken part in many large Blue Ribbon demonstrations, and was the Secretary of the Memorable Gospel Temperance Mission carried on in Southampton by Mr. Booth, under the presidency of the Rev. Canon Basil Wilberforce, when, during the eight days of its operations fifty-five hundred new pledges were taken.

PRESENTATION BY THE GOOD TEMPLARS.

The estimate in which Mr. Glover is held by the Good Templars is shown by the presentation which was made to him at a special session of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of England held at Weymouth in June, 1882. The presentation consisted of a handsomely illuminated and framed address, which was signed by the leading office-holders of the Grand Lodge, and which concluded thus: "Your general advocacy of our principles in different parts of the kingdom has been highly esteemed by the membership, and of great practical advantage to this Grand Lodge, and your attention to the internal administration of the order has been similarly appreciated by your colleagues on the executive."

Mr. Glover was married in the year 1867 to Miss Hawkey, of London, a life-long abstainer, who has stood by him in his work, cheerfully helping him in all the different phases of the movement, so far as was in her power, and consistent with the claims of a young family of several children, all growing up strong and healthy teetotallers, wearing the blue ribbon and bearing the honorable names of some eminent temperance men.

HE MADE THE TOUR OF THE WORLD

recently, sailing for Australia in the ship Orient, and during the voyage held several Gospel Temperance meetings on board (see illustration, No. 3), attended with most gratifying results, several of the young men who were going out to start life on their own account in the colony being prevailed upon, by Mr. Glover's arguments and eloquence, to take the total abstinence pledge. When, some months after, Mr. Glover met the young men again, he was rejoiced to find that they were sticking to their pledge, and, with God's help, resolutely determining to do so.

Having landed at Adelaide, Mr. Glover, with his companion, Mr. R. T. Booth, received an enthusiastic welcome from a body of temperance friends, who took him around the thriving city, and showed him the principal objects of interest. Among other places visited were the magnificent premises of the Young Men's Christian Association, where at half an hour's notice a crowded prayer-meeting was held. Speaking of

he says: "I found the drink was doing the same debasing work in the Colony as in England; it is the nature of drink to do evil everywhere, and I have not found a single spot where it is doing good. I was pleased, however, to hear from some of the natives that the young Australians are taking to total abstinence. The drinking that went on there in by-gone times was terrible. Many gathered together from all parts of the world, and in a few months became immensely rich at and thought they were made for life. Then they went into some drinking-saloon, and there, perhaps, lost it all. Some men on going to these places, would hand the landlord a cheque, and say 'Landlord, I am going in for a spree, and when that is gone you must let me know.' So they would sit down and begin 'shouting' for every one who came in, wanting every one to drink with them. Drinks were drugged, and in a few days all the money would be gone, and the men would be turned out to make their way back to the diggings as best they could. That was called 'knocking down cheques.' The sleepers on the large farms did exactly the same, and that was called 'lambing down.' These things are not entirely discontinued in the Colony now, though a great improvement is going on, and men and women are becoming more and more sober."

From Adelaide Mr. Glover proceeded to Melbourne, and here again was met by a great concourse of enthusiastic friends, and arrangements were made for a meeting of welcome in London Hall, and afterward for a temperance mission. In the mean time he went on to Hobart Town, Tasmania, where some large meetings were held, presided over by the Premier, the Hon. Robert Stout, and the bishop and the dean "donned the blue" at the first meeting. At the third meeting stood up, and said: "Ladies and Gentlemen: I am going to sign the pledge to-night and put on the blue ribbon. I am going to sign for my son's sake. My son is going to England—going to Oxford—and I know the temptations he will have to meet, and when he said to-night, 'Father, if you will sign the pledge, and put on the blue ribbon, I will,' I could not refuse" (see illustration, No. 4). As the Premier told the story, and signed the pledge, there was scarcely a dry eye in the meeting.

From Hobart Town Mr. Glover went to Launceston and other places, and then away back again to Melbourne, where arrangements had been completed for in the Exhibition Building, an edifice holding six thousand people, all on the ground floor. There was a choir of six hundred blue ribboners, and the hearts of the people were thoroughly moved, and one night no fewer than nine hundred came up out of the meeting and signed the pledge, and put on "the badge of blue." Mr. Booth falling ill with congestion of the lungs, the entire responsibility for the organization and conduct of the meetings fell on Mr. Glover, but God gave him the strength required, and he was able to go on. Night after night the colossal building was densely crowded, and thousands were unable to obtain admission, and at the close of the campaign it was found that no fewer than eighteen thousand persons had signed the pledge. The excitement was intense. Night after night processions gradually growing in volume might be seen on the streets, proceeding to the place of meeting (see illustration, No. 5).

AMONG THE MAORIERS.

On April 15th, 1884, Mr. Glover interviewed Tawhiao, the Maori king, then returning from his visit to Europe to New Zealand. The king and his chiefs, who were staying at an ordinary hotel, appointed the interview to take place in the little parlor of the house, and gave Mr. Glover and his friends a very hearty reception, and, through their interpreter, expressed the appreciation and gratification they all felt for the kind attention bestowed on them. Mr. Bælen, as representing the Australian Gospel Temperance Union, tendered to Tawhiao, as the first kingly wearer of the emblematic "blue ribbon," respects and best wishes, coupled with a cordial welcome to Victoria. The chiefs said they were all agreed as to the value and importance of the principles they had embraced. Mr. Glover, before leaving, asked, and was granted permission to pin "the blue" on the coat of one of the chiefs who, at the time, was not wearing that distinction (see illustration, No. 6). The blue ribbon worn by the king is somewhat larger than the bit generally worn, and is attached to a small, neat buckle, like the orders kings and princes wear in Europe.

After this cheering incident of his exhausting labors, Mr. Glover held smaller missions in the suburban districts, and altogether he was speaking every night for over three months in Melbourne and its environs. From Melbourne he went to Geelong, a city on the sea-coast, where he had, in proportion to the population, as great a success as he had had in Melbourne. The Chief Secretary of State for Victoria took the chair at a meeting, when Mr. Glover gave an address on Local Option, and announced that the Government were preparing to introduce a bill dealing with that matter, and that, therefore, he was glad to get information. The missioner took care not to let the State official go without knowing that nothing short of the power of stamping out the traffic would ever elude the people. "There is nothing else," he said, "able to get rid of it; that is the only regulation wanted, and that is all Sir Wilfrid Lawson ever asked for in the British House of Commons." Mr. Glover then held meetings in Ballarat, at one of which one thousand people signed the pledge—

THE GREATEST NUMBER OF PLEDGES

He had ever known taken in a single night. After spending six months in the small towns he went back to Tasmania, and from thence to New Zealand—the Prime Minister of which Colony is a total abstainer—addressing meetings at Invercargill, Dunedin, Christchurch, Wellington, and Auckland.

He was anxious to work in this country, so travelled home via San Francisco and Salt Lake City. He intended to stop and find out what he could about the Mormons, and hearing of a temperance meeting went to it, and was asked to speak. The temperance party appeared to be a very low ebb there, but a committee was formed and arrangements made for a mission, a Mormon bishop allowing them the use of the theatre for the meetings. They had a large attendance, both of

MORMONS AND GENTILES.

Mr. Glover says: "I am obliged to say that what the Mormons affirm is absolutely true—that every drinking-saloon in Salt Lake City is kept by what are called 'Christians,' and not by Mormons, and if there were no 'Christians' there would be no drinking there." An assertion which, as Mr. Glover is not a prophet may or may not be true, but which most people who know anything of Utah, will take with the traditional grain of salt.

While at Salt Lake City, he visited the prison (see illustration, No. 7), where he found about one hundred prisoners, none of whom were Mormons, but all "Christians." If he went there now, he would find some Mormons who, if justice had been done, would have been there long ago. Perhaps if he had not been so ignorant of the political influences at work in the Territory at that time, he would have understood why the Gentile scamps were inside the jail, and the Mormon scamps outside. He was allowed to give a brief address to the men, and, lifting up his heart to God for wisdom and aid, proceeded to make the most of his opportunity. The impression produced by his remarks was profound.

IN THE MORMON TEMPLE.

He went also to the temple (a building holding twelve thousand persons), and heard Brigham Young, who made no compromise with the publicans and the liquor traffic, but said straight out: "Any man who will take a liquor saloon and sell strong liquor to his fellow-men is fit only to be hanged by the neck." Mr. Glover remarks: "I shouted out 'Hear, hear!' I dared not say such a thing as that in England, but I was glad to be somewhere where I could say it."

It may be presumed that Mr. Glover observed a discreet silence about the sins of polygamy, immorality, robbery, and murder, or his friend Brigham would have felt uncomfortable, and might have made the missionary feel so too. On the whole, the less Brigham said about hanging by the neck the better. None so richly deserved it as he did.

From Salt Lake City he went to Denver, from Denver to Chicago, from Chicago to Seneca Falls—to the home of Mr. R. T. Booth—and from thence to New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Portland, Me. He then returned to England.

That Mr. Glover assigns to total abstinence a high place as a mighty agency of reformation is evident in nearly every utterance he makes, but happily he is too enlightened a Christian to allow it to supersede the yet mightier agency of the Gospel of Christ, in the perfect enfranchisement of both soul and body, and which alone is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

TESTIMONIES AT THE INTERNATIONAL FAITH-HEALING CONFERENCE.

IN continuance of our report of this Conference at Agricultural Hall, Islington, in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD we give further details. Similar Conferences were held at Brighton and Blackheath the following week.

MR. J. W. WOOD, OF AUSTRALIA.

having quoted Psalm 27:4, and Romans 12:1, said it was through an exposition of these passages by Mrs. Hampson that he was led to see the way to obtain the blessing. He had preached against it for many years; he thought it was impossible for a man to live without sin—to have a clean heart. But he came to have one sole desire—that Christ should be king in his heart, a thing He had not been for many a year. After thirty years of struggling he came to see that as Christ was given by God to man, so man had to give something which would be acceptable to God; he was to present his body a living sacrifice. He described in detail how after some two weeks' intense conflict, day and night almost, the light of God broke into his soul, and it was perfect heaven; whether at business or waiting before the Lord, he was filled with the Holy Ghost. At the close of the fourteen days he was led to see the power of the Lord to heal the body, and since then he had never doubted it, though he had suffered not a little persecution through it. He was assured that the healing power had been given to him, and he pledged himself to use it for the glory of God. He knew nothing then about "faith-healing." He searched the Word, however, and there he found confirmation of the truth that gifts of healing are given to the children of God for the perfecting of the body of Christ, until the time when it should meet the Lord in the air. He had been a perfect invalid for over twenty years. Nearly all the doctors in Victoria had suffering from disease of heart and lungs and liver, but the Lord had perfectly healed him without any human intervention. The Lord subsequently allowed one of his children to become sick; there was a large lump under her chin, and she was in high fever. He had found it difficult to exercise his healing gift elsewhere because of the prejudice that existed, and he believed the Lord had brought on this sickness that he might have the opportunity of exercising it without hindrance. He went to the child, and prayed: "Lord Jesus, Thou art the Great Physician, heal the child." Away went the fever. He puts His hand under the child's chin, and away went the lump! A few days afterward she was taken with a low fever. When he came home he placed his hands on her and prayed the Lord to heal her;

SHE GOT UP PERFECTLY RESTORED.

Mr. Wood also told in detail of the healing of a friend in the hospital, whose family had been summoned to see him die. He was raised up by the prayer of faith, and the doctors called it a resurrection case. Later on a medical certificate was granted to him to pass an insurance company. He proceeded to tell how, having received invitations to visit many parts of South Australia, something like came under the ministry of healing. Night and day people came calling upon God for salvation, and all kinds of diseases were healed by His mighty power resting upon them.

REV. A. B. SIMPSON, OF NEW YORK, said he represented thousands of hearts on the other side of the Atlantic which were throbbing with sympathy. He referred to the work of Dr. Cullis, Boston, whose influence had extended far beyond the United States in many directions. The names of Mr. Sanford (who was present at the Conference), and of Carrie Judd, of Buffalo, and Mrs. Dix, were held in affectionate esteem for their works' sake. A quiet farmer, Ephraim Allen, was also doing a wonderful work for God. Miss Gordon, Nashville, had been marvellously used of God during this winter. He scarcely knew a church throughout the land where there is not a little band who are united in the maintenance of this truth. It was becoming a bond of union stronger than any they had known before. With respect to New York, it had been his delight that the work was so impersonal. He felt bound to say that he had been a little oppressed when hearing the blessed personal testimonies given at this Conference, lest there should be too much of the personal element, to the exclusion of God's truth.

Coming to his PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

Mr. Simpson said that ten years ago he got out of the waters of despondency by simply believing on Jesus as his Saviour. He got out of another difficulty by simply, through faith, taking Christ to be his Sanctifier. About four years ago he was broken down physically. After a time the Lord Jesus showed him that it was His blessed will to be a complete Saviour for body, soul, and spirit. When he returned home from Europe two years ago he made three solemn pledges—first, that he believed this Divine healing was the truth of God's Word, and he would stand upon it; second, that he would take it for himself and believe not only that he was healed, but that he had the full strength of the risen Lord needed for the rest of his work on earth; and third, that he could not refuse to use this truth for the help of others.

From that time, continued Mr. Simpson, I have been permitted to work about four times as hard as before. I have had the entire charge of a large magazine, of which I have done half the writing, all the editorial work, and all the oversight. I have been pastor of a church, where there are services every night of the week and three times on Sunday. I have had the charge of a Home in New York, opened for receiving those who came for healing, and have spent hours and hours every day in personal conversation. Some three thousand called last year. During these four years, I can truly say that with the exception of two nights when I felt the Lord wanted to get me alone with Him and rest on His bosom, I have not had to be one hour from my work, and have not even taken a summer vacation, choosing rather to work through the summer in New York, and finding it the best harvest time of all. I have done this because I could not help it; it was a delight. I stand here to say that

THE LORD JESUS CAN BE BODY AND NERVE, and vital energy, and brain, and mind, and thought, to those who will simply trust and not be afraid to venture out in His service.

Dr. F. W. Badcker, said: "Twenty years ago I was an infidel, and I was converted by the words, 'God is.' Whatever I might think of it, God is, and I must believe that He is. That floored me. From that day I gave myself up to God. I was told at once that people are CONVERTED FOR SERVICE.

There was a new Master to serve instead of the old one. But I was an invalid in the doctor's hands, drinking wine, and spirits, and beer, and medicine; but all did me no good. One day I was asked to speak in the open air. "It is an impossibility," I said; "I'm a man of one lung, a man of a weak heart and weak spine." "Have you asked the Lord about it?" That sent me to the Lord. "Lord, if I am to serve Thee anywhere, Thou must heal me and do it all Thyself alone." He answered me, and poured grace into me, and now I could not keep back the message. He burned (Isaiah 40:1) into my heart, and I must tell it out, but the end of the chapter were precious words which I took for myself. "Strength sufficient," is our German word. I thought 'that is what I want.' I have taken it as mine ever since. I am just starting for a second journey to Russia. Pray for me to be anointed with fresh oil."

STRIPPING THE SLAIN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa."—1 SAM. 31 : 8.

SOME of you were at South Mountain, or Shiloh, or Ball's Bluff, or Gettysburg, and I ask you if the gaze is any sadder sight than a battle-field across the field of Antietam just after the conflict. The scene was so sickening I shall not describe it. Every valuable thing had been taken from the bodies of the dead, for there are always over and around about an army, and they pick up the watches, and the memorandum books, and the letters, and the daguerotypes, and the hats, and the coats, applying them to their own uses. The dead make no resistance. So there are always camp followers going on and after an army, as when Scott went down into Mexico, as when Napoleon marched up toward Moscow, as when Von Moltke went to Sedan. There is a similar scene in my text.

Saul and his army had been horribly cut to pieces. Mount Gilboa was ghastly with the dead. On the morrow the stragglers came on to the field, and they lifted the lachet of the helmet from under the chin of the dead, and they picked up the swords and bent them on their knee to test the temper of the metal, and they opened the wallets and counted the coin. Saul lay dead along the ground, eight or nine feet in length, and I suppose the cowardly Philistines, to show their bravery, leaped upon the trunk of his carcass, and jeered at the fallen slain, and whistled through the mouth of the helmet. Before night those cormorants had taken everything valuable from the field : "And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons fallen in Mount Gilboa."

THE WORLD'S BATTLE-FIELD.

Before I get through to-day I will show you that the same process is going on all the world over, and every day, and that when men have fallen, Satan and the world, so far from pitying them or helping them, go to work remorselessly to take what little is left, thus stripping the slain.

There are tens of thousands of young men every year coming from the country to our great cities. They come with brave hearts and grand expectations. They think they will be Rufus Choates in the law, or Drapers in chemistry, or A. T. Stewarts in merchandise. The country lads sit down in the village grocery, with their feet on the iron rod around the red-hot stove, in the evening, talking over the prospects of the young man who has gone off to the city. Two or three of them think that perhaps he may get along very well and succeed, but the most of them prophesy failure, for it is very hard to think that those whom we knew in boyhood will ever make any stir in the world.

THE OVERTHROW.

But our young man has a fine position in a dry-goods store. The month is over. He gets his wages. He is not accustomed to have so much money belonging to himself. He is a little excited, and does not exactly know what to do with it, and he spends it in some places where he ought not. Soon there come up new companions and acquaintances from the bar-rooms and the saloons of the city. Soon that young man begins to waver in the battle of temptation, and soon his soul goes down. In a few months, or few years, he has fallen. He is morally dead. He is a mere corpse of what he once was. The harpies of sin snuff up the taint and come on the field. His garments gradually give out. He has pawned his watch. His health is failing him. His credit perishes. He is too poor to stay in the city, and he is too poor to pay his way home to the country. Down! down! Why do the low fellows of the city now stick to him so closely? Is it to help him back to a moral and spiritual life? Oh, no! I will tell you why they stay; they are the Philistines stripping the slain.

SLAIN BY EVIL HABITS.

Do not look where I point, but yonder stands a man who once had a beautiful home in this city. His house had elegant furniture, his children were beautifully clad, his name was synonymous with honor and usefulness; but evil habit knocked at his front door, knocked at his back door, knocked at his parlor door, knocked at his bedroom door. Where is the piano? Sold to pay the rent. Where is the hat-rack? Sold to meet the butcher's bill. Where are the carpets? Sold to get bread. Where is the wardrobe? Sold to get rum. Where are the daughters? Working their fingers off in trying to keep the family together. Worse and worse, until everything is gone. Who is that going up the front steps of that house? That is a creditor, hoping to find some chair or bed that has not been levied upon. Who are those two gentlemen now going up the front steps? The one is a constable, the other is the sheriff. Why do they go there? The unfortunate is morally dead, socially dead, financially dead. Why do they go there? I will tell you why the creditors, and the constables, and the sheriffs go there. They are, some on their own account, and some on account of the law, stripping the slain.

CROWDED OUT.

An ex-member of Congress, one of the most eloquent men that ever stood in the House of Representatives, said in his last moments : "This is the end. I am dying—dying on a borrowed bed, covered by a borrowed sheet, in a house built by public charity." Bury me under that tree in the middle of the field, where I shall not be crowded, for I have been crowded all my life." Where were the jolly politicians and the dissipating comrades who had been with him, laughing at his jokes, applauding his eloquence, and plunging him into sin? They have left. Why? His money is gone, his reputation is gone, his wit is gone, his clothes are gone, everything is gone. Why should they stay any longer? They have completed their work. They have stripped the slain.

A PITILESS WORLD.

There is another way, however, of doing that same work. Here is a man who, through his sin, is prostrate. He acknowledges that he has done wrong. Now is the time for you to go to that man and say : "Thousands of people have been as far astray as you are, and got back." Now is the time for you to go to that man, and tell him of the omnipotent grace of God, that is sufficient for any poor soul. Now is the time to go to tell him how swearing John Bunyan, through the grace of God, afterward came to the celestial city. Now is the time to go to that man and tell him how profligate Newton came, through conversion, to be a world-renowned preacher of righteousness. Now is the time to tell that man that multitudes who have been pounded with all the flails of sin and dragged through all the sewers of pollution at last have risen to positive dominion of moral power.

You do not tell him that, do you? No. You say to him : "Loan you money? No. You are down. You will have to go to the dogs. Lend you a shilling? I would not lend you five cents to keep you from the gallows. You are debauched! Get out of my sight now! Down; you will have to stay down." And thus those bruised and battered men are sometimes accosted by those who ought to lift them up. Thus the last vestige of hope is taken from them. Thus those who ought to go and lift and save them are guilty of stripping the slain.

The point I want to make is this : sin is hard, cruel, and merciless. Instead of helping a man up it helps him down; and when, like Saul and his comrades, you lie on the field, it will come and steal your sword, and helmet, and shield leaving you to the jackal and the crow.

SATANIC TORTURE.

But the world and Satan do not do all their work with the outcast and abandoned. A respectable, impenitent man comes to die. He is flat on his back. He could not get up if the house were on fire. Adroitest medical skill and gentlest nursing have been a failure. He has come to his last hour. What does Satan do for such a man? Why, he fetches up all the inapt, disagreeable, and harrowing things in his life. He says : "Do you remember those chances you had for heaven, and missed them? Do you remember all those lapses in conduct? Do you remember all those opprobrious words, and thoughts, and actions? Don't remember them, eh? I'll make you remember them." And then he takes all the past and empties it on that death-bed, as the mail bags are emptied on the post-office floor. The man is sick. He cannot get away from them.

HELLISH TAUNTS.

Then the man says to Satan : "You have deceived me. You told me that all would be well. You said there would be no trouble at the last. You told me if I did so and so you would do so and so. Now you corner me, and hedge me up, and submerge me in everything evil." "Ha! ha!" says Satan. "I was only fooling you. It is mirth for me to see you suffer. I have been for thirty years plotting to get you just where you are. It is hard for you now—it will be worse for you after a while. It pleases me. Lie still, sir. Don't flinch or shudder. Come now, I will tear off from you the last rag of expectation. I will rend away from your soul the last hope. I will leave you bare for the beating of the storm. It is my business to strip the slain."

While men are in robust health, and their digestion is good, and their nerves are strong, they think their physical strength will get them safely through the last exigency. They say it is only cowardly women who are afraid at the last, and cry out for God. "Wait till I come to die. I will show you. You won't hear me pray, nor call for a minister, nor want a chapter read me from the Bible." But after the man has been three weeks in a sick room his nerves are not so steady, and his worldly companions are not anywhere near to cheer him up, and he is persuaded that he must quit life.

HIS PHYSICAL COURAGE IS ALL GONE.

He jumps at the fall of a tea-spoon in a saucer. He shivers at the idea of going away. He says : "Wife, I don't think my infidelity is going to take me through. For God's sake, don't bring up the children to do as I have done. If you feel like it, I wish you would read a verse or two out of Fannie's Sabbath-school hymn-book or New Testament." But Satan breaks in, and says : "You have always thought religion trash and a lie; don't give up at the last. Besides that, you cannot, in the hour you have to live, get off on that track. Die as you lived. With my great black wings I shut out that light. Die in darkness. I rend away from you that last vestige of hope. It is my business to strip the slain."

A man who, had rejected Christianity and thought it all trash, came to die. He was in the sweat of a great agony, and his wife said : "We had better have some prayer." "Mary, not a breath of that," he said. "The lightest word of prayer would roll back on me like rocks on a drowning man. I have come to the hour of test. I had a chance, and I forfeited it. I believed in a liar, and he has left me in the lurch. Mary, bring me Tom Paine, that book that I swore by and lived by, and pitch it in the fire, and let it burn and burn as I myself shall soon burn." And then, with the foam on his

, and his hands tossing wildly in the air, he hid out: "Blackness of darkness! Oh, my God, too late!" And the spirits of darkness jostled up from the depth, and wheeled around d around him, stripping the slain.

THE END OF THE PROCESS.
Sin is a luxury now; it is exhilaration now; it is victory now. But after awhile it is colic; it is defeat; it is extermination; it is ekalism; it is robbing the dead; it is stripping the slain. Give it up to-day—give it up! how you have been cheated on my brother, on one thing to another! All these years you have been under an evil mastery that you understand not. What have your companions done for you? What have they done for your health? early ruined it by carousal. What have they done for your fortune? Almost scattered it by endrthrift behavior. What have they done for your reputation? Almost ruined it with good en. What have they done for your immortal soul? Almost insured its overthrow.

You are hastening on toward the consummation of all that is sad. To-day you stop and ink, but it is only for a moment, and then you ill tramp on, and at the close of this service ou will go out, and the question will be: "How d you like the sermon?" and one man will y: "I liked it very well," and another man ill say: "I didn't like it at all," but neither the answers will touch the tremendous fact at, if impenitent, you are going at eighteen oots an hour toward shipwreck! Yea, you are a battle where you will fall; and while your riving relatives will take your remaining tate, and the cemetery will take your body, e messengers of darkness will take your soul, d come and go about you for the next ten illion years, stripping the slain.

RECOVERY POSSIBLE.
Many are crying out: "I admit I am slain, I limit it." On what battle-field, my brothers, y what weapon? "Polluted imagination," y one man; "Intoxicating liquor," says another man; "My own hard heart," says other man. Do you realize this? Then I me to tell you that the omnipotent Christ is able to walk across this battle-field, and re- ve, and resuscitate, and resurrect your dead ul. Let Him take your hand, and rub away e numbness; your head, and bathe of the hing; your heart, and stop its wild throbb. He ough Lazarus to life; He brought Jairus' ughter to life; He brought the young man of ain to life, and these are three proofs anyhow at He can bring you to life.

When the Philistines came down on the field, ey stepped between the corpses, and they lled over the dead, and they took away every- thing that was valuable; and so it was with the eople that followed after our army at Chancel- rville, and at Pittsburg Landing, and at Stone iver, and at Atlanta, stripping the slain; but e Northern and Southern women—God bless em—came on the field with basins, and pads, d towels, and

nd Christian encouragement; and the poor fel- lows that lay there lifted up their arms and id: "Oh, how good that does feel since you ressed it!" and others looked up and said: "Oh, how you make me think of my mother!" d others said: "Tell the folks at home I did nking about them," and another looked up, d said: "Miss, won't you sing me a verse of Home, Sweet Home" before I die." And en the tattoo was sounded, and the hats were f, and the service was read: "I am the resur- ection and the life," and in honor of the e-departed the muskets were loaded, and the e- mand given: "Take aim—fire!" And there as a single set up at the head of the grave- irth the epitaph of "Lieutenant"—in the "fourteenth Massachusetts Regulars," or "Cap- in"—in the Fifteenth Regiment of South Carolina Volunteers." And so to-night, across as great field of moral and spiritual battle, the angels of God come walking among the slain, nd there are voices of comfort, and voices of hope, and voices of resurrection, and voices of heaven.

OH, THE SLAIN! THE SLAIN!
Christ is ready to give life to the dead. He will make the deaf ear to hear, the blind eye to see, the pulseless heart to beat, and the damp walls of your spiritual channel hose will crash into ruin at His cry: "Come forth!" I verily believe there are souls in this house who are now dead in sin, who in half an hour will be alive forever. There was a thrilling dream, a glorious dream—you may have heard of it. Ezekiel closed his eyes, and he saw two moun- tains, and a valley between the mountains. That valley looked as though there had been a great battle there, and a whole army had been slain, and they had been unburied; and the heat of the land, and the vultures coming there, soon the bones were exposed to the sun, and they looked like thousands of snowdrifts all through the valley. Frightful spectacle! The bleaching skeletons of a host!

But Ezekiel still kept his eyes shut; and lo, there were four currents of wind that struck that battle-field, and when those four currents of wind met, the bones began to rattle; and the foot came to the ankle, and the hand came to the wrist, and the jaws clashed together, and the spinal column gathered up the ganglions and the nervous fibre, and all the valley wriggled, and writhed, and throbbed, and rocked, and rose up. There, a man coming to life. There, a hundred men. There, a thousand; and all falling into line, waiting for the shout of their commander. Ten thousand bleached skeletons springing up into ten thousand warriors, panting for the fray. I hope that instead of being a dream it may be a prophecy of what we shall see here to-day. Let this north wall be one of the moun- tains, and the south wall be taken for another of the mountains, and let all the aisles and the pews be the valley between, for there are thou- sands here to-day without one pulsation of spir- itual life.

A GALE FROM HEAVEN.
I look off in one direction, and they are dead. I look off in another direction, and they are dead. Who will bring them to life? Who shall rouse them up? If I should halloo at the top of my voice, I could not wake them. Wait a moment! Listen! There is a rustling. There is a gale from heaven. It comes from the north, and from the south, and from the east, and from the west. It shuts us in. It blows upon the slain. There, a soul begins to move in spiritual life; there, ten souls; there, a score of souls; there, a hundred souls. The nostril throbbing in Divine respiration, the hands lifted as though to take hold of heaven, the tongue moving as in prayer and adoration. Life! immortal life com- ing into the slain. Ten men for God—fifty—a hundred—a regiment—an army for God! Oh, that we might have such a scene here to-day! In Ezekiel's words, and in almost a frenzy of prayer, I cry: "Come from the four winds, O Breath, and breathe upon the slain."

You will have to surrender your heart to-day to God. You cannot take the responsibility of fighting against the Spirit in this crisis which will decide whether you are to go to heaven or to hell—to join the hallelujahs of the saved, or the lamentations of the lost. You must pray. You must repent. You must this day fling your sinful soul on the pardoning mercy of God. You must! I see your resolution against God giving way, your determination wavering. I break through the breach in the wall and follow up the advantage gained, hoping to rout your last opposition to Christ, and to make you "ground arms" at the feet of the Divine Conqueror. Oh, you must! You must!

THE OCEANIC TIDE.
The moon does not ask the tides of the Atlantic Ocean to rise. It only stoops down with two great hands of light, the one at the European beach, and the other at the American beach, and then lifts the great laver of molten silver. And God, it seems to me, is now going to lift this audience into newness of life. Do you not feel the swellings of the great oceanic tides of Divine mercy? My heart is in anguish to have you saved. For this I pray, and preach, and long, glad to be called a fool for Christ's sake, and your salvation.

Some one replies: "Dear me, I do wish I could have these matters arranged with my God. I want to be saved. God knows I want to be saved; but you stand there talking about this matter, and you don't show me how." My dear brother, the work has all been done. Christ did it with His own torn hand, and lacerated foot, and bleeding side. He took your place, and died your death, if you will only believe it—only accept Him as your substitute.

THE LORD'S AMBULANCE.
What an amazing pity that any man should go from this house unblessed, when such a large blessing is offered him at less cost than you would pay for a pin—"without money and without price." I have driven down to-day with the Lord's ambulance to the battle-field where your soul lies exposed to the darkness and the storm, and I want to lift you in, and drive off with you toward heaven. O Christians, by your payers help to lift these wounded souls into the ambulance! God forbid that any should be left on the field, and that at last eternal sorrow, and remorse, and despair should come up around their soul like the bandit Philistines to the field of Gilboa, stripping the slain.

An Indication of the Long-hoped-for Disap- pearance of the color-line in the South is re- ported. It is not an important one, but it is re- garded as one of the signs of the current of public opinion, and encourages the hope that there are other signs to follow. On Sunday, May 17th, a colored bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Minden, La., and his sermon was pronounced excellent. Two colored delegates were also received at the Episcopal Diocesan Convention assembled at Columbia, S. C.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley was the Guest of the Baptist Missionary Society in London on May 28th, and received the thanks of the society for the help he had given the missionaries on the Congo. Mr. Stanley, in his reply, said that he was glad to have had the opportunity of helping the missionaries and of obtaining in return their help to teach the natives. Formerly he ill understood the missionaries. However, since that he had seen Livingstone. He recognized in him the type of a noble and spiritual manhood. The real work of the missionary was hard, his privations were great, his worldly reward small. Mr. Stanley expressed the hope that the Congo country would soon be well supplied with missionaries. He urged the society to be very care- ful about the kind of men they sent out as mis- sionaries to Africa. "Do not," he said, "send young men without first having taught them the practical life necessary to success, the same as you teach children whom you wish to live long. Dead missionaries are of no more value than other dead men."

A Letter from John Bright, the Veteran British statesman, to a deputy of Paris, has been published. It expresses opinions which are more or less disturbing the most enlightened minds in Europe. Mr. Bright says: "If European nations would accept commercial liberty—that is, moderate or abolish customs—Europe might soon tend to an era of perpetual peace. At present all resources are swallowed up by military exigencies. The people's interests are sacrificed to the most miserable and culpable fantasies of foreign politics. The real interests of the masses are trodden under foot in deference to false notions of glory and national honor. I cannot help thinking that Europe is marching toward some great catastrophe of crushing weight. The military system cannot indefinitely be supported with patience, and the populations, driven to despair, may possibly before long sweep away the royalties and pretended statesmen who govern in their names. I hope your country and mine will remain at peace."

A PERFECT HELL OF FIRE.

UNDER the above heading, the New York Times publishes a graphic narrative of a journey recently made by a party of tourists to the summit of Mount Vesuvius, the great volcano which, during the past few months, has been in a state of alarming activity. The comparison of this volcano, with its seething fires, vomiting forth hot lava, stones and ashes, to the dread abode of lost spirits, is not ours. It is that of one of the travellers to whom it occurred as he looked down into the molten mass. It is not for mortal man to conceive what is the condition in which exist the souls of men, who in the time of their probation rejected Christ, and trod under foot the blood of the Saviour. A veil is drawn over it, but such glimpses as the Scriptures give us of that fearful place tend to the conclusion that the comparison made is not inappropriate (Isa. 33:14; Matt. 25:41; Rev. 14:10, 11). This is the narrative:

"Horses and a guide were awaiting us at 1 A.M. It was a beautiful, clear, cold, starry morning, and we all felt in the best of spirits. We trotted about in any order. We saluted a few belated marketmen returning from Naples, but they were all evidently asleep in their wagons, and gave us no response. At last we turned off the main road and made straight through narrow lanes for the burning mountain. It seemed to be in good working order—the fire fountain playing on the summit, the streams of lava pouring down its sides and collecting into five red glowing caldrons. We were here going Indian file—our guide mounted on a light chestnut horse; then my friend on a restless white animal, whose name was 'Garibaldi'; myself on 'Macaroni'; and last of all, the lady of the company on 'Mary Stuart,' to the tail of which a boy, who was to take back the horses, firmly held on, and half asleep, was being dragged along. At 3 A.M. the tramp of our martial steeds woke the echoes of two sleeping hamlets—'Bosco del Case,' and 'Bosco Reale,' 'The Wood of Three Houses,' and 'The Royal Wood.' Beyond this our path lay between fields of vines, and then, the mountain proper being reached by zigzag paths, among cinders and scoriae, gradually approaching the streams of burning lava.

"By four o'clock we reached a little plateau called the Atrio del Cavallo, where we all dismounted to make the further ascent of the mountain on foot, it being too steep and rugged to take the horses. This plateau was nearly on a level with the termini of the streams of burning lava. Skirting the mountain toward the sea, we went to examine these. We were struck with the manner in which the lava advances. This is not in a thin stream, but in a huge pile, thirty or forty feet deep, of wedge-like form. The surface of this had, to a certain extent, cooled and dulled; inside it was glowing red. The onward movement of these streams was caused by the enormous weight of lava pushing from behind. Its movement was thus by throbs and pulsations. They were also extended and widened by the lava constantly falling over its sides and face, exactly as an embankment is enlarged by material being conveyed along its top and tilted over the edge. We now returned to the Atrio del Cavallo and continued our ascent.

"After a half hour's struggle among loose ashes we came to slopes of lava, the appearance of which was most striking. It exactly resembled the entrails of a great monster, literally 'the bowels of the earth.' Again we passed through ashes, and in some places, where the former were very steep and deep, a sort of scoriae causeway was laid to assist the toilsome ascent. We were now thankful to reach a 'half-way house,' or rather a sort of 'rest-and-be-thankful' sheltered seat formed of blocks of lava. Day was now beginning to dawn, and what a marvellous panorama we looked down upon! Away to the southeast were the Abruzzi Mountains, whose snowy peaks were just catching and glittering in the rays of the rising sun; to the southwest were the islands of Capri and Ischia, throwing off a thin mantle of mist in which they had passed the night; nearer at hand the lovely contour of the Bay of Naples, with its smiling villages; a little way inland, the red ruins of Pompeii, in the midst of green fields and pleasant woods; while, in contrast to all that fertility and life and beauty, we had around us a scene of utter silence and desolation. Not a speck of green, not a bird, not an insect; no life—only fields on fields of lava and scoriae and ashes. The silence from time to time was broken, but it was only by the low mutterings and growlings of the mountain, that always heralded an upheaval of lava and debris.

"Again we bent our steps upward, going zigzag among scoriae and lava, passing various little extinct craters, until we came to where the mountain was hot and where white sulphurous smoke was rising all about. Here another halt was called and the guide went off to explore. He soon returned and bade us follow. We could not go higher at this point for smoke and falling stones, and so he struck across the mountain in the Naples direction. We soon saw where we were—at the fountain-head of the two streams of burning lava. These we must cross before we could make a further ascent. The guide stepped very cautiously on the black, cooling crusts of lava, and we followed. We were surrounded at times with sulphurous smoke. Our feet felt blistering in our boots. The lava creaked and cracked, but we passed lightly on.

"A little dog had followed us from the hotel; its piteous cries attracted us. The poor creature was having its feet sorely burned, so we took it up and carried it. But now we were safely over and could examine more closely the phenomena. We approached as near the streams of burning lava as its scorching heat permitted. We saw it issuing from what looked like huge, black, cast-iron cylinders. These were formed of the outer rim of lava that had gradually cooled somewhat and hardened. The burning mass moved constantly, but not equally. It seemed to pulsate and throb in its flowing—to be jerked out of the cylinders. As it advanced down the mountain it grew in width and height, because always cooling, and became less liquid, until it ended in the great piles that we first saw.

"I think the worst and most dangerous part of the whole ascent had now to be made. This was an almost perpendicular cone of loose ashes. At every step we sank to the knees, so our progress was exceedingly slow. Right below us were the burning streams of lava, into which it seemed we were bound to slide. Above us was the crater, whose thunderings we could hear, and whose tremblings at times we thought we felt. Breathless and exhausted, we frequently lay down among the ashes.

"But at last we gained the summit, and all our exertions were rewarded. Such a sight! The crater of Vesuvius! A perfect hell of sulphur, fire and smoke, cinders and ashes, and red-hot stones; its flooring of hardened lava everywhere rent by seams and cracks and yawning chasms emitting stifling vapors, while in the midst of it all rose the last-formed central cone of smoking debris, belching forth clouds of sulphurous vapor, and at intervals with loud thunderings, and with an effort that shook the mountain, throwing like a mighty fire fountain showers of rock and scoriae high into the air. Amid the terror of the scene there was an element of great beauty. The rich and varied coloring that everywhere prevailed was wonderful, from the purest white up through all shades of yellow and rich orange to deepest reds, the deposits of salts, and sulphur, and iron, and chemical matters.

"Near the cone there were two tremendous chasms. To the edge of these we could approach. The guide explained that they opened a week ago, when the present eruption took place. They were the reservoirs from which flowed the two rivers of lava that were now coming down the mountain's sides. The guide did not wish us to linger, so we undid our baskets and set about having breakfast. It was now six o'clock, and we thought we had earned this meal, after a five hours' climb. But our appetites were not worthy of the occasion; a little seemed to satisfy us. There was some excuse for this, for the thin crust of lava on which we sat was hot and trembling, and the 'crater,' so far from being appeased by our presence, seemed to be extra irritable; for we had scarcely started breakfast, and were doing admirably, when, with a noise like thunder, he cast a cloud of smoke over and about us, which hastened our bidding him 'good morning.'

THE VALLEY OF DRY BONES.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard City, Kan.
An Agitating Question—Will Israel Return?—The Prophetic Vision—Mistaken Theories About It—The Resemblance of the Bones—Strength and Weakness—Bleached by Persecution—The Enigma of the Ages—What the Bones Were—What they are to Be—No Hiatus in God's View—How it will be Accomplished—Human Agency not Excluded.

THE adamantine rock on which unbelief and radicalism must suffer shipwreck is comparatively unknown—yea, nearly forgotten in this present age. That rock is called Israel, a people despised and looked upon as "tribes of the wandering foot and weary breast."

The great question that has agitated the religious world for many ages, is, Will the Jews, will the twelve tribes of Israel return to their own land, Canaan, and will they stand again among the nations as a national political power, blessed by the great Jehovah? We answer that question in the affirmative, and maintain that He who is the fountain of Israel shall fulfil His Word and prophecy, which we find in Ezekiel 37:1-14, called the valley of dry bones.

MISTAKEN IDEAS.

We are aware that there are mistaken ideas current among divines, based on the theory that the vision of those dry bones has reference to the conversion of the Gentile nations; or, that the event spoken of is the resurrection of the dead—ideas which cannot be admitted as true, as being not in accordance with this prophetic word, neither with the fundamental doctrines of the New Testament. The conversion of an individual, or Gentile nations, is never called in Scripture, "the whole house of Israel, or the land of Israel," neither is the resurrection of the dead called by the name of "dry bones." We know the dust of ages shall arise, the voice of the archangel shall be heard (1 Thess. 4:16), and the resurrection of the dead shall be accomplished instantaneously—that is, the whole body at once, and not by degrees, as we find it to be the case in this vision of Ezekiel.

THE TRUE KEY.

We have the true key to this vision in the eleventh to the fourteenth verses, and every unbiassed mind can read and find it. Jehovah Adonai said to Ezekiel, "Son of man, these bones are the whole (all) house of Israel. . . . Lo, I am opening your graves ["kabar"—original not "Shool"], and bring you in into the land of Israel, and have caused you to rest (original), to put down in your own land (adamah), which emphatically means the land of Canaan (Ezek. 36:6, 36:17, 36:24).

WHAT IS PROPHECY?

Prophecy is not given to the world to satisfy the curiosity of the world; it is like a beautiful picture of a landscape in which, in bold relief, the outlines and the lines of demarcation and division are drawn of the objects brought to our view, although some dim lines remain of objects which are placed in the background. In older times God, overlooking the ages, did give by His Spirit such a picture to show to His prophets of the ages to come; they saw realities before their eyes, and in their visions and dreams the future time stood in bold relief before their eyes. They felt the truth, and they saw all the distinctive lines and also the lines and objects in the background. In this respect the vision of the valley of dry bones can be called a prophetic pictorial landscape of Israel's dispersion and restoration in the latter days (Gen. 49 : 1).

TWOFOLD DIVISIONS.

It gives a retrospect of what those bones were in former time—namely a political and ruling power among the nations, and also, that those bones as a nation, as a whole nation, shall be re-established and reinstated in their former political prestige and power.

WHY THE JEWS ARE COMPARED TO BONES.

It is indeed a strange expression, that the remaining substance of the people of Israel should be called (verses 1 and 2) "bones," and "dry bones," yea, "bones of the slain" (verse 9), leading our thoughts to a battle-field where we find the remains of such persons who were before in existence; and, stranger still, looking at the derivation of the word "bones" in the Hebrew language, which primarily signifies "strength," we have two ideas brought before our mind—namely, former strength and strength yet remaining in existence, although in a state of weakness. The bones are not decayed, nor pulverized to dust. They are lying in a dislocated and lost condition—a condition visible to all passers-by. The prophet says: "And He caused me to pass by them round about."

Let us keep in mind that these bones were all of one and the same people, not any amalgamation should be found (verse 11). "Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel;" thus Israel should never become extinct, or, like all other nations, become mixed. Truly the Jews are to this very day a homogeneous people in pedigree and consanguinity.

No better description could ever have been given to the Jews than that of "dry bones" in regard to their religious services. The power and love of money have left their visible traces upon their souls, and yet the character of Israel is not devoid of true courage and religious fervor. They have indeed a backbone to defy the whole world, as they have done in their Diaspora. Isolated as they are, they are united, and although the sun of persecution has bleached those bones, yet they have borne his scorching rays with an endurance and patience above all other people. Indeed, the Jews are the stumbling-stones—in other words, the bones of contention. "It is but a Jew" is the derisive expression among many Christians. The Jews have been the axiom and the paradox of the ages past, and will be of the ages to come.

THEIR NUMBER.

The number of those dry bones is said, in verse 2, to be "very many," the valley is "full of dry bones." At the present time the number of Jews are as many as at the time of David and Solomon—about ten millions of souls. Where is the place on the globe which has not been trod by those weary travellers? They have been forerunners of civilization, and in every land, clime, and region of the earth the sons of Abraham are known as a peculiar race, as an enigma of the ages.

THEIR OBSTINACY.

In verse 3 we read the question: "Son of man, can these bones live?" and an answer is given: "O Lord Jehovah, Thou, Thou hast known" (Dr. Young). Here is given a plain description of the deep misery of Israel, and also of the great doubt of Israel's conversion; and truly, if to the thousands of Christians, and to the majority of ministers, should be propounded that question, Will the Jews ever be brought back to Canaan, and shall they be converted by the coming of Jesus, the King of Israel? Oh, how very few would be found who indeed believe "that the Jews shall be called to the highest place among the nations of the earth."

ISRAEL'S NATIONALITY.

There is only one solution by which this problem of dry bones can be solved, and that is "to keep before our minds what those bones were before they came in their dislocated condition"—namely, a politico-theocratic nation. Those bones had before tendons, were in a state of activity, were clothed with the flesh or substance of political wealth, had political life, and stood as a political body before the nations of the East as a unique body politic. Israel was the head of the nations, not in strength or number, nor in great architectural and archaeological achievements, but in the ruling power of Jehovah, who had His radiant fulcrum in Jerusalem. There was no world-dominion on earth as long as in Israel was the Shechinah, and when that "indwelling" left, we read of the commission given to Nebuchadnezzar, Darius, Cyrus, Artaxerxes, and Augustus: "and the dry bones were scattered in the valley." The times of the Gentiles had commenced, and are still in continuance.

In the second place, the vision of Ezekiel declares emphatically that the whole house of Israel shall be re-established in the same manner as it has lost its political prestige and power.

NO HIATUS.

By God all things are seen in the present time. He overlooks the ages and events without interim. He sees things as they are and as they will be in one view. The vista of future ages are an accomplished fact for Him, therefore we have "no hiatus" in this vision of "dry bones." Eighteen hundred years have already elapsed since the Jews have been in Diaspora, and twenty-five hundred years since the ten tribes have lived in Persia, in the Afghan and Himalayan Mountains. But the word of the Watcher of heaven, who commanded that the tree of Israel should be laid low, has also decreed that it shall become once more the tree of liberty for all nations, planted on Mount Zion in Jerusalem. To cavil with the decree of Jehovah is not only folly, it is rebellion (Is. 46 : 9-13).

HUMAN INSTRUMENTALITY.

Verses 4-6 give us an insight to the work, and how it shall be performed. There it is plainly told that Jehovah shall do the work. He said plainly, "I will cause to enter—I will lay sinews—I put breath in you," or, more in accordance with the original, Jehovah Adonai says: "I am bringing in a spirit unto you, and ye have lived" (Dr. Young); and yet human instrumentality is not excluded. Human exertions and prayers, yea, human labor, shall be employed in connection with the wonderful restoration of Israel. Ezekiel is commanded to prophesy (verses 4, 7, 9, 10, 12). What a great promise! What a great honor to be a co-laborer with God! What a great incentive to prosecute a Jewish mission, and to labor in behalf of Israel; and how very little it is understood, in the present time, that we have lost sight of this glorious mission.

(To be concluded.)

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A New Heart Wanted.—At a Recent Meeting a Christian worker said: "I knew a gentleman who had a son that was fast going to ruin through strong drink. His father, not knowing what to do with him, sent him to Australia, where he thought new scenes might make him forget his evil habit; but after being there for three years he came home and died of delirium tremens. Dear friends, it is not the change of scenes or locality that will ever make us better; nothing can avail but the blessing craved by David, Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me."

A Ballet Girl Turned Out-of-Doors.—Mr. Forbes whose Christian work among theatrical employes has been continued for more than seven years, said: "I had a letter from one of the ladies of the ballet who had attended my theatrical tea-meetings, held in Exeter Hall. She said that she was done with the stage, and that she had given her heart to Jesus. This young woman went home and told her parents that she had given herself to the Lord, and was no more going to appear on the stage. When they heard it they turned her out of the house, telling her she must seek a home elsewhere. A doctor's family, who were Christians, befriended her in this time of need; they furnished a room, and also supported her until she got proper employment. She is now married, and has a comfortable home. How true it is that 'When thy father and mother forsake thee then the Lord will take thee up.'"

A Maiden's Broken Heart Healed.—Miss Clugston, the founder of the Glasgow Home for Incurables, said: "I remember well the night that my father died, I lay in bed, and cried most of the night. I had a friend sleeping with me, and she, trying to soothe me, said: 'My dear, be still; you had your father for seven-and-twenty years, and I only had mine for seven; you are really better off than I was.' Two hours afterward she awoke and found me still weeping; her lecture had done me no good, but rather tended to make me worse; but, this time, in pitting tones, she prayed, 'Oh, Lord, heal a maiden's heart that is well-nigh broken.' This prayer did its work; it came like a healing balm to my troubled soul, and I went to sleep, believing that the Lord, for Jesus' sake, had healed the deep wound. Oh, dear friends, lecturing a soul about its faults will never bring them to Jesus!"

A Cancer Victim.—Some Time Ago I was going through the cancer hospital in London. I spoke to one woman there who I saw was a great sufferer. She told me that her husband was an artist, and that he often brought his children to see her. I spoke to her of her suffering, but she replied, 'Oh, I would not mind that, if it were not for my children, who come to my bedside and say, "Oh, mother dear, do come home, we so much need you!"' Poor children! they did not know that their mother would never rise from her bed again, until Jesus would call her home."

Torturing a Troubled Conscience.—"I Recollect a woman who once came to me and said: 'I wish, Miss Clugston, you would speak to Rob,' meaning her husband. I did speak to him, but unfortunately began by upbraiding the man with his sins, instead of pointing him to Jesus, where he would get a complete cure for them. After listening to me for some time, he said, 'Woman, be still; my conscience is bad enough.' Oh, I felt as if I were only mocking that man with his sin, and from that time I resolved never to speak to a man or woman about their sin, but to point them directly to Jesus, who is willing and ready to receive sinners, saving even to the uttermost all that come unto God by Him."

Jennie's Farewell.—Miss Clugston also said: "One morning I was sitting by the bedside of a dying girl. I sat through all the night until the sun rose on a beautiful June morning. When I rose and looked at Jennie, I saw that her end was very near. I went to her brother, and said: 'Jamie, Jennie would like to see you before she dies.' Jamie followed me silently into the room, and he holding one hand of his sister, and I the other, he stood and waited for the end. Her mother was sitting, weeping, and turning to her, I said, 'This is your place, not mine.' 'No, no,' she replied; 'it was you that led Jennie into the light of God's salvation, therefore you have been her best earthly friend; and very soon Jennie passed without a struggle to her home of rest above.'"

What A Lady's Kind Look Did.—Mr. William Forbes said: "A short time ago a lady, who wore the blue ribbon, was entering a railway station in Liverpool, when she met a man who also was wearing the blue ribbon, and noticing it she bowed to him. Missing her train she spoke to the man, and he said: 'You do not know, ma'am, how much good you did to me just now. It was only last night I went to a Gospel Temperance meeting, and there was induced to sign the pledge, and put on the blue ribbon. Just now I was almost yielding to the temptation to go into a grog-shop, but when you passed and bowed to me, that settled the question. I have now, thank God, not the least inclination to go in.' Dear friends, how much good a kind word or a kind look will do to a weak brother or sister!"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Treasury Statement Issued Last Week completes the accounts for the financial year, which closed on June 30th. It was anticipated with more than usual interest, owing to the depressing rumors circulated from time to time. It appears that the total revenue for the year from all sources was $322,590,776, which is about six million dollars less than it was expected to be, and about twenty-six millions less than it was the preceding year. Of this falling off, fourteen millions was in customs-duties and about nine millions in the internal revenue. The total value of the imports was less than that of the imports of the preceding year by nearly one hundred millions. They were, however, less than the exports by $170,000,000. The year's expenditure was $262,788,452, which is nearly nineteen millions more than last year. The increase is under the head of "ordinary." There was a decrease in the amount of interest on the debt balanced by an increase in pensions. The decrease of the public debt during the year was $63,494,708. This reduction is much smaller than that of the previous year, which was $101,000,000; but it is larger than might have been expected in the depressed state of trade, and perhaps larger than it was prudent to make, considering how seriously the taxes, direct and indirect, it involves press upon the people.

Gen. Grant's Condition Caused an Increase of anxiety last week. He is growing perceptibly weaker day by day, though the progress of the disease is not so rapid as it was some weeks ago. The clear mountain air is evidently doing the patient good, and he himself expresses the belief that he could not have lived through the hot months in New York. He seldom speaks, but uses his pencil and pad continually, and has even been able to add to his book several paragraphs covering matters that he omitted to mention. They are chiefly recollections of military companions and friends in civil life. His slight relapse last week was due to an effort he made to lie down. He hoped that he might get some natural sleep by quitting his chair for his couch. He has not lain down for some months, and the attempt satisfied him that it was imprudent. A coughing spell was induced, which increased his debility. The Fourth of July brought him many sympathetic letters from all parts of the Union. A specimen letter of his mail is one from an ex-Confederate, which gave the General much pleasure. In the course of it the writer said: "I hope you will allow one who, when a boy, laid down his arms at Appomattox and pledged allegiance to the Union, to express his warmest sympathy for you in your suffering. Dear General, I have watched your movements from the hour you gave me my horse and sword and told me to 'go home and assist in making a crop.' I have been proud to see the nation do you honor, and now, dear General, in the hour of your pain, I weep that so brave, so magnanimous a soul must suffer as you do. My prayer to God daily is that you may be restored to perfect health, and be assured that I am not the only ex-Confederate who sends his prayers daily to the Throne of Grace for your restoration."

The Ohio Prohibitionists Met in Convention at Springfield on July 1st, and nominated a full ticket. Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge was re-elected permanent secretary. The platform demands a Prohibition amendment, and opposes license tax or regulation of the liquor traffic. It says friends of Prohibition should not be controlled by either of the old parties, because both have shown themselves subservient to the liquor interest. It declares the rum power must be vanquished by a new party devoted expressly to that purpose. It describes the two wings of the great liquor party, one as advocating license and the other taxation and regulation of the liquor traffic, leaving no loyal citizen any alternative except to join the Prohibition party. It favors moral suasion as a means of reform, favors Civil Service Reform, full protection to the ballot, wants divorce based on divine law, expresses sympathy for the negro race, opposes violent changes in tariff, indorses the voters' union memorial, favors civil Sabbath, and recognizes civil government as ordained by God.

The President has Appointed ex-Representative Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois, to be First-Assistant Postmaster-General in the room of Mr. Malcolm Hay, who has resigned, owing to ill-health. Efforts were made to secure the appointment for a New York man, but, as in so many cases in which efforts are made, they failed. Mr. Stevenson is under fifty years of age, and when he was in Congress proved that he had no lack of energy. The Times correspondent says: "Mr. Hay has been an invalid from the moment he was sworn in, and had hoped, by active employment, to be able to forget his bodily ills and to regain his shattered health. For a time abundant occupation served a healthful purpose, but recently Mr. Hay's weakness had become so oppressive that he repeatedly found it difficult to reach his home without assistance."

The Pestilence in Spain Continues its Dreadful ravages. The number of deaths is now placed at nine thousand, more than half of which occurred last week. A correspondent of the New York Herald, who cables an account of a four days' visit to Murcia, states that thirty thousand persons have fled from the place since the epidemic broke out. Its streets are deserted, eighty per cent of its stores are closed, and hardly a house remains in which a cholera case has not occurred. The yellow-covered stretcher on which the cholera-stricken sick and dead are carried through the streets is one of the common sights. Deaths have become so frequent that the tolling of the church-bells, usual there on such events, has been forbidden. Including the full normal population of nearly one hundred thousand people, one person in each thirty has already had the cholera, and one person in each seventy-five of the population has been buried within three weeks. Under the most favorable conditions, one thousand more deaths are expected by the physicians before the fall. Many pathetic incidents are reported, among which is one of the complete clearance of every living person from a house by the disease. One of the houses in an infected district remaining closed, the authorities ordered the doors forced, and then the rotting bodies of its inhabitants were found. They had apparently died of malignant cholera after closing the house, and so suddenly that they had been unable to summon aid. Dr. Castello Tapia, the chief of the Board of City Physicians, says: "If proper precautions are taken the cholera will not spread through Spain nor to other countries. But with quarantines loosely enforced, as at present, its spread is certain."

The Conservatives in England Achieved a series of victories last week. A member of Parliament who accepts office vacates his seat in the House, and has to seek re-election from his district, as, unlike our system, the English constitution requires Cabinet officers to be members of Parliament. The Peers in the Cabinet retain their seats in the House of Lords, but Cabinet officers who are members of the House of Commons must face the ordeal of an election. There were consequently several elections last week, in all of which the Conservatives were victorious. The election which excited the greatest interest was that of Lord Randolph Churchill, who is Secretary for India. He was the member for the little borough of Woodstock, the greater part of which is owned by his brother, the disolute Duke of Marlborough. When he was last elected he had the active support of his father, who was then duke; but since then his father died, and the new duke announced his intention of opposing his brother's election. Lord Randolph Churchill remained in London attending to the duties of his office instead of going to Woodstock to canvass, as a candidate usually does. His place was, however, well filled by his wife, who is the daughter of Mr. Leonard Jerome, of New York. She canvassed every elector, and worked persistently to insure her husband's election. Her greatest achievement was her conquest of her brother-in-law, whom she won over to Lord Randolph's side. Lord Randolph was re-elected by an increased majority, a triumph for which he is indebted to his American wife.

Much Curiosity is Felt about the Irish policy of the new British Cabinet. It is very certain that Mr. Parnell is not working without the prospect of compensation, and he is working hard for the Conservatives. What he is to have as payment excites general speculation. It is believed that some large concession for Ireland has been promised him. As several members of the Liberal Cabinet are willing to give a partial measure of self-government to Ireland, and Mr. Chamberlain has openly advocated the submission of the land question to an Irish council, it is evident that the Conservatives must have offered more than that in order to secure Mr. Parnell's assistance. The Irish voters in all the districts in which elections have taken place have voted the straight Conservative ticket, and at Wakefield Mr. Sexton, Mr. Parnell's chief lieutenant, was present to see the Irish vote properly delivered to the Tory candidate. Mr. Parnell appears to hold the balance of power, and the rival parties show a disposition to bid against each other for his support.

The French Socialists have Issued their platform in preparation for the elections. It is significant chiefly as an indication of the objects aimed at by the organization. Among the planks are the following: The abolition of the Presidency; the abolition of the Senate; bestowal upon the Assembly of the power to dismiss Ministers of State; the settlement of all questions of war and of constitutional revision by popular vote; confiscation of Church property; the separation of Church and State; the legal equality of illegitimate and legitimate children; the gradual abolition of standing armies; the free education of children at the public expense, and the free feeding of children at the public expense in all cases where they are not otherwise properly provided for; political amnesty; reduction of the hours of labor; prohibition of the employment of children under fourteen years of age; prison reform; the maintenance of disabled workmen at the public expense.

A Serious Labor Strike Agitated Chicago Last week. The drivers and conductors of the West Division Street Railroad Company, to the number of one thousand, went on strike, and prevented the cars from running. There was trouble between the men and the company about a month ago, when the men demanded an increase of wages and a re-arrangement as to hours of work. The company conceded the demand, but shortly afterward discharged the leaders in the movement. The men thereupon inferring that the discharged men were being punished for the part they had taken in securing the concession, demanded their re-instatement, and when the company refused, they struck in a body. The company engaged non-union men to take their places, but the strikers and citizens who sympathized with them gathered in the streets, upset the cars, and attacked the new employees with paving-stones and other missiles. The car service was suspended in consequence on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, and on each day there were savage fights between the mob and the police. It was reported on Saturday that the Mayor, who is endeavoring to act as mediator, had prevailed on the men to submit their grievances to arbitration.

The Acquittal of Mrs. Dudley, the Woman who shot O Donovan Rossa, is not a satisfactory termination of that case. The jury acquitted her on the familiar ground of insanity, though her evidence and the running commentary on the proceedings she kept up during the trial indicated a mind remarkably clear and keen. If the jury had returned the American verdict, "justifiable insanity," they would probably have accurately expressed their opinions. It was evident to those present at the trial that the prevalent feeling in court was one of abhorrence of the dynamiters and their business, and a conviction that if Rossa had been killed he would have had no more than his deserts. But whether that is true or not, it does not affect the question really at issue. Mrs. Dudley committed an offence against the law, and the character of her victim did not justify her act. One of the most alarming signs of the times is the disposition of people to take the law into their own hands, and verdicts of this kind foster that disposition.

The Case of Preaching on the Boston Common was before the Superior Court last week. On July 3d Judge Aldrich rendered his decision in the case of Rev. W. F. Davis, whom he ordered the jury to find guilty on the ground that the question was one of law entirely. He declared that the question has nothing to do with the right of free speech or preaching the Gospel. Judge Aldrich said he could not doubt that the city had a perfect right to make such provision for the preservation of the Common as it might deem necessary. The provision was not made to prevent the freedom of speech or public worship, but to preserve order on the Common. Mr. Davis has appealed.

The Sunday Horse Races in Chicago are not likely to be continued. This is not due to municipal action, but to the efforts of the churches. An organized movement, in which the leading churches have united, has been ably conducted through a representative committee, with the result of inducing two railroads to discontinue the Sunday excursions to the Driving Park, where the races have been held. It is now reported that the lessee of the Park has given his promise that the races shall be stopped. This may encourage the committee to continue its good work and commence a campaign against the Sunday theatres.

An Octopus, or Devil Fish, Recently Caused the death of a sailor at Ballenas Bay, California. A number of Chinese junks are in the harbor of San Diego preparing for a fishing excursion. It is usual for them to go to Ballenas Bay, where they can obtain the abalone, the beautiful shell which finds a ready sale for decorative purposes all over the United States. An inquiry of one of the sailors, however, elicited the fact that the party would not on this occasion go to their usual station. The reason is that on their last visit one of the men, whose first trip this was, strayed away from the rest and entered the sea, a short distance away. They saw him standing barlegged, with the water up to his knees, when suddenly he was seized by one of his legs by an immense octopus, and in a second he was tripped over, drawn out into deep water, and drowned before the rest of the Chinamen realized what was the matter with their fellow-shell-gatherer. The boats of the Chinamen were high up on the beach, and when they were got into the water, no trace could be seen of the missing man. Several days afterward his remains floated ashore in a horrible state of mutilation. The octopus, from the description of it, must have been a monster, each arm measuring about ten feet. They therefore prudently resolved to give a wide berth to a bay infested with such dangerous creatures. It would be well if similar prudence was shown in our cities. The gambling saloons and other haunts of vice are always crowded, though many strong men have been seen to fall there into death, spiritual and eternal (Prov. 4: 14-16).

A Bejewelled Dog is Advertised for in a daily journal. The owners think it has been stolen. It had around its neck a gold collar, bearing a plate on which its name was inscribed, and the plate was studded with gems, diamonds, rubies, and a sapphire. The advertisement states that the possessor of the dog may keep the collar if he will return the dog to its owners. It is probable that an arrangement will be made on that basis which will be satisfactory to both the owner and the thief. The two parties have doubtless a different standard of values, the one esteeming the dog above the collar, the other preferring the collar to the dog. A similar difference of opinion prevails in other matters. While some men who profess to be Christians are directing all their energies to the acquisition of wealth, which they esteem as their chief good, others, enlightened by the Spirit, spend their lives in seeking lost souls for their Master, esteeming them the most precious treasures on earth (1 Thess. 2: 10).

The Purchase of an Abandoned Vessel made the fortune of a Baltimore sea captain. A Baltimore journal states that a lady in that city is expecting the arrival there of her husband, a sailor under thirty years of age, with a vessel which is his own property. In the course of a recent voyage to the Bahama Islands he saw on Hogsty Reef a wrecked steamer which he examined closely. He made inquiries, and found that she was the British steamer "Dawn," which had struck on the reef and been abandoned. The underwriters had sold her to a merchant at Inagua, at the price of old iron, and the young captain had no difficulty in purchasing her from him at a small advance. He spent a week upon the vessel with a native crew, did some repairs, and when he got her off the reef she floated as smoothly as if just launched. She is believed to be worth $95,000. There are many moral wrecks in society which have been abandoned as hopeless cases, but which might yet be saved if Christians had some of this young captain's energy. The reward of such work is assured (James 5: 20).

A too Appropriate Text Provoked Laughter in a church in Cleveland, O., the other Sunday morning. The regular pastor was absent, and his place was occupied by a brother clergyman, whose clerical attire showed that some accident had befallen him. He wore a long pepper-and-salt sack coat, which the congregation recognized as the property of their sexton, and a long rent in his trousers secured by pins was plainly visible, while an abrasion on his face marred his personal attractiveness. It appeared that the clergyman is fond of bicycle exercise, and his house being at some distance from the church at which he had promised to preach, he concluded to travel there on his favorite conveyance. Unhappily for him, as he passed his friend's parsonage, a big Newfoundland dog saw and recognized him, and gave him a too boisterous greeting, overturning the machine and spilling the clergyman in the dust. It was too near service time to return home for fresh clothing; so borrowing the sexton's coat and temporarily pinning up the rent in his trousers, he went on the platform. There was some tittering among the small boys over his disordered dress, but the older members of the congregation only pitied him until he announced his text, when they too joined in the unseemly laughter. The text was: "But it was so . . . that the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house" (11 Kings 12: 6). It is stated that the excellent sermon which followed failed of its effect, the congregation being concerned with the application of the text to the preacher. It is so with moral falls, of which there is of late a sadly increasing number in the ranks of the clergy in this country. Though we may hope that erring preachers repent and receive God's forgiveness, their ministerial usefulness is at an end. That fact Paul evidently realized when he gave his caution to Timothy (1 Timothy 3: 2-7).

A Dying Man's Solution of a Religious Question is a remarkable illustration of the prevalent indifference or ignorance of what true religion is. Two brothers, both long past middle life, and both wealthy merchants, were lying ill two weeks ago, the one in Brooklyn and the other at his residence in New York. Louis, the younger brother, was dying of consumption, while his brother Ben was prostrated by pneumonia; but neither knew of the illness of the other. The physician attending Louis on June 9th pronounced his case hopeless, and frankly told his patient his opinion. The dying man's landlady, supposing he would like to see a clergyman, asked him what denomination he would prefer. "I don't know," he said. "I've never been a religious man. I'll wait and see my brother Ben, and whatever faith he professes I'll profess the same." But Ben lay unconscious, and made no profession. On June 11th Louis died, and two days after Ben died also, and no profession was made by either of them. There is no reason to deplore the fact; a profession made in such circumstances would have done no good. But there is very grave reason to deplore the fact that a man could have lived so many years surrounded by religious influences and yet have the idea that a faith professed on no better ground than that his brother had professed it was worth professing at all. God will accept sincere death bed repentance, but a mere profession is a hollow mockery (John 3: 3).

Two Brothers Met in a Railroad Depot Recently, says a Boston journal. They were elderly men, and had not met before in thirty years. They looked at each other intently for a minute, and then recognition was mutual. "Tom," said the one; "Bob," said the other, and clasped hands. "You look horribly poor; can I do nothing for you?" said one; "I'm off to Europe now, but I'll look you up when I come back. Good-by." The speaker was expensively dressed, and his lavish display of costly jewelry showed his vulgarity. His brother was poorly dressed in a sun-browned black suit, his boots worn and patched, and he carried a shabby valise. "That's a brother of mine," said the shrewdly-dressed man to his companions; "obstinate mule. Stuck to religion all his life, and there's what it's done for him. No success for him, poor wretch." The speaker had been a defaulter, had escaped to Europe, returned when the affair had blown over, had gone into politics, and was the powerful boss of the lowest district of his State. The brother he had just parted from in pity was the clergyman of a poor church in the mining district, and had labored for thirty years among his indigent flock on the mountains, enduring hardship with them, as poor as they were, often hungry, always ill-clad, but the best-loved—almost idolized—man in the State. The two brothers went thence in their several ways, one to the West and the other to Europe, and "the lookers-on wondered," says the reporter, "which was really the successful man." That point will not always remain undecided (James 5: 1-8).

THE PITIFULNESS OF THE LORD THE COMFORT OF THE AFFLICTED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, when a Collection was made on Behalf of the Public Hospitals.

"Behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy."—JAMES 5: 11.

A Consoling Statement—A God of Feeling—III. Lessons to be Learned—Patience—Penitence—Pity.

We are far too apt to entertain hard thoughts of God. The horrible atheism of our depraved nature continually quarrels with the Most High; and when we are under His afflicting hand, and things go cross to our will, the evil of our nature becomes sadly evident. When sorely distressed, we are too apt to think and to speak as we ought not to do concerning the Most High. Let us never forget that our hard speeches have all been false speeches, and that our suspicions of our God have always been libels upon Him. When we have not thought and spoken well of His name, we have thought and spoken amiss. Looking back, we desire, if possible, to blot out every murmuring thought with our tears, and we would cancel every complaining word with humble sorrow. We would eat our bitter words; they were all unwarranted, and therefore with deep repentance we call them back.

On taking a survey of our whole life, we see that the kindness of God has run all through it like a silver thread. Goodness and mercy have followed us all our days, ever pursuing us, even when we have wickedly fled from them. Even our apparent ills have been real blessings.

THE BEST PIECE OF FURNITURE

I have ever had in my house is the cross of affliction. Adversity is the richest field in all the farm of life. We have never reaped such a harvest from any seed as from that which fell from our hand while tears were falling from our eyes. When we have gone forth weeping, bearing precious seed, we have invariably come again rejoicing, bringing our sheaves with us. Oh, thou sufferer, when thy bed grew hard beneath thee, and thy pain was exceeding great, it may be that thy groanings and complaints were not altogether those of sorrow, but a measure of rebellion mingled with them. For this be ashamed and confounded. Confess those rebellions, acknowledge that thy hard thoughts were all founded upon error, and ask for grace to be henceforth at one with thy Lord. Thou who hast suffered the loss of property or the loss of beloved friends, thou, too, perhaps, hast thought of God foolishly; remember those thoughts with shame, and be all the more eager at once to bear willing testimony that the Lord is good, and that His mercy endureth for ever. True it is, however circumstances may look otherwise, that "the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy." Oh, that we may never bear false witness against our God! The Apostle James in this passage aims at setting us right in our judgments of the Lord's dealings, that patience may become an easier lesson.

I. Notice that when James is exhorting us to full confidence in God in the hour of trial, he gives us

AN INSTRUCTIVE INSTANCE.

He quotes the story of Job. In these days everything is doubted, and a new theory is sure to run like fire among stubble; for this fickle age delights, like the Athenians, in everything new, however absurd it may be. Hence no part of Scripture has been let alone, and of the Book of Job it has been said that it is a drama, a fiction, a fine piece of Oriental imagination. But see how the New Testament protects the Old. How can Job be an imaginary character? Does the Spirit of God quote for our guidance a fictitious personage? Does He set Job before us as an example when Job never existed? The thing is too absurd to contemplate for a single moment. There was such a person as Job; and possibly the present passage may confirm us in the belief that the patriarch lived in the earliest ages, since this apostle, when mentioning the prophets, places Job in the forefront of them, and quotes his case in preference to any other.

HAPPY PEOPLE.

Observe, that when this apostle introduces Job, it is with the view of pointing out the tender mercy of God in his case; and he begins by saying, "Behold, we count them happy which endure." The pitifulness and tender mercy of God are to be seen in the happiness of those who are called to suffer. "We count them happy which endure." Who counteth them happy? It is a counting which is not general. This arithmetic is only known to faith, and must be learned of the Lord Jesus. "We," that is, the Church of God, count them happy who are counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake. We count those happy who endure, because our Saviour has taught us so to reckon. Did He not say, "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely; for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you?"

I may venture to say that the more sensible part of mankind in some measure concur with the people of God in this accounting. We count that man happy who has passed through trial and hardship with a brave endurance. Such life is of an interesting and manly kind; but life without struggle and difficulty is thin and tasteless. How can a noble life be constructed if there be no difficulty to overcome, no suffering to bear? What was there about Dives, and his fine linen, and sumptuous fare, to make a life of? Who envies him? Studying the lives of eminent men, we come to this conclusion, that on the whole it is good for a man to bear the yoke; good for a man to breast the billows; good for a man to pass through fire and through water, and so to learn sublime lessons. When we see what poor, paltry things those who are nursed in the lap of luxury, and consequently never come to a real manhood, "we count them happy that endure." As a matter of faith, and even as a matter of reasonable judgment, "we count them happy which endure."

THE SOLID GAIN.

This counting is not mere fancy, but it is a correct estimate: there is a happiness in affliction which none will doubt who have tasted it. Within the rough shell of sorrow we find a sweet kernel. When we look to the end of affliction, when we see all its comfortable fruit, when we mark what it corrects, and observe what it produces, we judge that it is no mean blessing. Happy is the man who has been enabled to endure; he rises from the depths of woe like a pearl-finder from the sea, rich beyond comparison. He has gained more than he has lost, even though he has lost everything, if he has gained contentment, conformity to the will of God, a deep experience, and a surer hope. Beloved, those of us who have done business upon great waters, and have endured abundant pain, count them happy that endure, even while they are enduring.

Endurance also works in the child of God a close clinging to God, which produces near and dear communion with Him. Have you not, in time of trouble, found yourself admitted to inner chambers, which aforetime had been closed to you? Oh, the rare fellowship of tried saints! Sorrows reveal to us the Man of Sorrows. Griefs waft us to the bosom of our God. See the little chicks to-day in the sunshine; they are running all over the yard to gather what they can; but a hawk is in the sky, and the mother calls them with a sharp alarm; they perceive the danger, and now they thrust themselves into her feathers and are hidden beneath her wings. He was a much afflicted man who wrote, "He shall cover thee with His feathers, and under His wings shalt thou trust."

Beside, the Lord has a choice way of manifesting Himself unto His servants in their times of weakness. I speak what I do know; for I have trodden "that path which no bird of prey knoweth, neither hath the falcon's eye seen it,"—the path upon which shines the inward personal revelation of God. I have never known more blissful seasons than those which my Lord vouchsafed me when I was abused by men, and had to fight a weary battle. After all, there is no place in all our pilgrim ways which, taken for all in all, has all of Humiliation. The tops of the Delectable Mountains are royal spots; from thence we sometimes see the Golden City; but these are heights too steep for our trembling feet continually to stand upon; the lowly valley suits us better, though flesh and blood find it hard to go down-hill. Here the herb called heart's-ease growth luxuriantly, and he that weareth it is happier than the courtier in silk and velvet. Delightful is that well-shaded valley, where the shepherd's boy sits and sings among his father's sheep—

"He that is down need fear no fall;

He that is low, no pride;

He that is humble ever shall Have God to be his guide."

Bunyan truly says, "The Valley of Humiliation is of itself as fruitful a place as any the crow flies over." Chiefly is it so because in its wilderness the Lord speaks to our hearts. To His child when passing through the glens of tribulation the Lord saith, "Certainly I will be with thee." In the furnace of affliction the Lord manifests Himself to His chosen as He doth not to the world—yea, as He does not even to those of His people who are basking in prosperity; therefore, "we count them happy which endure."

Even in worldly histories it is by enduring hardness that men build their memorials. Who that has read the classics has not heard of Mutius Scævola? and why? He was a valiant man, but he did not win his name by a common deed in battle. His fights are unrecorded; but you have heard of his laying his right hand upon the burning coals of an altar, to let Por-senna see how a Roman could endure pain without shrinking. When he suffered his right hand to burn he was writing his name in his country's annals. A thousand instances prove that only by endurance can names be of history. To make a man a man, to bring his manhood forward, and to make other men see it, there must be endurance. Read the lives of any who have become the leaders of our race; read the stories of any that are written in the bead-roll of fame, and you shall find that not without trial did they come to be renowned. Poor tailors, husbandmen, and apprentices live in the story of the church because they counted not their lives dear to them for Christ's sake. Simple maids and wives, unlettered and poor, are heard of to this day, and shall be heard of in eternity, because they were burned as martyrs for the truth. Who would have heard of Ann Askew if it were not that she was put upon the rack, and when every bone was out of joint, and all her body was in exquisite torture, she baffled her tormentors.

You may, if you please, enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; but if God intends to honor you, you will choose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God. If you would reign in Christ's kingdom, you must drink of His cup, and be baptized with His baptism. Do not therefore look down upon those who suffer, but rather look up to them as among the higher classes of our race. The trials of Job elevated him into the peerage of the saints, and therefore we gather from this honorable result of endurance, "that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy," when He sends afflictions to His beloved ones.

Once again, in order to see the pitifulness of God in sorrow, we must see for, saith the apostle, "Ye have seen the end of the Lord." God's end in affliction is that which proves that He is very pitiful, and of tender mercy. Does it not strike you as rather a singular thing that when James wants to show us that the Lord is pitiful, and of tender mercy, he points us to Job on a dunghill, with all his property gone, with his children dead, with his wife ill-advicing him, with his friends provoking him, and himself covered with sore blains from head to foot? Who can see the pitifulness and tender mercy of God there? Nobody that is blind; but he who has had his eyes opened by the Spirit of God can see it there, because he does not look so much at the process as at the result; he stays not with the crucible and the furnace, but joyously gazes upon the pure gold which comes from the refining pot. We see not so much how grace works as what it works.

First, remember that the Lord's end in sending affliction to His people is corrective. Sanctified sorrow is a sharp frost which kills the germs of spiritual disease. Our griefs, like a hail-storm, break off the buds from the branches of sin, so that they do not produce the black, accursed fruit of actual transgression. How much we owe to the knife which cuts out the canker and the gangrene! Christ's vines would soon be in an evil case if it were not for the pruner.

AN EDUCATION.

Further, our trials are an education for the future. I do not think Job was fit to have any more substance until his heart had been enlarged by trouble; then he could bear twice as much as before. A man of God is not prepared to enjoy success till he has tasted defeat. Many an heir of heaven will never be fit for heaven till first of all he has been brought near to the gates of hell. You have been strengthened and prepared and made ready for a nobler future by your late experience of grief. A traveller said to me yesterday, speaking of the heat, How different it is from cold; for the more you suffer heat the less you can endure it; but the more you are tried with cold the more you can bear it, for it hardens you. I am sure it is so as to the influences of prosperity and adversity. Prosperity softens and renders us unfit for more of itself; but adversity braces the soul, and hardens it to patience.

Beloved, I would not have you forget that "the end of the Lord" is always with His tried people to give them greater happiness as the result of it. Job's double portion was an instructive type of what God does with His children in some form or other after trial. "Ye have seen the end of the Lord." Job came to the end of his words with great bitterness and sorrow of heart: but God's end was not yet; but when it came it was glorious, and full of joy for His servant. Mark in Job 31:40, it is written, "The words of Job are ended," ended amid thistles and cockle; but the end of the Lord was very different, for He loaded His servant with pieces of money and earrings of gold, and blessed his latter end more than his beginning. He will restore thy soul even in this life, and give thee joy and rest out of thy sorrow.

II. Secondly, our trials make

A CONSOLING STATEMENT:

"The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy." Observe that this is the teaching of God's holy Word; and therefore, if we have at this moment no evidence of it perceptible to sight or sense, we are bound to believe it all the same. I ask the child of God to settle this in His mind. "Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart." Though as for me, "my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped;" yet surely God is good to His own people. Whatever appears to conflict thereby, nothing can possibly shake the certainty of this fact, that "the Lord is pitiful, and of tender mercy."

How often the mercy of God is seen in sickness and suffering by His mitigating the pain and loss! One ounce more, and the back had broken, but that ounce never came; one breath more and the ship that even then staggered before the gale would have been driven to the bottom of the sea, but that breath of wind did not come. There is always a restraining of affliction, even in the hour of severest trial. Those who are washed in the blood of Jesus shall never be drowned in the sea of sorrow.

A PREVENTIVE.

So also in the overrulings of our sorrows His love is conspicuous. He often sends a great sorrow that we may not be compelled to bear a greater one. By fire He prevents conflagration; by pain He kills a greater pain. If you had not endured a certain trouble you might have been visited by seven troubles, each one more terrible than your present one. Thank God for the preventive operations of His providence!

In closing the second head I should like to say I wish we could all read the original Greek; for this word, "The Lord is very pitiful," is a specially remarkable one. It means literally that the Lord hath "many bowels," or a great heart, and so it indicates great tenderness. The God in whom some believe is unable to feel; they lay it down in their theology as an axiom that God cannot feel. This, however, I take leave to deny. God is able to do all things. I cannot regard Him as though He were a block of wood, or a mass of iron, unable to feel. On the contrary, He is represented to us as greatly feeling: the God of many bowels. You know how a sensitive person is affected at the sight of suffering. Some persons cannot bear to see a creature in pain; they are unmanned thereby, and begin to weep like children. Our God is not only pitiful, but very pitiful; not only of mercy, but of tender mercy.

III. Now I have to close with

out of the whole subject. I will but hint at them. The first is, be patient. The whole context teaches us patience. Read the chapter at home, and see how James continues to say, "Be patient." Be patient for this reason, that God is very pitiful, and of tender mercy. A person going to a surgeon will bear sharp pain when he is convinced that by such pain his cure will be wrought. If a man proposes to gash me with a lancet I decline his offer; but if I know that I shall die unless the incision be made, and if I believe that an intolerable pain will thus be assuaged, I say, "Welcome the knife." Let him cut without mercy, if by it he intends mercy. It might be unmerciful to stay the hand in such a case. Such knowledge should make us patient under divine chastisement.

The next lesson is, be penitent. You unconverted ones here to-day, if you are suffering and sorrowful, I want you to feel that God is sending this sorrow in love to your souls: He smites you that you may turn to Him in repentance; He chastens you that He may bring you to Himself, that you may not perish for ever. He "is very pitiful." His hand is strong to smite, but it is also strong to save. Return to thy Father, O thou prodigal! Though thou hast spent thy substance, though thou hast brought thyself to rags, return to thy Father; there is bread enough in His house; and, better still, there is love enough in His heart to welcome even thee.

The last lesson is, be pitiful. If God be pitiful and of tender mercy, children of God, you are to imitate Him, and to be pitiful too. This truth is to be remembered at all times; but just now you have an opportunity of showing your pitifulness toward the poor and sick of this great city. When you relieve the wants of a man in health you may possibly assist him in his vices; but in helping the sick poor you can do no wrong. The door of a hospital is open for good, and only for good. I am concerned to know that there are many beds unoccupied and many suffering persons kept out of the hospitals from lack of funds. Whole wards are rendered useless for want of income. In some cases the authorities are compelled to use those wards for persons who can pay for attendance; and though this is a good thing, yet I cannot forget that those who cannot pay are thus deprived of what they need so much more than others. You that have been sick yourselves should give liberally to-day out of sympathy; you that have never been sick ought to give twice as much out of gratitude. Yet I must correct myself; those who have been afflicted and healed should feel both sympathy and gratitude, and so should give the double, of those from whom I have asked double liberality. Let us try to give to this fourfold degree. When the box is passed round, be pitiful, and of tender mercy, like your Father and your God, and then the hospitals will be largely helped this day.

NEW BOOKS.

"HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH,"

by Philip Schaff. The fourth volume of Dr. Schaff's history now issued, deals with the period between 590 A.D. to 1073 A.D. It comprises the conversion of England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Germany, Scandinavia, and the Slavs. A third chapter is devoted to Mohammedanism, describing its "Position in Church History; The Home and Antecedents of Islam; The Life and Character of Mohammed; The Conquests of Islam; The Koran and the Bible; The Mohammedan Religion and Worship, and the Christian Polemics Against It." Chapter four is devoted to the Roman Catholic Church from Gregory I., "The Last of the Fathers the First of the Popes," to the deposition of the three rival popes in 1046. In the remaining chapters, Dr. Schaff gives a sketch of church life during the period, in its several aspects of morals and religion; Monasticism; Church Discipline; Church and State; Worship and Ceremonies; Doctrinal Controversies; Heretical Sects; The State of Learning, and closing with biographical sketches of the ecclesiastical writers. An immense amount of labor and research has been devoted to the production of this volume, which is one that the Christian student will find of great service to him in his historical studies. Pp. 799; published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

"WORKING PEOPLE AND THEIR EMPLOYERS," by Washington Gladden. Some home truths for both capitalist and workman, are contained in these lectures, and both will do well to read the whole book. We hear a little too much in these days about the rights of capital, and the rights of labor; this book touches the other side of the question, in reminding both capitalist and workman of their respective duties. Yet, after all, the views are one. When the capitalist does his duty, his workmen have their rights, and when the laborer does his duty, his employer has his rights. There is strong common-sense in Mr. Gladden's mode of dealing with this question which, of all others, is the most vital to this generation. There are men working here and in Europe to set class against class; and they are succeeding better than the world imagines. The workmen listen eagerly to speakers who know their grievances, and readily follow the advice of men who "know where the shoe pinches." They learn to look on their employers as their natural enemies, as men who keep them out of their rights, who take a mean advantage of them, and who, having in their hands the product of the joint efforts of capital and labor, do not fairly divide it. Can they be compelled to divide it fairly, so that the laborer shall get his full share of the profit? "Show us how we can compel them," say the workmen, "and we'll try." "Combine, organize unions," say the advisers, "and your united strength will protect the individual worker from oppression." The employer is quick to recognize the power that comes from the union of his men, and looks around him for the means of defence. It may insist on his paying so large a share of the gross profits to his workmen, that when he has paid that, and paid his office expenses, the cost of insurance and repairs, and has written off bad debts, the balance left to him will be so small that it would have been better for him if he had bought Government bonds with his money, and have kept out of business altogether. So he looks upon the union as an enemy, and prepares to fight it. Thus, the estrangement between workmen and their employers grows, and labor conflicts multiply. Now, is it not possible for workmen and their employers to look upon each other as colleagues, as joint workers in a common enterprise, having a joint interest in its success? Not while each class is jealously watching the other, and is suspiciously alert to clutch all that it can to the injury of the other. There must be mutual confidence. This is the aim Mr. Gladstone has in view in this little work. He is doing the most friendly thing he can do for both parties, and we heartily wish him success. "Blessed are the peace-makers," and especially blessed in our day is a peace-maker on this field of conflict. Sound advice both parties need, and they have it here from a man not afraid to tell his readers of their faults, and to assure each that the way to reconciliation and prosperity is not in hostile combination, in intimidation, but in a reformation of their own principles and conduct. The following are the subjects discussed, and it will be seen from the list how practical is the character of the teaching: Duty and Discipline of Work; Labor and Capital; Hard Times and

How to Ease Them; Rising in the World; The Household and the Home; Society and Societies; Strong Drink; The Duties of Employers; The Future of Labor. Pp. 241. Price, in paper covers, 25 cents; published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls.

THE RESIGNATION OF MR. GLADSTONE.

(See Illustration.)

The scene depicted in our illustration will long be memorable in the history of Great Britain. It was half past four o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday, June 9th. Members of Parliament were hurrying in excitement along the corridors of the magnificent building in which the two Houses of the British legislature hold their sittings. From the restaurant, the smoking-room, the committee-rooms, and the library the members passed in a stream to the dingy chamber of the Commons, until every seat was full, and the aisles and galleries were blocked by eager men, for the House has not in it nearly enough seats to accommodate all who belong to it. The cause of the unusual interest was the announcement that Mr. Gladstone had arrived, and every one wanted to hear what course he and his colleagues had decided to take.

They had not long to wait. The Premier was talking to his friend and protégé, Mr. Peel, whom he has made Speaker. There was no trace of the agitation in his face which had appeared there the preceding night when the vote was announced. He looked cheerful and self-possessed when he took his accustomed seat behind the despatch-box, which lies on the table near the head of the mace, the emblem of the majesty of the House. He rose as soon as the cheering which greeted him had subsided, and briefly announced that he and his colleagues "thought they were under an obligation to submit a dutiful communication to the Queen." Every one understood that resignation was the meaning of the significant phrase. The Queen was six hundred miles away in Scotland, and it would not have been courteous to her to state publicly the terms of a letter which she had not at that time received. Therefore the Premier used the vague expression which, however, was well understood.

So the House adjourned, to give the messengers time to go to and from the Queen's residence, at Balmoral, delivering their communication and bringing back her answer. The inconvenience was the subject of much complaint in the country, all public business being at a standstill until the Queen could make up her mind to travel to a point nearer to the Capital. The English press expressed strong disapproval of her neglect to make the journey, and pointed out that her predecessors had always consulted public convenience by remaining at hand whenever Parliament was sitting, while she not only went away during the session, but remained away, even when a ministerial crisis urgently required her presence.

A CLERGYMAN'S BARGAIN.

(See Illustration.)

An ingenious and painstaking clergyman, in a recent communication to the Brooklyn Union, gives the results of a calculation based on United States Government returns. He has been collecting statistics with the view of showing that the reproach brought against clergymen of being too highly paid is unjust. He declares that his investigation proves that in the United States a smaller sum is spent annually in supporting the clergyman of the country than is spent in KEEPING DOGS.

An incident reported in an exchange supplies another illustration equally significant of the injustice of the complaints made about the salaries clergymen receive. A hard-working minister, hurrying along a back street to pay a visit to a sick member of his flock, saw a group of laborers lying on a vacant lot smoking after their dinner. As he passed the group, he overheard one of them say, "I'd like to be a parson, and have nought to do but to walk about in a long black coat, and carry a walking-stick in my fist, and draw the spondulix."

Of course there was a laugh at the parson's expense, but he turned sharp round, and replied good-humoredly: "So you'd like to be a parson. How much do you get a week?"

"Twenty dollars," was the reply. "Well," said the curate, "though I'm only a poor man, I'll give you twenty dollars if you'll come with me for six days, and see how you like it. Then you'll be better able to talk about it."

The laborer tried to back out of it, but one of his companions, whose accent showed that he was an Englishman from Lancashire, said: "Nay, man, thou saidst thou'd like it, thou mun go with the parson." So he put on his coat and started with the curate amid a roar of laughter. The parson presently turned down an alley, and told his companion that they were going to visit a sick man, and that he must be very particular not to make a noise going upstairs.

"What might be the matter with him?" asked the laborer, with a show of anxiety.

"Small-pox," said the clergyman.

"Oh, then," said the man, "I'll just wait outside for you, sir, for I've not had it myself, and I've got a wife and children to think of."

"That's exactly my case," replied the curate, "for I have not had it, and I have a wife and children depending on me. But you agreed to come with me wherever I went."

The man seemed uneasy, and after a moment's hesitation he asked somewhat nervously, "And where are you going next?"

The curate told him they would have to visit a house where the father lay in his coffin and all the family were down with scarlet fever, and also a house where there was typhus; and on the morrow there would be a longer round. And after that he had to prepare a sermon and conduct a Friday night service. Then the next day he would have to conduct a funeral at a cemetery, six miles off, and prepare two sermons for Sunday and an address for the Sunday-school, and there were a lot of letters to be written in reply to a heavy mail. On Monday he was going around to beg money to buy a sewing-machine for a widow, and to find employment for her eldest boy.

"Say, dominie," said the man, "this ain't your regular work, is it? You are putting on a spurt."

"No; I am often busier than this. If you stay with me I can always find you plenty to do."

"When do you eat?"

The Clergyman's Bargain Broken.

"When I can; I have no regular hour. Sometimes I run into a restaurant and get a lunch in the middle of the day if I am near one, but often I cannot get anything until I get home at night."

"What time do you quit work?"

"I never quit until I go to bed, for there is always some work to be done after I get home."

"Well, dominie, I guess you earn your money. I take it all back that I said just now. I'd sooner be as I am, for I do get regular hours, and I don't risk my life that way you do in the fever-dens. I'll say no more again the parsons. It looks easier than it is. And say, as I'm breaking bargain, I'll pay fine. Here's a dollar-bill—I wish it was a V; you can give it to some of those poor critters you're visiting. I'll bet you can find a use for more than you've got to give away. Good-by; I'm going back to work that suits me better. Wish you luck." And the man hurried away with a new idea of clerical life.

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

A Little Refugee.

WE boys had our sham battle duly. The ramparts were a long, thick, high mound of earth, thrown up outside the city walls; the slopes of it were covered with soft green turf, and a broad walk ran all along the top, making a favorite promenade for the people, from which they could see the city lying beneath them. We went out through the Fishermen's Gate, beyond which was a beautiful suburb of Strasburg, called Rupert's Meadow, where there were avenues of limes and chestnuts in full leaf, with seats underneath them, and bands of music, and people dancing and singing, and strolling about in the splendid summer sunshine. But I saw many groups talking together, with very grave and anxious faces; and the bands played military music; and even the women and children looked a little less gay than usual.

There were scores of people who stood still to see our battle. Gretchen was there, in her scarlet petticoat and green bodice, holding Elsie by the hand, whose long gray frock and white close cap looked very odd and pretty in contrast with Gretchen's finery. I was one of the oldest of the students engaged in that affair; and Fritz and I drew lots which should be French and which Prussian general. Unluckily, I drew the lot of Prussian general. I say unluckily, because in the heat of the fight I forgot which side I was on, and I led my boys to the charge with so much eagerness, that we conquered the French army before we remembered who we were. There was a great deal of laughter at our mistake among those who were looking on; and an officer who was there clapped me on the back, saying I should make a good soldier when my turn came. He did not know that I was to be a citizen of England.

In coming home, Elsie was tired; so I carried her part of the way, for she was very small and light. Gretchen was talking to the baker's wife, and Sylvie was walking on with some of her girl friends. Elsie and I lagged behind. It turned out that the child had heard every syllable we had said in Lisbeth's attic the day before; and it had been weighing heavily upon her little mind.

"Max," she said, in her pretty, prattling voice, "is it true that the dear Lord Christ is not a little child now, just like me?"

"Once He was, Elsie," I said, feeling very sorry to say it; but I could not help telling her the truth about Him.

"But not now?" she said, mournfully. "How long ago was He a little child?"

"Oh! a great many hundred years ago," I said.

"Then He must be very, very old," said Elsie, in an exceedingly troubled little voice; "He has forgotten all about being a little child."

"No, no," I answered, "He has not forgotten being just like you; and He has not forgotten being a boy like me. Nobody is old in heaven. And then, Elsie, if He was only a child like you, still, there would be nobody for me to try to be like; and there would have been no one to die upon the cross for us, as He did. I have to think what sort of a boy He would have been if He was living now in Strasburg; just as you must think how good He was when He was His mother's little child. So the Lord Christ belongs to us all, Elsie. He is the elder brother of all men who will only come to Him."

All that seemed to come into my mind in a moment, as clear as daylight. The brotherhood men talked about was real, not in word only, but it was centred in Christ. We were truly brethren, all of us, because He was our Master.

"Is the dear Lord Christ brother to the soldiers who are going to fight with us?" asked Elsie.

"Yes, He is the brother of everybody who loves Him," I said. "The Bible says somewhere, 'He is not ashamed to call them brethren,'" ren." Oh! I hope He will never be ashamed of me!"

"I don't think I could have talked like that to any one else, but Elsie was such a little child, and she stroked my face so tenderly as I spoke."

"Is it better for Him to be bigger than me?" she asked.

"Why, yes!" I answered. "He can do so many things for you. You love me better than if I was only as big as you; I can carry you in my arms when you are tired. And he can do everything for you, Elsie."

"But the little vest will be too little," she said, half sobbing.

"Never mind, Elsie," I answered; "it is better to make Him a little vest than do nothing for Him. He will know what to do with it."

She was quite satisfied with that, and chattered all the way home. When I was quiet in my own room that evening, I searched through the Bible for a verse. I found it at last. It was this: "For it became Him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings. For both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren." Those are very strange words.

The Lord Christ, therefore, was both my brother and my captain, made perfect through sufferings, and He would bring me to glory. "Captain" and "glory" were words very often on our lips at that time. Sufferings became known to us later on.

After a few days of excitement and suspense, the news reached us of the first victory of our army. It had crossed the frontier, and won a battle at Saarbrück. You should have seen the stir and joy in the streets of the old city. Crowds of peasants came in, bringing loads of fruit, and hay, and wood, and corn, almost like the great autumn fair; and the bells rang merrily from all the church-towers.

But all the joyfulness was gone in a day or two, though the stir remained. We soon knew that the victory was a mere trifle, and had been followed by a double defeat. The Prussians had driven our army back over the frontier; and General MacMahon was in full retreat upon Saverne, which was not much more than twenty miles from us. We heard, too, that a large army had crossed the Rhine to the south of us, and was marching upon our city. The tumult was greater than before.

My grandmother could not sleep at night for the marching of troops, and the blowing of bugles along the streets. She and Gretchen went about all day long cleaning away the dust that would rise from the passing of regiment after regiment of cavalry; while the balconies, from which Sylvie and I watched them, were in a state that almost broke their hearts.

One evening after dusk my grandmother called me into her bedroom, as I passed the door to go to my own. She seemed very troubled and anxious, and her white head looked very white and old against the dark velvet of her high-backed chair. "Max," she said, "you are almost old enough to judge like a man, now. Many a boy gets his own living at your age."

"Yes," I answered, "I shall be fifteen next month."

"I am very much troubled," she went on; "all my old friends are going away as fast as they can, to take lodgings in Appenweir, or Offenberg, or some other place across the Rhine; but you know, Max, I could not leave my house and my furniture to fall into the hands of the pillagers and marauders who will soon be prowling about the city. If I was sure there was any positive danger, of course, I would send you and Sylvie; but it is not likely that those open villages will be as safe as Strasburg."

"Of course not," I said. "You should see our fortifications, grandmother—our ramparts, and bastions, and lunettes, and the citadel! Why! thousands of people are coming into the city for safety; and it seems ridiculous to go out of it into the enemy's villages. Besides, General Urrich has taken the command of the garrison, and he is a brave old soldier. We shall be quite safe with him at our head."

"I could not go," said my grandmother, shaking her head; "but the neighbors say to me, 'For the children's sake, Madame Kromer! What should I say to your father, Max, if anything should happen to Sylvie and you?' And what should I say to my father if anything happened to you?" I asked. "No; I let us all stay together. I am sure we shall be safer here than beyond the Rhine. Our own armies will come and drive the Germans back into their own country, and then what will happen in the open villages? I have been all about the fortifications, and I don't believe the city ever could be taken."

"It is very hard upon old people like me," she said, two or three tears rolling slowly down her cheeks. "I've lived here in peace with God and man these fifty years; and it will be very hard, indeed, if I cannot die peacefully."

I felt very sorry for her, and tried to cheer her up; but still it was not likely that she, any more than Lisbeth, could understand how much glory and honor there was to be won in battle. I, who went about the city, and talked now and then with the garrison soldiers, knew it better than they could. I would not have fled from Strasburg, just then, for anything that could have been offered to me; for that day a decree had been issued, proclaiming Strasburg, with a number of other towns along the frontier, in a state of siege.

It was a few days after this, early in August, and splendid weather, that one evening after supper I wandered off into the streets, making my way in and out through the crowd, which all that day, and the one before, had been pouring in through the Saverne Gate in an unbroken stream. It would be very difficult to give you the least idea of it: it was such a sad, desolate-looking crowd, every one seeming almost alone in it, so great was their distress. There was very little talking, and no laughter. Most of them were peasants, who had fled at the mere rumor of the Prussians, and were bringing with them a few fragments of their house goods, and a few animals of their farm stocks, such as they could gather in their flight, without impeding or delaying it.

There were but few strong, full-grown men in it, for to every one who appeared able to bear the toil and fright there seemed to be half a dozen feeble folk, either old or infirm, or children, most of them looking downcast, and many of them crying quietly to themselves, as they trudged along with weary feet. Those who looked the happiest, and from whom now and then a laugh broke, were the very little children perched aloft on the loaded wagons, with their pet cats or rabbits hugged in their arms. But even many of these, the youngest children, were running by the side of their parents, their little feet trotting as quickly as they could, to keep up with the longer steps of the older ones, and here and there leaving a stain of blood upon the pavement, from the cuts they had got from the stones along the high road.

There was not much glory in that dismal procession. How different it looked from the march of the regiments, with their gay uniforms, and with banners streaming and bands playing! But the thought came across me that the one must follow the other, as surely as the night, with its thick darkness, follows the brightest day.

I had drawn back into a doorway, while I watched the almost unbroken train plod by, when a young girl, about as old as Sylvie, sank down on the step at my feet, as if she was quite worn out, and could not take a step further. Not a person in the throng took any notice of her; they went on and on, and not one looked at the girl, and asked her to go on with them. Her face was dusty, and stained with tears; and her cap was lost, for she was bareheaded. She sat quite still, straining her eyes through the gateway, and down the darkening road—for the sun was quite gone down now, and very soon the gate would be closed. After a while I stooped down, and put my hand quietly on her shoulder, almost afraid of startling her; but she turned and looked at me without fear, but very earnestly. Her eyes were red with crying, and never had I seen any creature with a face so full of sorrow.

"Why do you sit here so long alone?" I asked.

"I am waiting for my mother," she said, turning quickly away again to watch and watch through the Saverne Gate; but the night was falling fast, and the ramparts prevented her seeing far. I could not have recognized even Sylvie beyond a very little distance.

"Where is she?" I asked; "have you lost her?"

But the girl burst into such sobs and weeping that she could not answer me, and I sat down beside her on the step, and took her small, rough hand into mine, to comfort her, if possible—at least, to make her feel that I was her friend.

"She fell down on the road, a long, long way off," she said, at last, "and she would not let me stay with her. She drove me from her. She said, 'Run, Louise—run on as fast as you can to the city, and get inside the gates. I will come as soon as I am a little rested.' But you see my mother is not come; and she will be alone all night, out of doors, somewhere."

"But where is your father?" I asked again; "is not he with her?"

Then I thought that the girl would never speak to me again, her sobs choked her voice so; and I could do nothing for her but hold her hand more tightly in my own.

"He's killed!" she cried—"killed for a spy;" and as she spoke she sobbed as if her heart must break, while my own felt as heavy as lead, and a shiver of very great cold ran all through me. "They hung him near Pfalzburg," she went on, "as a Prussian spy, and he was nothing of the kind. He was only going to see my brother, who lives in Pfalzburg. We did not know till this morning, and my mother was ill in bed. But they said the Prussians were coming; and she got up, and we ran away as fast as we could, till mother fell down in the road. She would not let me stay with her, and now she will be alone all night; and perhaps the Prussians will kill her too."

You must not suppose the girl told me all this at once, as I have written it down. She said it just a word or two at a time, in the midst of her sobs and tears, while I listened to catch all she spoke. I could not persuade her to move till the gate was closed; and then I had to promise to be there again with her before it was open in the morning. She would have slept on the steps all night if I had not been there; but when it was quite dark, she put her hand into mine of her own accord, just as Sylvie would have done, and said, "Take me home with you."

I scarcely knew how my grandmother would like it; but what else could I do? What else would the Lord have done, if He had been a boy in Strasburg? She had no friends in the city, and was only a child like Sylvie. However, I was rather uneasy till I had told my grandmother, and besought her for my sake to take the poor desolate girl in; and she, after a moment or two, said; "Yes; she may stay till her mother comes." So a bed was made up in Gretchen's room, and some of Sylvie's old frocks and things found for her; and after she had eaten some food she cried herself to sleep, as Sylvie told me, for she sat beside her till then, lest she should feel lonely.

But Gretchen looked very sulky, and went around muttering to herself about an extra mouth, and said that she must give up her supper for my whim.

We sat all day long at the Saverne Gate the next day, Louise and I—except once, when Gretchen brought us some food, and I persuaded her to stay in my place, for I wanted to see what was going on in other parts of the city. The fugitives were coming in at every gate; and among them a good number of soldiers, who had escaped from the battle-fields of Saarbruck and Woerth, and now came to swell the garrison of Strasburg.

OMRI AND AHAB.

S. S. Lesson for July 19, 1 Kings 16: 23-34. Golden Text, Prov. 15: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter. Jeroboam's Distress—His Expedient—Its Failure—The Queen Recognized—The Message Awaiting Her—The Heavy Judgments for the King—His New Title—A Wicked Dynasty—Ahab's Bad Eminence—Every Man Lighted—Why Evil is Permitted.

The proud, wicked heart of Jeroboam never yielded to God. He had one godly son, Abijah, and he loved that son, but never succumbed to his influence for good. God in His love and tenderness allowed sickness to come upon Abijah—it was his last call to Jeroboam. The king did not humble himself and seek the face of the Lord. He must have known God's promises to take away all sickness from such as would hearken to the voice of the Lord and obey Him (Ex. 15: 26, 23: 20-25; Deut. 7: 12-15), but Jeroboam heeded not the Word of the Lord. Yet natural affection for his boy made him very anxious how the sickness might end. He knew well enough that his false gods were powerless, and was well aware of the deceit he was practising upon his people; he knew that God alone could tell him what would become of the child, and yet he would not come face to face with God. What should he do? He thought of

AN EXPEDIENT.

Ahijah the prophet, who had told him that he should be a king over Israel, was now an old man and blind. He would send his queen to the old man, disguised as a peasant woman, bringing a poor woman's offering, and the prophet would have power with God, his prayers would secure the life of the child, and God would be tricked into blessing him. Jeroboam did not know the God he had to deal with; He was beforehand with the king and apprised Abijah of the queen's visit. "And it was so, when Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, as she came in at the door, that he said, Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam; why feignest thou thyself to be another? for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings."

Poor, unhappy woman! Little she expected the reception she met with. Full of the little scheme which her husband had devised, she never thought of God's side of the question, and she was made an unwilling messenger of judgment to her husband. "Go, tell Jeroboam, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Forasmuch as I exalted thee from among the people, and made thee prince over my people Israel, and rent the kingdom away from the house of David, and gave it thee; and yet thou hast not been as my servant David, who kept my commandments, and who followed me with all his heart, to do that only which was right in mine eyes; but hast done evil above all that were before thee: for thou hast gone and made thee other gods, and molten images, to provoke me to anger, and therefore, behold, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam." Perhaps Jeroboam and his wife had said in their hearts, "God hath forgotten: He hideth His face; He will never see it," and now it burst like a thunderbolt on the unhappy woman that God had been taking stock of all that occurred. God had seen through her disguise; and God had seen the motives which led to the setting up of the golden calves; God knew all. Why did she not turn to God and seek for mercy? Oh, how often are men convicted without being converted!

Heavier and yet heavier judgments were spoken against the house of Jeroboam. The very children who called the poor queen mother—not one of them should come to the grave save he who was now dying; in the city the dogs should eat them and in the fields the fowls of the air, and Israel should be given up because of the sins of Jeroboam, who did sin, and who made Israel to sin. In spite of herself she was made the messenger of doom to Jeroboam; she was the first to announce to him the sad title by which he was afterward known as the man "who made Israel to sin;" she was to announce that her son, now so ill, should be the only one of his family that should come to the grave, "because in him there is found some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam (1 Kings 14: 13), and she learned the heart-rending fact that when her feet should enter the city the child should die. Surely, and Jeroboam, too, the God who reversed His sentence against Nineveh in Jonah's time would have had mercy upon them! There are many who, without intending it, want to trick God into blessing them. They will not have to do with Him themselves, but they want to turn the faith of others into the channel of their own wishes and purposes, and so get second-hand what they desire. Oh, how little men know what a God we have, and how He desires, of all things, to have real personal acquaintance with His people; how all His providences are directed to this end, and that therefore the making use of the prayers and faith of others in the stead of our own is altogether missing the mark.

Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, succeeded him, and "walked in the way of his father" (1 Kings 15: 26). Baasha conspired against him, and smote him, and founded a new dynasty. Yet so corrupt was he that God sent to him Jehu, the son of Hanani, to denounce judgment against him and his house. Baasha had ignored God, who gave him the kingdom; had chosen the way of Jeroboam, and therefore must share his fate. His son Elah succeeded, and was slain by Zimri, one of the generals of his army, while he was in a state of intoxication. Omri, his superior in office, besieged Tirzah, and the wretched Zimri burned the king's house over his head and so perished. A faction of the people crowned Tibni king, but Omri prevailed against him, and became sole king over Israel. But Omri was than his predecessors, but far worse. "Omri wrought evil in the eyes of the Lord, and did worse than all that were before him." This is all which is recorded of him except that he bought the hill of Samaria and built the city. What a history! Not one good act by which men could remember him, not one glance of his eye toward God! A life which was unmixt evil! He did not die a violent death, but what kind of eternity can he have? He slept with his fathers, and Ahab, his son, reigned in his stead. Alas! the scale of evil went on increasing. Omri had exceeded in wickedness all that were before him, but Ahab exceeded even him. "And it came to pass, as if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat that he took to wife Jezebel the daughter of Ethbaal king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshipped him." Jeroboam had substituted forms for heart worship, and had broken the second commandment in making an image of God to worship, probably an image of the cherubim. But Ahab set aside God altogether, and brought in a false god; he "reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria. And Ahab made a grove; and Ahab did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him." Jeroboam tried to accommodate religion to suit his purpose. Ahab daringly set God aside, and put another in His place, and that publicly.

God had commanded His people that they should not make marriages with the nations whom He had cast out from before them (Deut. 7: 3). "But," He said, "thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. 7: 5, 6). Ahab repudiated all responsibility to God, broke down all barriers between himself and the heathen, married the most godless and profanely idolatrous women he could find, and set up the altars to false gods which he, as king over Israel, was the responsible party to throw down. It is easy to say, "He had a bad example in his father and in all the kings of Israel who preceded him." True, but "the true light that cometh into the world" (John 1: 9). In some way or other, by some means or other, God always does seek souls in such a way that if they reject Him it is consciously. There may be those who have very little light—Jews who have never read the New Testament, Unitarians who do not believe in the atonement of Christ, no doubt, also, Mussulmen and heathen, but some way, and in some measure, God makes an appeal to them. They that have "no law, are a law unto themselves; in that they shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness therewith, and their thoughts one with another accusing or else excusing them; in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men, according to my gospel, by Jesus Christ" (Rom. 2: 14-16, R. V.). If God deals thus with the heathen, much more closely did He deal with Ahab, as we shall learn from his after history. While we may not judge others, we can be very clear ourselves that all our want of knowledge of God lies at our own door. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine" (John 7: 17).

The question may be, and often is, asked, Why does God permit so much sin to exist, especially in high and influential quarters? Why is it that we more often learn of God through some very humble person than through the dignitaries of the Church? Why do we see the nobility of the kingdom of heaven less among the great ones of this world than among the most lowly? God has told us why: "That no flesh should glory in His presence" (1 Cor. 1: 29). Having little in man to rest upon, we are thrown upon God. Had the prophet Elijah come into the world when kings and priests were walking with God, he would not have had the same exercise of faith, and would never have known God as he did. While God does not originate evil, it to the great blessing of His own children. When He steers their boat against wind and tide, then they learn to trust Him. Take one who has been always cherished and surrounded with pious influences, and compare him with one who has been alone in his family and misunderstood, alone in his work for God, in straits out of which God alone has brought him, pecuniarily and spiritually, and you will find, when it comes to the push, that he is the man who knows God, and who can reckon on Him. God did not want Jeroboam, Baasha, Omri, and Ahab to run such a course of sin and lose their own souls. He sought to hinder them, but His very righteousness would not allow of saving them against their will, and since they would not, He made use of them as tools with which to model His prophets.

M. FREDERIC AUGUSTE BARTHOLDI.
Birth and Early Studies.—In the Studio of Ary Scheffer.—Engaged in the Franco-German War.—Mission to America—A Farewell Conference of Artists—A Friendly Project—Conception of the Statue.—Sojourn in America—Distinguished Friends.—The Project Launched.—Progress of the Work.—Its Arrival and Reception.—A Triumph of Newspaper Enterprise.

The eminent sculptor whose name has become a household word in America, and whose portrait appears on the first page of this number, was born at Colmar, in 1835. He is, therefore, now fifty years of age. Colmar is a manufacturing town of Alsace-Lorraine, the province which France was compelled to cede to Germany after the war of 1870. Though the native place of M. Bartholdi is now a German town, he prides himself on his French nationality, and was one of those who felt most acutely the humiliation of the conditions of peace imposed by Germany upon France. To citizens of other countries it seemed only natural that as Napoleon III. would have surely demanded from Germany a cession of territory, had he been the victor in that war, Germany should exact a similar penalty as she achieved victory. Nevertheless, the French people could not be expected to take an impartial view of the situation, and they, and especially the citizens of Alsace-Lorraine, of whom M. Bartholdi was one, bitterly resented the loss of the territory.

Having resolved to devote himself to art as his profession, he placed himself under the tuition of the celebrated French painter, Ary Scheffer, whose striking pictures "Christ in the Garden," and "Christ Bearing the Cross," are known through engravings all over the world. He died in 1858, at the age of sixty-three. Under Ary Scheffer and other famous masters, the genius of M. Bartholdi developed, and he was winning renown in his profession when the outbreak of war called him away from peaceful pursuits. Toward the end of the war, M. Bartholdi who was serving in the East, was dispatched to Bordeaux to receive some arms and munition of war which had been sent from America. He entered into conversation with the officers of the vessel, and sought information on a subject which puzzled him, in common with many patriotic French officers. He asked how it was that in the time of France's trouble, America was rejoicing over the German successes, and forgetting that when America was struggling to throw off the hated British yoke, France was the nation that lent her a helping hand, and aided her to achieve independence. He was informed, and doubtless there was some basis of truth in the reply, that much of the jubilation that pained him came from Germans resident in America who, though they had left their native land, still remembered it with pride, and had associations with it in friends left behind. Many, moreover, rejoiced in the achievement of German unity, because they believed that it would pave the way to a more liberal government, and would weaken rather than strengthen the hands of the autocrat. The explanation appears to have soothed the wounded feelings of the young Frenchman, and the reproach of ingratitude which in his soul he had brought against the United States was wiped away.

DEATH OF IMPERIALISM.

In common with other enlightened Frenchmen, M. Bartholdi was realizing then in the stern school of adversity what Imperialism really meant. The adventurer who, for twenty years had ruled France, was responsible for that war. It was a war undertaken with no high or noble purpose, but, as it appeared at a later day, with no other object than that of strengthening his own throne. France was slipping out of the Emperor's fingers, and there was no surer way of tightening the grip than a successful war. The man who could bring glory to the flag of France was the man who would command the loyalty of the French people, and caring not for the misery involved by war, thinking lightly of the lives that must inevitably be sacrificed, Napoleon had tried to purchase a renewed lease of power for himself by a payment in blood. That was Imperialism! That was the selfish motive which animated the man who sat on the French throne! M. Bartholdi, like many other Frenchmen, began to think it might be better if that throne were empty, and that it would be better if the people governed themselves. They, at any rate, if they made war, would know by experience the cost of it, and could have none but patriotic motives in quarrelling with other governments. Naturally, the eyes of these newly-converted Republicans were turned to America, the most successful instance, on a large scale, of the ability of the people to govern without king or emperor, or any hereditary ruler. M. Bartholdi determined to pay that he might see with his own eyes government by the people, and for the people, in practical operation. Before sailing, he paid a brief visit to his Parisian friends, whom he had not seen since he left Paris with the army. They were gathered at Versailles, the capital being then in the hands of the Commune, its flaming buildings and blood-stained streets, crying aloud the lesson that a country must not look to its law-breakers for just government. He saw MM. Laboulaye, Lafayette, Henri Martin, Remusat, and other ardent Frenchmen, and told them of his contemplated voyage across the Atlantic. The project was warmly applauded, for the cordial friendship of young Frenchmen for America was newly stimulated by the resolve to adopt Republican institutions in France. America was a sister Republic, and as the group of enthusiastic Frenchmen sat and talked, the desire was born that in some way the two great nations might be drawn more closely into the bonds of friendship. Could not some gift, some striking token of regard be devised, that would show to the whole world that nations could love one another as individuals may do. That was the mustard-seed of an idea, out of which grew the magnificent gift that has now been landed on our shores.

THE CONCEPTION.

M. Bartholdi sailed for America, charged with the mission of finding some way in which the French people could testify their regard for the sister Republic, so that all the world might understand and appreciate it. The mission was discharged before he set foot on American soil. No sooner did the vessel on which he sailed enter the unrivalled bay of New York, than there entered his mind the conception that has now been moulded into enduring metal. To the artistic mind there could be no grander or more appropriate gift than a colossal statue which should stand at the portals of the new world, to tell to every traveller from the monarchy-ridden countries of Europe, that he was entering a land of liberty and self-government, so strong and so stable that a sister nation rendered it spontaneous homage.

AMERICAN FRIENDS.

The visit of the French artist was an extensive one, he travelled from New York to California, and from Maine to Florida, not confining his attention to the great cities, but visiting small towns and wild western settlements. He studied the people and the Government, enjoyed himself thoroughly, as a Frenchman will, if enjoyment can be had by any means, and as an artist is sure to do, in the most magnificent scenery in the world. He painted and sketched, made friends everywhere, and when his visit approached a termination, it seemed as if he had made for himself a new home. Among the warm personal friends he made, Longfellow was chief. Whenever M. Bartholdi was within a day's journey of Boston, he turned his face toward the hospitable door of the great poet, and always received a hearty welcome. Other friends whom M. Bartholdi still speaks of with affection, were Senator Sumner, General Sheridan, General Meade, Peter Cooper, Cyrus Field, Professor Agassiz, and Colonel Forney. To these and many less distinguished friends, M. Bartholdi bade farewell in the latter part of 1873, and returned to France.

THE PROJECT LAUNCHED.

Soon after the traveller's return, a meeting of the same circle of artistic comrades that had bade him good-by so many months before, was held at the house of M. Laboulaye, to consider the project started at their former meeting. M. Bartholdi explained his ideas more fully than he had been able to do by mail, and showed a sketch in water-colors of the Bay of New York, and the site on Bedloe's Island, where he proposed that the colossal statue should stand. The idea was received with enthusiasm, and the French-American Union was organized to receive subscriptions, and to arrange details. Subscription lists were prepared and circulated throughout France. They bore at their head the following introduction of the project to the French people, which M. Bartholdi quotes in his narrative published in the New York Tribune: "The Monument of Independence would be executed in common by the two peoples associated in this fraternal work, as they were of old in establishing Independence. In this way we declare by an imperishable memorial the friendship that the blood spilled by our fathers of old sealed between the two nations. It is a treaty of friendship which should be signed by all hearts which feel the love of their country."

THE WORK COMMENCED.

Sufficient funds speedily came in to enable M. Bartholdi to begin his great work. They followed in a continuous stream. As Mr. Couderc said at the reception of the statue in New York, a few weeks ago: "This was a popular, not a political offering. The report of the original committee shows how earnest the promoters of this great scheme were that its true character should not be misunderstood. They spoke in the name of one hundred and eighty-one towns, all of them represented by their municipal authorities; of forty general councils of departments, of ten chambers of commerce, and of one hundred thousand individual subscribers. Were they not right when they said: 'The people of the United States will understand the feeling which has inspired this great manifestation?' On November 6th, 1875, the commencement was celebrated by a banquet of eminent men in Paris, and soon afterward the hand of the statue, holding the torch, was sent over here, and was set up in Madison Square, as an earnest of the work that was to follow. In the following year, too, there came another token of good-will from France. The French Government, in recognition of some kindness shown to the people of France by American citizens, during the period of distress which followed the Franco-German war, presented the city of New York with a statue of Lafayette, which also came from the studio of M. Bartholdi.

COMPLETION.

Six years were occupied in preliminary work, and in October, 1881, the various pieces were completed, and the work of putting them together was commenced. Two years later the statue was declared finished, and stood in the suburbs of Paris a conspicuous object, towering high above surrounding buildings, and eagerly visited by the Parisian public. It remained on exhibition for a few months, and then on July 4th it was formally presented to Mr. Morton, the United States Minister to France at that time.

French munificence had not even then been exhausted. At a dinner given by Mr. Morton to the members of the French-American Union, on July 11th, M. Ferry, the Prime Minister of France, speaking on behalf of the French Government, announced that he and his colleagues desired to share in the substantial message of good-will. They had decided to place a Government steamer at the service of the Union, and to carry the statue to its destination in a vessel bearing the national flag of France.

As we have already stated in our news columns, the statue, carefully packed in cases, arrived here on June 17th, last, on board the mail-war Isere, and was received in due form two days later. The orator of the day, Mr. Frederic K. Coudert, who spoke on behalf of the American people, voiced the general sentiment when he said: "The splendid gift which these gentlemen have carried from their own soil to find a home in our bay, is not the gift of a king or an emperor, or any government whatever. It is not the fashion of political bodies to manifest international regard by costly presents. Many inconveniences might attend such a practice if adopted—not the least, perhaps, the necessity of reciprocity. Besides this, the lesson of the Trojan horse is not without its value. We may well hesitate to become the recipients of favors which might imply too much. But the spontaneous offering of a people—and of the only people who stood the sponsors of the infant nation, that needed help as no nation ever did before—this may well be accepted as a symptom of the same affection that approved itself so long, so well, so often."

"This bronze memento, out of which so many far-reaching guns might have been made, typifies and perpetuates the common aspirations of two great nations, and symbolizes the hope that not only they and their children shall see and live in the light of liberty's torch, but that all nations and all people shall be warmed and made happy by its rays. For the instinct and spirit of liberty is not one of caste, nor of sect, nor of narrow limitations. It embraces the universe with a bond of brotherhood that throws its girdle around the earth as the magnet wire that daily draws the nations into closer and more fraternal contact."

must not be forgotten in this narrative. A singular, almost inexplicable apathy had fallen on our people in reference to the statue. Though it was known that the statue was nearly completed, but little progress had been made with the work of preparing the pedestal on which it was to stand. Neither Congress nor the municipality of New York had taken the matter in hand with the energy required. Private subscriptions had been looked for, but they came in so slowly that work was at length suspended for lack of funds. It seemed as though the comparatively small share of the cost of erecting the noble memento, which fell upon the United States could not be borne. When effort seemed dead, a daily newspaper in New York—the World—took up the matter and persistently pressed it on the attention of the public. It speaks volumes for the power of the press that, alone and unaided, a single newspaper could so arouse the people to a sense of their duty, that in a few weeks over ninety-one thousand dollars was voluntarily sent to the World office toward the fund, leaving only about eight thousand yet to collect. Work has now been resumed on the pedestal, which will not again be suspended until it is complete. Too much honor cannot be paid to the zeal and energy of the World for having saved the nation from reproach in this matter.

Appropriate as is the statue as a gift from the people of France to the people of the United States, and thoroughly in character as it is with French thought and genius, the Christian spectator who in years to come looks at the colossal figure, holding aloft its torch at our gates, will wish that both the people who gave and the people who received the magnificent emblem might better understand what true liberty is, and how to attain the liberty that alone can "enlighten the world." The liberty which is only another name for license, the freedom from control and from the fear of God, is a darkening influence leading to misery and death. That liberty which gives light and life to the world, is that which is enjoyed by the individual soul that has realized the truth of Christ's words, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free" (John 8 : 32).

THE GIGANTIC STATUE.

Details of its Proportions and Method of Construction.

M. BARTHOLDI has communicated to the Philadelphia Press an elaborate and exhaustive article describing in detail his extraordinary work of art. From that article we extract the following particulars:

"I think that it may be timely to examine briefly the characteristics of colossal statuary, in view of the fact that the art has from time to time been the object of criticism. Many persons see in it only a striking production, and do not understand its peculiar laws, its difficulties, or its artistic value."

"Colossal statuary does not consist simply in making an enormous statue. It ought to produce an emotion in the breast of the spectator not because of its volume, but because its size is in keeping with the idea that it interprets and with the place which it ought to occupy. It should be used only in dealing with a limited order of ideas. M. Lesbazeilles, in his work on the Colossi, said with reason: 'It is within its scope when it represents power, majesty, infinity. It can lay claim to that class of effects which are produced in us by the heaving of the boundless sea, the bellowing of the wind, the rolling of the thunder.'"

"Egypt incontestably gives us on this point the most complete instruction, and we can judge Egyptian colossal art with our own eyes. To all those who have studied it, Egyptian art has been the object of profound admiration, not only in view of the masses, the millions of kilogrammes moved by the Egyptian people, but on account of its concrete and majestic character, in design and in form, of the works which we see. We are filled with profound emotion in the presence of these colossal witnesses, centuries old, of a past that to us is almost infinite, at whose feet so many generations, so many million existences, so many human glories, have rolled in the dust. These granite beings, in their imperturbable majesty, seem to be still listening to the most remote antiquity. Their kindly and impassable glance seems to ignore the present and to be fixed upon an unlimited future. These impressions are not the result simply of a beautiful spectacle, nor of the poetry of historic remembrances. They result from the character of the form and the expression of the work in which the design itself expresses, after a fashion, infinity."

"After the Grecian epoch we must pass on to modern times to find examples of colossal statues. The Jupiter Pluvius, of the Pratolino Villa, executed by John of Bologna, and the St. Charles Borromeo, on the banks of Lake Maggiore, may be referred to. All the other colossal statues in existence are entirely modern. That of Bavaria is the oldest. It measures about fifty-one feet. Next was executed the colossal statue of the Virgin of Puy, which is sixteen measures in height; and, finally, that of Arminius in Westphalia, which, including the sword which he raises toward the sky, is ninety-two feet in height."

"Up to the present time, no statue had ever been executed of the extraordinary proportions of the Statue of Liberty. The total height of the first model, was four feet. This was the study model, which was long sought and often recast."

"After this first study, I made the statue which measures from the head to the feet, nine feet four inches. This statue, executed with rigid precision, was reproduced four times as large by the ordinary processes. The model which was the result of this work, measured about thirty-six feet in total height. Placed in a large space it could be taken in by the eye in its entirety, and the corrections to be made could still be noted. This statue was divided into a large number of sections, destined to be produced separately at four times their size. After this last enlargement changes were no longer possible. Now, the sculptor could only aim at very great precision, and at great care in the modelling of the surfaces which were becoming enormous."

"In an immense workshop, specially constructed for the work, were to be seen four plane surfaces on which the work was carried on. They were encompassed with frames, laid out, in numbered divisions. Another similar frame, corresponding exactly to the one below, was fastened beneath the ceiling of the workshop. Lead wires and rulers hung all around the frames. On these frames thus geometrically laid out, the sculptors executed in wood and in plaster enormous fragments of the statue. The sculptors executed the enlargement by measurements taken with the compass on the lead wires and the rulers. They first laid out the general form with wooden beams, covered with lathwork. The wood was then covered with a coating of plaster. They verified the large measurements already established, and then executed the reproduction, point by point, and finished the modelling of the surfaces."

"On these wooden moulds or gabarits, the hammerers pressed the sheets of copper by pressure with levers and by hammering with mallets. The pieces of copper were finished by beating them with little hammers and with rammers. The profile of the forms was again taken in detail with sheets of lead, pressed upon the model, again working the copper according to the profiles. The pieces of copper were furnished from point to point with iron braces, intended to give them rigidity. Thus furnished, the pieces were mounted, brought together and fastened on powerful trusswork of iron beams which serves as support for the whole envelope of the statue. The trusswork was designed and executed by the eminent constructing engineer, M. Eiffel. The copper plates, kept in shape by iron bands, are supported by iron braces, which are cramped on to the central core. They do not bear in the least upon the lower plates, and their weight is always independent of all that is above and below. The statue is constructed of copper sheets, two and a half millimetres in thickness. It measures one hundred and fifty feet from the base to the top of the torch, one hundred and eleven feet from the heel to the top of the head. This will make the top of the torch three hundred and five feet above the water of the bay. That is, twenty-one feet higher than the spire of Trinity Church, and twenty-three feet higher than the towers of the Brooklyn Bridge."

"The forefinger is seven feet eleven inches in length, and four feet eight inches in circumference at the second joint. The head is thirteen feet six inches in height. The eye is over two feet in width. The nose is three feet seven inches in length. About forty persons were accommodated in the head at the Universal Exposition of 1878. It is possible to ascend into the torch above the hand. It will easily hold twelve persons. It represents an outlay of more than $200,000."

"The Liberty is the largest work of its kind that has ever been completed. The famous Colossus of Rhodes, according to the proportions which the legends attribute to it, was but a miniature in comparison. The Column Vendôme is not so high by seven feet."

"Yet we must not expect its appearance to be colossal when it is in its place. In the immense picture which will surround it, it will appear simply in harmony with the whole, and have the normal aspect of a statue in a public place. It should be thus, because its part is not to appear extraordinary in itself, but to connect itself intimately with an extraordinary whole."

The Mission Work Among the Jews of New York, conducted by the Rev. Jacob Freshman, is making progress. Mr. Freshman has secured a house in St. Mark's Place for the purposes of his mission, and has received promises amounting to about $500 toward its purchase. Increased interest is manifest among the Jews in the work, and Christian literature is readily accepted by them.

CASTLE JESUS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Who have fled for refuge."—HEB. 6: 18.

The Cities of Refuge—Not Useless—Men in Peril—Through Sin and Pollution—Pursued by Troubles—A Condemned Soldier's Pardon—Jesus as a Refuge—I. Safe—A Queen's Clemency—II. Near—III. Universal—The Poor Specially Welcome—Going in with the Rabble—IV. The Only Refuge—Well Tested—Jesus Crucified by Rejection.

PAUL is here speaking of the consolations of Christians. He styles them those "who have fled for refuge."

Moses established six cities of refuge—three on the east side of the river Jordan and three on the west. When a man had killed any one accidentally he fled to one of these cities. The roads leading to them were kept perfectly good, so that when a man started for the refuge nothing might impede him. Along the cross-roads, and wherever there might be any mistake about the way, there were signs put up pointing in the right way, with the word "Refuge." Having gained the limits of one of these cities the man was safe, and the mothers of the priests provided for him.

REFUGE CASTLES.

Some of us have seen our peril, and have fled to Christ, and feel that we shall never be captured. We are among those "who have fled for refuge." Christ is represented in the Bible as a Tower, a High Rock, a Fortress, and a Shelter. If you have seen any of the ancient castles of Europe, you know that they are surrounded by trenches, across which there is a drawbridge. If an enemy approach, the people, for defence, would get into the castle, have the trenches filled with water, and lift up the drawbridge. Whether to a city of safety, or a tower, Paul refers, I know not, and care not, for in any case he means Christ, the safety of the soul.

But why talk of refuge? Who needs it if the refuge spoken of be a city or a castle, into which men fly for safety? It is all sunlight here. No sound of war in our streets. We do not hear the rush of armed men against the doors of our dwellings. We do not come with weapons to church. Our lives are not at the mercy of an assassin. Why, then, talk of refuge?

THE PERIL.

Alas! I stand before a company of imperilled men. No flock of sheep was ever so threatened or endangered of a pack of wolves; no ship was ever so beaten of a storm; no company of men were ever so environed of a band of savages. A refuge you must have, or fall before an all-devouring destruction. There are not so many serpents in Africa; there are not so many hyenas in Asia; there are not so many panthers in the forest—as there are transgressions attacking my soul. I will take the best unregenerated man anywhere, and say to him, You are utterly corrupt. If all the sins of your past life were marshalled in single file they would reach from here to hell. If you have escaped all other sins, the fact that you have rejected the mission of the Son of God is enough to condemn you forever, pushing you off into bottomless darkness, struck by ten thousand hissing thunderbolts of Omnipotent wrath.

WEIGHED WITH SIN.

You are a sinner. The Bible says it, and your conscience affirms it. Not a small sinner, or a moderate sinner, or a tolerable sinner, but a great sinner, a protracted sinner, a vile sinner, an outrageous sinner, a condemned sinner. As God, with His all-scrutinizing gaze, looks upon you to-day, He cannot find one sound spot in your soul. Sin has put scales on your eyes, and deadened your ear with an awful deafness, and palsied your right arm, and stunned your sensibilities, and blasted you with an infinite blasting. The Bible, which you admit to be true, affirms that you are diseased from the crown of your head to the sole of your foot. You are unclean. You are a leper. Believe not me, but believe God's Word, that over and over again announces, in language that a fool might understand, the total and complete depravity of the unchanged heart. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked."

In addition to the sins of your life there are uncounted of you. Bereavements, losses, disappointments are a flock of vultures ever on the wing. Did you get your house built, and furnished, and made comfortable any sooner than misfortune came in without knocking, and sat beside you—a skeleton apparition? Have not pains shot their poisoned arrows, and fevers kindled their fire in your brain? Many of you, for years, have walked on burning marl. You stepped out of one disaster into another. You may, like Job, have cursed the day in which you were born. This world boils over with trouble for you, and you are wondering where the next grave will gape, and where the next storm will burst. Oh, ye pursued, sinning, dying, troubled, exhausted souls, are you not ready now to hear me while I tell you of Christ, the Refuge?

TROUBLES IN PURSUIT

WARRANT AND PARDON.

A soldier, during the war, heard of the sickness of his wife and asked for a furlough. It was denied him, and he ran away. He was caught, brought back, and sentenced to be shot as a deserter. The officer took from his pocket a document that announced his death on the following morning. As the document was read, the man flinched not and showed no sorrow or anxiety. But the officer then took from his pocket another document that contained the prisoner's pardon. Then he broke down with deep emotion at the thought of the leniency that had been extended. Though you may not appear moved while I tell you of the law that thundered its condemnation, while I tell you of the pardon and the peace of the Gospel I wonder if they will not overcome you.

Jesus is

A SAFE REFUGE.

Fort Hudson, Fort Pulaski, Fort Moultrie, Fort Sumter, Gibraltar, Sebastopol were taken. But Jesus is a castle into which the righteous run, and is safe. No battering-ram can demolish its wall. No sappers or miners can explode its ramparts, no storm-bolt of perdition leap upon its towers. The walls that guard this fort are omnipotent. Hell shall unlimber its great guns as death only to have them dismantled. In Christ our sins are pardoned, discomfited, blotted out, forgiven. An ocean cannot so easily drown a fly as the ocean of God's forgiveness swallow up, utterly and forever, our transgressions. He is able to save unto the uttermost.

You who have been so often overcome in a hand-to-hand fight with the world, the flesh, and the devil, try this fortress. Once here, you are safe for ever. Satan may charge up the steep, and shout amid the uproar of the fight, Forward, to his battalions of darkness; but you will stand in the might of the great God, your Redeemer, safe in the refuge. The troubles of life, that once overwhelmed you, may come on with their long wagon-trains laden with care and worryment; and you may hear in their tramp the bereavements that once broke your heart; but Christ is your friend, Christ your sympathizer, Christ your reward. Safe in the refuge!

Death at last may lay siege to your spirit, and the shadows of the sepulchre may shake their horrors in the breeze, and the hoarse howl of the night wind may be mingled with the cry of despair, yet you will shout in triumph from the ramparts, and the pale horse shall be hurled back on his haunches. Safe in the refuge! To this castle I fly. The last fire shall but illumine its towers; and the rolling thunders of the judgment will be the salvo of its victory.

A QUEEN'S MERCY.

Just after Queen Victoria had been crowned—she being only nineteen or twenty years of age—Wellington handed her a death-warrant for her signature. It was to take the life of a soldier in the army. She said to Wellington: "Can there nothing good be said of this man?" He said: "No; he is a bad soldier, and deserves to die." She took up the death-warrant, and it trembled in her hand as she again asked: "Does no one know anything good of this man?" Wellington said: "I have heard that at his trial a man said that he had been a good son to his old mother." "Then let his life be spared," said the Queen, and she ordered his sentence commuted.

Christ is on a throne of grace. Our case is brought before him. The question is asked: "Is there any good about this man?" The law says: "None." Justice says: "None." Our own conscience says: "None." Nevertheless, Christ hands over our pardon, and asks us to take it. Oh, the height and depth, the length and breadth of His mercy!

Again, Christ is

A NEAR REFUGE.

When we are attacked, what advantage is there in having a fortress on the other side of the mountain? Many an army has had an entrenchment, but could not get to it before the battle opened. Blessed be God, it is no long march to our castle. We may get off, with all our troops, from the worst earthly defeat into this stronghold. In a moment we may step from the battle into the tower. I sing of a Saviour near.

During the late war the forts of the North were named after the Northern generals, and the forts of the South were named after the Southern generals. This fortress of our soul I shall call Castle Jesus. I have seen men pursued of sins that chased them with feet of lightning, and yet with one glad leap they bounded into the tower. I have seen troubles, with more than the speed and terror of a cavalry troop, dash after a retreating soul, yet were hurled back in defeat from the bulwarks. Jesus near! A child's cry, a prisoner's prayer, a sailor's death-scrial, a pauper's moan, reaches Him. No pilgrimages on spikes. No journeying with a huge pack on your back. No kneeling in penance in cold vestibule of mercy. But an open door! A compassionate Saviour! A present salvation! A near refuge! Castle Jesus!

Oh, why do you not put out your arm and reach it? Why do you not fly to it? Why be riddled, and shelled, and consumed under the rattling bombardment of perdition, when one moment's faith would plant you in the glorious refuge? I preach a Jesus here; a Jesus now; a fountain close to your feet; a fiery pillar right over your head; bread already broken for your hunger; a crown already gleaming for your brow. Hark to the castle gates rattling back for your entrance! Hear you not the welcome of those who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us?

Again, it is

A UNIVERSAL REFUGE.

A fortress is seldom large enough to hold a whole army. I look out upon fourteen hundred million of the race; and then I look at this fortress, and I say that there is room enough for all. If it had been possible, this salvation would have been monopolized. Men would have said: "Let us have all this to ourselves—no publicans, no plebeians, no lazzaroni, no converted pickpockets. We will ride toward heaven on fierce chargers, our feet in golden stirrups. Grace for lords, and dukes, and duchesses, and counts. Let Napoleon and his marshals come in, but not the common soldier that fought under him. Let the Girards and the Barings come in, but not the stevedores that unloaded their cargoes, or the men who kept their books." Heaven would have been a glorified Windsor Castle, or Tuilleries, or Vatican; and exclusive aristocrats would have strutted through the golden streets to all eternity.

Thank God, there is

MERCY FOR THE POOR!

The great Dr. John Mason preached over a hundred times the same sermon; and the text was:

"To the poor the Gospel is preached," Lazarus went up, while Dives went down; and there are candidates for Imperial splendors in the back alley, and by the peat fire of the Irish shanty. King Jesus set up His throne in a manger, and made a resurrection day for the poor widow of Nain, and sprang the gate of so that all the beggars, and thieves, and scoundrels of the universe may come in if they will only repent. I can snatch the knife from the murderer's hand while it is yet dripping with the blood of his victim, and tell him of grace that is sufficient to pardon his soul. Do you say that I swing open the gate of heaven too far? I swing it open no wider than Christ, when He says: "Whosoever will, let him come." Don't you want to go in with such a rabble? Then you can stay out.

The whole world will yet come into this refuge. The windows of heaven will be opened; God's trumpet of salvation will sound, and China will come from its tea-fields and rice-harvests, and lift itself up into the light. India will come forth, the chariots of salvation jostling to pieces her juggernauts. Freezing Greenland, and sweltering Abyssinia, will, side by side, press into the kingdom; and transformed Borneian cannibal preach of the resurrection of the missionary he has slain. The glory of Calvary will tinge the tip of the Pyrenees; and Lebanon cedars shall clap their hands; and by one swing of the sickle Christ shall harvest nations for the skies.

I SING A WORLD REDEEMED.

In the rush of the winds that set the forest in motion, like giants wrestling on the hills, I see the tossing up of the triumphal branches that shall wave all along the line of our King as He comes to take empire. In the stormy diapason of the ocean's organ, and the more gentle strains that in the calm come sounding up from the crystal and jasper keys at the beach, I hear the prophecy: "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of God as the waters fill the sea."

The gospel morning will come like the natural morning. At first it seems only like another hue of the night. Then a pallor strikes through the sky, as though a company of ministering spirits, pale with tedious watching through the night, had turned in their flight upward to look back upon the earth. Then a faint glow of fire, as though on a barren beach a wrecked mariner was kindling a flickering flame. Then chariots and horses of fire racing up and down the heavens, then perfect day: "Who is she that cometh forth as the morning?"

Come in, black Hottentot and snow-white Caucasian; come in, mitred official and diseased beggar; let all the world come in. Room in Castle Jesus! Sound it through all lands; sound it by all tongues. Let sermons preach it, and bells chime it, and pencils sketch it, and processions celebrate it, and bells ring it: Room in Castle Jesus.

Again, Christ is

THE ONLY REFUGE.

If you were very sick, and there was only one medicine that would cure you, how anxious you would be to get that medicine. If you were in a storm at sea, and you found that the ship could not weather it, and there was only one harbor, how anxious you would be to get into that harbor. Oh, sin-sick soul, Christ is the only medicine; oh storm-tossed soul, Christ is the only harbor. Need I tell a cultured audience like this that there is no other name given among men by which ye can be saved? That if you want the handcuffs knocked from your wrist, and the hoppers from your feet, and the icy bands from your heart, there is just one Almighty arm in all the universe to do everything? There are other fortresses to which you might fly, and other ramparts behind which you might hide, but God will cut to pieces, with the hail of His vengeance, all these refuges of lies.

Some of you are foundering in terrible Euroclydon. Hark to the howling of the gale, and the splintering of the spars, and the starting of the timbers, and the breaking of the billow, clear across the hurricane deck. Down she goes! Into the life-boat! Quick! One boat! One shore! One oarsman! One salvation! You are polluted; there is but one well at which you can wash clean. You are enslaved; there is but one proclamation that can emancipate. You are blind; there is but one salve that can kindle your vision. You are dead; there is but one trumpet that can burst the grave.

I have seen men come near the refuge but not make entrance. They came up, and fronted the gate, and looked in, but passed on, and passed down; and they will curse their folly through all eternity, that they despised the only refuge. Oh! forget everything else I have said, if you will but remember that there is but one atonement, one sacrifice, one justification, one faith, one hope, one Jesus, one refuge. There is that old Christian. Many a scar on his face tells where trouble lacerated him. He has fought with wild beasts at Ephesus. He has had enough misfortune to shadow his countenance with perpetual despair. Yet he is full of hope. Has he found any new elixir? "No," he says; "I have found Jesus the refuge."

WELL TESTED.

Christ is our only defence at the last. John Holland, in his concluding moment, swept his hand over the Bible, and said: "Come, let us gather a few flowers from this garden." As it was eventime he said to his wife: "Have you lighted the candles?" "No," she said; "we have not lighted the candles." "Then," said he, "it must be the brightness of the face of Jesus that I see."

Ask that dying Christian woman the source of her comfort. Why that supernatural glow on the curtains of the death-chamber; and the tossing out of one hand, as if to wave the triumph, and the reaching up of the other, as if to take a crown? Hosanna on the tongue. Glory beaming from the forehead.

HEAVEN IN THE EYE.

Spirit departing. Wings to bear it. Anthems to charm it. Open the gates to receive it. Hallelujah! Speak, dying Christian—what light do you see? What sounds do you hear? The thin lips part. The pale hand is lifted. She says: "Jesus the refuge!" Let all in the death-chamber stop weeping now. Celebrate the triumph. Take up a song. Clap your hands. Shout it. Hallelujah! Hallelujah!

But this refuge will be of no worth to you unless you lay hold of it. The time will come when you will wish that you had done so. It will come soon. At an unexpected moment it will come. The castle bridge will be drawn up and the fortress closed. When you see this discomfiture, and look back, and look up at the storm gathering, and the billowy darkness of death has rolled upon the sheeted-flash of the storm, you will discover the utter desolation of those who are outside of the refuge.

CRUCIFIED AGAIN.

What you propose to do in this matter you had better do right away. A mistake this morning may never be corrected. Jesus, the Great Captain of salvation, puts forth his wounded hand to-day to cheer you on the race to heaven. If you despise it, the ghastliest vision that will haunt the eternal darkness of your soul will be the gaping, bleeding wounds of the dying Redeemer.

Jesus is to be crucified to-day. Think not of it as a day that is past. He comes before you to-day weary and worn. Here is the cross, and here is the victim. But there are no nails, and there are no thorns, and there are no hammers. Who will furnish these? A man out yonder says: "I will furnish with my sins the nails!" Now we have the cross, and the victim, and the nails. But we have no thorns. Who will furnish the thorns? A man in the audience says: "With my sins I will furnish the thorns!" Now we have the cross, the victim, the nails, and the thorns. But we have no hammers. Who will furnish the hammers? A voice in the audience says: "My hard heart shall be the hammer!"

Everything is ready now. The crucifixion goes out! See Jesus dying! "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world."

The Rev. Thomas Harrison, the Boy Preacher about whom some of our subscribers are inquiring, has completed his work at the Trinity Church in Chicago, and expects to commence services next week at Louisville, Ky. The reports from Chicago indicate that a very extensive revival has followed his labors in that city, and some very remarkable cases of conversion among some who were regarded as hopeless have occurred.

What are Christians For?—A Christian Lady, who was engaged in work for the poor and degraded, was once spoken to by one who was well acquainted with both the worker and those whom she sought to reach, and remonstrated with for going among such a class of people. "It does seem wonderful to me that you can do such work," her friend said. "You sit beside these people, and talk with them in a way that I do not think you would do if you knew all about them—just what they are, and from what places they come." Her answer was, "Well, I suppose they are dreadful people; but if the Lord Jesus were now on earth, are they not the very sort of people that He would strive to reach? And am I better than my Master? Would He feel Himself too good to go among them?" A poor, illiterate person, who stood listening to this conversation, said with great earnestness and simplicity, "Why, I always thought that was what Christians were for." The objector was silenced, and what wonder? Is not that what Christians are for? If not, then what in the name of all that is good are they for?

A Nineteen Years' Search for a Daughter has been crowned with success in Cleveland, O. Twenty years ago a worthless young man won the affections of a beautiful girl in Northern Pennsylvania, and married her. A year later he ran away, leaving his wife destitute. She returned to the home of her parents, and was kindly received; but when her husband also attempted to quarter himself on the old people, they indignantly refused to shelter him. In order to revenge himself, he stole his infant daughter, and carried her away none knew whither. The wife's friends offered a reward for the discovery of the child, but no trace of her could be found, and all except the mother came to the conclusion that the unnatural father had murdered her. The mother continued the search, advertising and making long journeys on false clues. She made it her chief business in life for nineteen long years, but vainly until a few weeks ago. News reached her then that her wretched husband was dead, and that when dying he confessed the theft of the child, and said that he had placed her in the Orphans' Home at Elmira, N. Y. The mother immediately set to work on this clue, and traced her daughter to Parkersville, Pa., where she was found, and taken to her mother's home in Cleveland. She had grown into a beautiful woman, strikingly resembling her mother. She had endured many hardships during the years in which her mother had been seeking her. All the nineteen years of toilsome search seemed to be speaking in the loving welcome with which the devoted mother received her long-lost child. It is such a welcome that awaits the wandering sinner who at length resolves to arise and go to his Father (Luke 15:20).

MR. C. H. SPURGEON'S FIFTY-FIRST BIRTHDAY.

ON Friday, June 26th, Mr. Spurgeon completed his fifty-first year, and, accordingly, on the day preceding, the usual birthday celebration took place in the grounds of the Stockwell Orphanage, when some ten thousand persons were present. The spacious grounds presented a thoroughly holiday-like appearance, while the choir, the band of Dr. Barnardo's Homes, and the orphanage handbell ringers all contributed varied entertainment for the visitors. There was also a procession of the orphans, now numbering between four and five hundred, and some of these enlivened the scene by wearing masks of representative animals. A much-needed bake-house and laundry are now in course of erection, and the formal commencement took place at the five.

When, in the course of the afternoon, Mr. Spurgeon laid the memorial stone of the laundry, he intimated that he preferred a good, honest workman's implement to such a common article as a silver trowel, and, having no money to spare, none was placed beneath the stone, the motto of which was, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us." Reference was then made to the funds which were still needed, and the blessing of God was invoked. The company then adjourned to the grounds, the speakers occupying a platform erected for the purpose.

After prayer had been offered by the Rev. John Spurgeon (the pastor's venerable father), the president remarked that they had to praise the Lord Jesus for His providences as well as for redemption. He mentioned a storm which had damaged the works after the first stone was laid; but there was mercy even in the disaster. He became impressed that it was the work of the Lord; help was sent, and that work would remain. The orphanage buildings were, at last, almost finished; they had built in faith, and now love saw the completion. Debt had never been incurred; all was begun and carried on for God's glory, and He had never failed them.

It was then asked, where were the orphanages which unbelief, as represented by Tom Paine or Voltaire, had ever erected? If such institutions existed, he would like to see them. On proceeding to speak of means, Mr. Spurgeon added that God would always honor their faith by sending the money as it was wanted. What was thus given to the Lord would not make people poorer, and what was withheld would not enrich them.

The Earl of Aberdeen presided at the evening meeting. He referred to the blessing which had rested on Mr. Spurgeon's endeavors, and thought that institutions full of brightness were an answer to such as said religion was a gloomy thing. The keynote of the report of the managers was thankfulness and hopeful expectation; and its brightness and buoyancy were only a reflection of what prevailed throughout the establishment.

In the course of another speech, Mr. Spurgeon alluded to the friend who annually sent as many sovereigns as he (the president) was years old; and he was becoming a dear minister, for, at the outset, only £30 was needed, but the sum had risen to £51. Many presents had been received. Some of these came from Scotland; and he believed he ought to have been a Scotchman somehow or other, because the theology he loved was paramount in the North. Other gifts had come from Constantinople, British Guiana, and New Zealand. Reference was then made to the funds which were needed; but Mr. Spurgeon confessed that he had seen the great arm of God so conspicuous that he was never anxious. He liked the money to come in as it was needed day by day, but if it did not come in that way, it would still be sure to come. The Rev. J. A. Spurgeon, as vice-president, showed that in proportion as expenses increased, the generosity of friends enlarged. Those lads who had been sent out from the institution were doing well, and they had a clean bill of health, there having been only six cases of serious sickness during the year. At dusk the grounds were illuminated with Chinese lanterns and variegated lamps.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Kicking After the Sermon.—Mr. Porter related at a recent meeting: "A man and his wife came to meeting, and at the close the man abused and even kicked his wife, and when asked for an explanation of his brutal conduct, he replied: 'She has been telling the preacher all about me.' Ah, dear friends, it was God who was speaking through the preacher to that man's soul. The man was not only striving with his wife, but he was doing far more, for he was striving against God's Holy Spirit. The man has, we hope, ere this, found forgiveness through faith in Jesus, the sinner's Friend."

A Nobleman's Possessions.—Mr. Ferrie remarked: "A gentleman on one occasion went into the country to visit a nobleman. He was a very kind-hearted, well-disposed man, but he lacked the one great thing—he was not a Christian. He took his visitor to the house, where they got a splendid view of the surrounding district, and pointing to the grounds which surrounded his magnificent mansion, he said: 'All this land is my possession.' Ah! replied the other, 'these are the things that make it hard for a man to die.' What a wise speech! for remember, dear friends, great is the fascination of riches."

Won by a Mother's Tear.—Mr. Jack Related: "I remember a mother, now in glory, who had an only son, for whom she prayed night and day that he might be brought to the Saviour. One night, sitting at the tea-table, she asked him if he would not go to the meeting to-night? 'No, mother,' he replied, 'I have got my drill to attend to-night.' He saw the tears gather in his mother's eyes, then steal slowly down her cheeks. His heart was touched; the tear had won him. Rising from the table, he slipped out of the house, and, instead of going to his drill, he went into an evangelistic meeting and waited until the after-meeting, where he was won for Jesus, and now he is a humble Christian, walking in the fear of the Lord."

A Satisfactory Sign.—An Evangelist said: "A man was induced to come into one of our meetings and was spoken to about his soul by one of the workers. He continued to come to the meeting after that, and one night I remarked to the worker who had spoken to him, 'I think that man is all right.' 'Oh, yes,' replied the worker; 'I am sure of it, I will tell you how I know. Previous to the new year, he had engaged a man to work for him for so much, and at the end of his time the man claimed his wages, but his master said: 'You did not work that time for me,' and refused to pay the man for the work which he had done. The first week after his conversion, he went to the man whom he had wronged, confessed his fault, and paid what was due. By this I know that the man is truly converted, for a good tree is known by the good fruit which it bears. Oh, yes, the man has given himself to Christ, and he is anxious to do nothing which will dishonor Him.'"

A Father's Unopened Letter.—Mr. Stuart said: "I knew a young man who lived in this country. He was brought up in a very good position; but when he came to be a man he strayed very far from God, and lived a very fast and a very wicked life. Shame at length drove him from the country. He enlisted, and was sent to India. His anxious parents knew nothing of him, until, through a friend, they heard that he was in India. His father at once wrote to him the following letter: 'My Dear Son: You are breaking your mother's heart.' Come home at once, and we will freely forgive you for all the wrong you have done us. I send out money to a friend in Calcutta to buy you out of the ranks, and also sufficient to bring you home. Come at once; we will give you a hearty welcome home. Your loving father.' He got the letter, but did not open it, thinking it was of no value. He went further into sin than ever, until at length he was stretched upon a hospital bed, with his life fast ebbing away. When he felt that his end was drawing near, he asked the nurse to give him the unopened letter out of his knapsack. There it was, telling him of his redemption from the army, and a free pardon from home. Oh, how he wished now that he had opened it and read the good news which was sent from a loving father to him; but he spurned it when he had the opportunity, and now it was too late forever. He died a poor castaway, without a friend near him, and, worse still, without a Saviour. Just such a letter is the Bible, which God has sent to those who are far off from Him; but they neglect it, until, at length, all chance of rejoicing in a father's pardon and a glad welcome home passes away forever."

A Surprising Discovery.—A Christian Friend related: "I was speaking to a man in one of our meetings the other night, who said, 'You need not speak to me; you can do me no good.' 'No,' I replied, 'I can do you no good, but Jesus can.' 'No, no,' he answered; 'I am a very ungodly man; no one can do me any good.' I directed him to Romans 5:6, and, putting his fingers on the verse, he read, 'Christ died for the ungodly.' Thinking that his eyes were surely deceiving him, he read the words over again, 'Christ died for the ungodly.' 'I never saw that in the Bible before,' he remarked. His hands began to tremble, and the strong man's frame shook with emotion, as he exclaimed, with the tears gathering in his eyes: 'I had no idea that Jesus loved me so much!' and then, in the agony of his soul, he cried: 'Oh, God, save me for Jesus' sake.' The cry was heard, and the answer came at once. Before leaving the meeting, he grasped my hand and repeated again, 'Oh, friend, I had no idea Jesus loved me so much!'"

A Welcome Visitor.—A Christian worker said: "I was staying in Manchester with a gentleman who was Scripture reader to the clergyman of that district. One day I asked what kind of a man was the clergyman, to which he replied: 'He is a right genuine good fellow.' 'I am glad of that,' I remarked. 'More than you are glad of it,' was the reply; 'he not only feeds their souls, but he also feeds their bodies. On certain days of the month he takes a basket and fills it with tea and sugar, and many delicacies, and with it on his arm he goes round and visits all the widows in the village, and distributes the contents of his basket, and the last widow he visits, he stays and takes tea with her. They are in no way displeased at this, for they say he leaves behind him three times as much as he eats. Therefore, he is always a welcome visitor.' But, dear friends, there is a Friend who has offered to come in and sup with you if you will let Him, and He will not only give you three times in return, but will satisfy your hungry soul with good things from His bounteous table."

Great Change in a Whole Family.—Mr. Mabon, a town missionary, reported: "God is giving us great blessing at our meetings in Partick. The other night I noticed a woman, who I thought had been a Christian for a long time, going out of the meeting weeping bitterly. Detaining her, I said: 'Mother, are you not trusting Jesus?' 'No,' she replied, 'I am not.' I asked her and a friend who was with her to step into another room, where I turned her to Romans 8:3, and read: 'For what the law could not do, etc.' Now, I said, 'For what Mrs. — could not do in that she was weak through the flesh, God sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin condemned sin in the flesh.' By this means she was led into the light. The friend who was with her, said: 'Will you put my name in there, too?' I did so, and I believe both women went away converted. Shortly afterward I called upon one of them, and finding her husband in, I asked: 'Did your wife tell you that she is converted?' 'She did,' was the reply. 'Would you not also like to be a Christian?' I then asked, 'Ay, that I would,' was earnestly said. 'Well, let us tell God so," I replied. The man willingly consented; we both knelt, and I pleaded that God would change his heart. The answer soon came, and he with his wife was rejoicing in the Lord. Their daughter came to the meeting the next night, and gave her heart to the Lord. I might here say that the Lord has, indeed, let the light of His countenance fall upon that family."

THE VALLEY OF DRY BONES.

By Rev. A. C. Tris.

The Call and Motion—The Sins Appearing—The Fleshly Beauty—The Skin of Administrative Capacity—Waiting for the Animating Spirit—The Inevitable Return.

THE CALL AND MOTION.

In verse 7 in the original we read: "And I have prophesied as I have been commanded, and there is a voice, as I am prophesying, and lo! a rushing, and draw neth the bones, bone unto its bone" (Dr. Young); and indeed, that call and motion, and voice has been seen and heard of among the Jews. Since the days of Mendelssohn, the great Jewish organizer in Germany, the lethargy of Israel, so proverbial through former ages, has passed away. Israel—the Jews—have been aroused from their sleep of ages, and the word "Forward! advance! Israel has yet a day of freedom coming," has reverberated through the continent of Europe, has been heard in the regions of the Hudson, and on the borders of the Indian Ocean. A powerful political concentration is established among the Israelites. The "Benai Israel," or the Sons of the Covenants, and many other politico-religious organizations, are everywhere in existence.

The number of Jewish students in the universities of Europe is very large. The press of Germany, England, and of the United States have many of their representatives, who are Jews by birth or converted Jews; and many of the choicest as well as of the most dangerous articles are produced and come from the Jewish mind. There is already a concert of action among the Jews, a network like a mighty cobweb, with all its ramifications in existence, which was not unknown, neither overlooked, by the late Mr. Disraeli, who employed the labor of the Moldavian or Hungarian peddler, of the unscrupulous Russian liquor-dealer, of the monied Jewish aristocracy, and leading merchants of Jewish nationality, to a good advantage, to know the inner workings of the political condition of the nations.

THE BONES ARE MOVING.

This is, indeed, the great event of the present age. Only forty years ago, and there was very little Semitic agitation. Except by reason of religious prejudices, it is quite different in our time. Russia has driven hundreds of thousands of her Jewish population from her dominion. Germany has manifested political hatred. Austria, Hungary, Poland have not only curtailed their liberty, but left them to the fury of their enemies. We have heard the "rushing," the shaking of the bones; how multitudes of Jews became wanderers and exiles, and many could not find a hospitable place; and how many thousands emigrated to Palestine, Jerusalem, and Asia Minor. And that is only the forerunner and vanguard of the great army to come. Bone came to his bone. Already is Jerusalem a city of Jews under Mohammedan rule, with her twenty thousand Jewish population; and Palestine is rapidly increasing in the number of her children coming to the old homestead.

THE SINS.

In verse 8, "And I beheld, and lo, on them are sinews" (Dr. Young). The sinews, or tendons of the body are known, and also their use. Here, in the prophetic Word, it gives the same idea of a strength imparted to the bones for moving and action; it means political issues, "coupling, tying together" as the Hebrew word signifies in its primary meaning (Job. 10, 10-40:17; Isa. 48:4). Indeed, Israel as a nation has outstripped all other nations in weakness, and also in inherited strength. Centuries passed by, and the Jews remained as they were before. Never becoming mechanics, they were known as peddlers and merchants, and goldsmiths; but the prophet saw that a time of a new national life should dawn, and that the mechanical strength of the nation should be developed. In delight he cries out: "Lo, on them are sinews," and, indeed, everything tends at the present time to prepare Israel for the return to a national life. It has become a people esteeming and fostering skilled labor, and having representatives in every branch; so that we find Jews as printers, bakers, shoemakers, builders, and in many other occupations; and in eastern Europe a great many are farmers. The transformation is going on gradually. It is, "Lo, on them are sinews!"

THE FLESH.

The prophet sees and says: "And the flesh came up upon them" (verse 8). The primary word "basar" has a meaning of fulness, fairness, beauty, also joy. In this vision the flesh calls back the appearance which Israel had in fairness, beauty, and wealth among the nations, when her political life was in a healthy condition, as is stated by the historians at the time of David and Solomon.

That healthy condition of political life and wealth should come back, and how this portion of the prophecy is already partly fulfilled, is known to us all. The Jews, as a nation, have accumulated a competent portion of this world's good; it is true there is yet a shady side, and many are poor. As a common rule, the Jews are no paupers, the words, "As rich as a Jew," have become proverbial. We could speak of the wealth of Jewish bankers and brokers and mercantile establishments on the globe belonging to Jews. We could point out that most of the best and richest trades in the emporium of this western continent, as well as in Europe and Asia—as the fur, the tobacco, the liquor, the collar, the clothing, and the diamond trades—are monopolized by, and in the hands of Israel—the Jews.

And what has the future in store for Israel? The answer to that question is recorded in Isaiah 60:9, 11-16, and 17: "That gold, silver, precious stones and the wealth of the nations," shall be their portion, and also "that they shall suck the milk of the nations (Gentiles), and shall suck the breast of kings;" and already this prophecy is verified in the present time, so that the ruling powers of Europe cannot undertake an extensive and costly war except the Jewish banking fraternity acquiesce, and provide the sinews of war; truly, "They suck already the breasts of kings."

THE SKIN.

In verse 8, we read: "And cover them with skin over above" (Dr. Young). Here we have the gradual and finishing touch of Israel's appearance as a body politic; and like the skin is in the textural relation, merely a part of the great mucous system, a basement tissue under which the vessels, nerves, and connective tissue all have their correspondence, and is, indeed, the most beautiful and finished part of the body, so are the intellectual powers of a nation the outward show and beauty of a body politic; and like as the skin is closely connected with the blood, nerves, and bones, so the intellectual powers of the people of Israel will stand again in bold relief, as they stood before, as a people endowed with great administrative qualifications, statesmanship, and energy. Already we have seen it in a Disraeli in England, and in many of the prime ministers of State in France, Austria, Holland, and elsewhere, who were Israelites by birth. What intellectual wealth Jehovah has laid up in store for Israel! It seems that the power of a lawgiver, as Moses, of a ruler, as Daniel, and of an organizer, as Nehemiah, is visible in that Semitic people; and, not only in statesmanship; it is also in literature, jurisprudence, languages, music, and in gigantic undertakings, that the present age has seen the beauty of Israel, and received a foretaste of the time to come when all those intellectual powers shall be developed.

NO POLITICAL LEADER AMONG THE JEWS.

Verse 9 declares emphatically: "But spirit there is none in them" (Dr. Young). How truly is that word of prophecy—The Jews love the graves of their fathers, and many desire to be buried in the land of Canaan; and yet, Israel lacks patriotism. Indeed, the Jews are an enigma among the nations of the globe. Their bones are scattered in the valley, and are moving; "political power is coming to them," the Semitic power is dreaded in Germany, is sought after as commanders for the armies of France, is courted in Britain, and is of great importance in the elections of the United States, so that they have already a great weight in the balance of the political power of the nations. They serve those nations often with courage and fidelity, but for the delivery of bondage, and for the national freedom of their "fatherland Canaan," not one voice is heard; they are, indeed, as in their graves (verse 12). Not one leader, like a Moses, Zerubbabel or Nehemiah, has arisen, proclaiming: "To lead God's ancient people to Palestine to regain their old homestead. They rather remain in their Ghettos, Jewish Strasses—in old Jewry—or in the land of their oppressors. True patriotic spirit there is none in them."

THE RETURN OF ISRAEL TO CANAAN.

Although the morning light of Israel's freedom, and their return to the land of Canaan is brightening only gradually, yet we have the sure promise of Jehovah Adonai that the meridian of Israel's day will come in all its splendor. It is an accomplished fact in the prophecy spoken by the son of Buzi; read verses 12-14: "Lo, I am opening your graves, and have brought you up out of your graves, O My people, and brought you in unto the land of Israel! And ye have known that I am the Lord, in My opening your graves, and in My bringing you up out of your graves, O My people! And I have put My Spirit in you, and ye have lived, and have caused you to rest on your land; and ye have known that I am the Lord." (Dr. Robert Young's Literal and Idiomatic Translation of the Holy Bible, and author of the "Analytical Concordance." One of the foremost linguists of the age).

We desire to draw the attention of every student of prophecy to how the word "Spirit" is used in the vision of the dry bones; in verse 5 it is without the article—"a Spirit;" in verse 8 the same, "no Spirit;" but in the 14th verse, it is, "My Spirit and My people." As soon as Israel returns to Canaan, and is in the land of Canaan, "a renewed covenant relation is established," then, it is not only the body politic, it is also the body ecclesiastic; then, it is, "O My people;" then they will know "the Great I Am;" then they will live, and a nation will be born in a day (Zech. 12:9-14). Then shall Jehovah Jesus be their King. Israel shall be called, "Hephzibah," my delight is in her; and Palestine, "Beulah," thy land shall be "married" (Isa. 62:4).

The Apostle Paul corroborates the words of Ezekiel. The apostle of the Gentiles proclaims in Rom. 11:12-15: "Now, if the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles 'nations,' how much more their fulness? . . . For if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?" both agree, as it were, in the same expression, it is life from the dead; "the nation stood up upon their feet an exceeding great army," a nation of priestly kings to bless the nations of the earth. The vista of the future of Israel at the close of this dispensation, shall be like a sunset in the clouds, seen on an ocean voyage—above all description; yet, when the morning of the Millennial age shall dawn, and the Sun of Righteousness shall arise, the glory of Israel shall be transcendent in beauty, and will eclipse our most glorious expectations.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republicans of Pennsylvania have Issued their political programme. At their State Convention, in session at Harrisburg, on July 8th, they adopted a platform, of which the following extract is the most important part: "The Republican party of Pennsylvania proclaims its advocacy of the repeal of the internal revenue taxes, except upon spirituous and malt liquors. The revenues necessary for a liberal support of the Government and the payment of pensions to our disabled soldiers, their widows and orphans, and of the principal and interest of the public debts, should be raised by an additional levy upon imports, and, with a view to lift business from its present and guard it against future depression, we insist, not only upon full protection to all home industries, but upon a prompt revival of our commercial marine and promotion of foreign commerce by proper discount of duties imposed on goods imported in American bottoms and proper bounties to goods exported in American bottoms. The live issues of the present campaign are protection to American industry, not only through adequate tariff laws, but such as will effectually stop the importation of foreign contract labor, and the establishment of a true system of civil service, one which will give competent officers, and yet not bind either the political thoughts or actions of American citizens, one which will give a fixed tenure of office, and no removal during the term of office, except for adequate public cause." The demand for an additional levy on imports in the present condition of business excites some surprise. It is stated in Republican journals of high standing in the party that the Pennsylvania demand will not be supported by the conventions of the party in other States. There is evidence that both the great parties are widely divided within themselves on the Tariff Question, but comparatively few advocate an increase of duties. The protectionists in both parties are, as a rule, content with the present rate.

A Rumor that the Cheyennes had Broken loose caused a panic in Kansas last week. Reports of massacres were in circulation, and it was stated that the Indians were advancing and burning all in their path. A telegram from Topeka announced that hundreds of families had abandoned their crops in terror, and crowded into that city. Scouting parties, however, reported that all was quiet, and no damage had been done. There is evidently ground for apprehension, nevertheless. Parties of Cheyennes well-armed have left the reservation, and others are slipping away every day. It is believed that the Government has received information of a serious character, for the President has ordered General Sheridan to proceed to the scene of disturbance and direct operations in person. The intentions of the Government are kept secret, but it is believed that an attempt is to be made to disarm the Cheyennes, which will, of course, precipitate a struggle. From twelve hundred to fifteen hundred fighting men are among them, who will not surrender their arms peaceably. There are now about three thousand United States troops on the Kansas borders. The President has directed General Sheridan to invite statements from the Indians of any real or fancied grievances they may have, and to assure them of the resolution of the Government to investigate and remedy them, and also to maintain peace and order.

A Mormon Insult to the Nation Caused some excitement in Utah on Independence Day. Early on the morning of July 4th the Gentile inhabitants of Salt Lake City were moved to indignation by seeing the national flags flying at half-mast on the City Hall, County Court House, News office, Mormon Tabernacle, Church Tithing Office, John Taylor's residence, Cerro Gordo House, Mormon Church Offices, and the Salt Lake Theatre. In a short time a number of loyal citizens assembled and organized a committee to wait upon the city officials and demand that the flags should be either raised or taken down altogether. On arriving at the City Hall the committee received an exasperating refusal to comply with the demand. Captain Evans, a member of the committee and an ex-Confederate, rushed to the stairs, declaring that he would raise the flag himself; but the Mormon police guarded the door and the city marshal warned his visitors that any man who dared to touch the flag-ropes would be shot. A Grand Army post, celebrating near the city, passed a resolution to put the flags in their proper places, and started to carry it out, but were prevailed upon by Governor Murray to refrain from fighting. Angry crowds of citizens gathered, which the Mormon police were preparing to disperse, when the mayor ended the matter by raising the flag to the masthead. His explanation of his conduct was that "the persecution" of the Mormons had rendered Independence Day a day of mourning. Evidently the Mormons are, for the first time in their history, in despair.

The Labor Troubles at Cleveland, Ohio, Culminated in a riot last week. The leaders in the agitation are Messrs. Chisholm's employes in the Cleveland Rolling Mill, who struck in consequence of the intimation of the firm that wages would be reduced on and after July 1st. A large proportion of them are Poles and Bohemians, whom the firm imported some time ago to replace American workmen on strike. The workmen of Cleveland naturally regard the present trouble as a just retribution on the employers. The scenes of disorder that took place on July 7th, however, are discreditable to a civilized city. Several other manufactories beside the rolling mill are controlled by the Chisholms, and these the strikers resolved to close. They commenced with the H. P. Nail Company. They made a rush for the works and drove out the workmen, who, to the number of one hundred and fifty, fled from the building. Several men who stood by their machines were given five minutes to leave or be thrown out. They all took the hint and left. The strikers then proceeded to the Chisholm Shovel Works, but their coming had been anticipated, and the laborers had been sent home and the doors locked. Thence they went to the Union Steel Screw Works. When the strikers reached the works they found all the doors shut and barricaded. In an instant the character of the procession changed into an angry mob. A fence was torn to pieces, and in a moment the door leading into the works was battered down and the strikers began to swarm into the building. The president of the company stood right in the way of the strikers, and they made a savage onslaught on him. He was struck with a club, knocked down, and while down repeatedly struck and kicked. If it had not been for the exertions of several of the strikers themselves he would have been killed. The mob then swarmed through the building, the men and boys who were at work leaving their places and jumping through windows and making their exit in the best manner they could. The girls were all told to leave, and were permitted to pass out through the door. Three of the girls fainted, and had to be carried to residences of citizens living near. One man who refused to leave the building was knocked down with a club and badly hurt. He was thrown down-stairs and had to be carried to his home. The character of the strikers was indicated by the fact that the red flag of the Commune was hoisted by them and carried in their procession. It is hoped that the worst of the trouble is now over, as the men seem to be awed by the military preparations made to repress disorder. Efforts are being made to induce the employes to pay the men's expenses back to Europe.

English People were Shocked Last Week by a series of disgusting revelations made by the Pall Mall Gazette, a high-class evening newspaper of conspicuous ability. It charged the aristocracy and moneyed classes of London with being guilty of crimes of the most filthy and loathsome character. Without mentioning names, it gave details of cases investigated by its own corps of editors and reporters, who have spent a month in visiting the refuges where fallen girls are received, and agencies in various parts of the city at which an abominable traffic is openly carried on. The evidence collected, the journal states, implicates princes, peers, bishops, cabinet ministers, members of Parliament, judges, barristers, distinguished army officers, and respected merchants. The facts disclosed show that the vices which brought the vengeance of God on the ancient cities of the plain, and which have made the name of Babylon a by-word in history, flourish in the British metropolis, and the guilty parties are men of the highest social position and influence. Mr. Spurgeon's solemn warning, uttered in his sermon published in these columns two weeks ago, indicated that he was aware that moral impurity was rampant, but probably he had no idea of the extent of it. He has written to the Pall Mall Gazette to express his approval of the course it has taken in publishing the facts. Public opinion is, however, divided as to the wisdom of printing in a paper read by persons of both sexes and all ages all the filthy details. It is a significant fact that no one seems to doubt the truth of the revelation. The editor of the journal seems to have expected that his assertions would be questioned, and therefore offered to disclose the names of the guilty parties, with the evidence against them, to a committee composed of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Manning, and four representative laymen, who should be pledged to secrecy, but should inform the public whether the charges were substantiated to their satisfaction. The Pall Mall Gazette has broken the law against obscene literature in publishing the articles, but it seems to be under no apprehension of prosecution, and it warns the government that if proceedings are commenced against it, it will in self-defence subpoena as witnesses the Prince of Wales and half of both Houses of Parliament. The exposure, it may be hoped, will lead to the enactment of laws for the prevention of the crimes mentioned, which is the object the Pall Mall Gazette has in view. We may hope, too, that it will lead to greater vigilance in this country, where, especially in New York, Chicago, and Cincinnati, the state of society is even worse than in London.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying The CHRISTIAN HERALD to colored ministers and others have been received to the amount of $9 since our latest acknowledgment. They were: from "A Friend," Lacota, Mich., $2; "A Friend," Verona, Wis., $2; Hillside, N. Y., $1; Menno, Pa., $4.

The Striking Railroad Men in Chicago have won a victory. The bosses met a committee of the men on July 7th, and arranged a compromise under which traffic was resumed. The sixteen leaders discharged by the company were reinstated, pending an investigation of their conduct subsequent to the recent trouble. The bosses claim that the leaders were discharged for specific offences committed after the new terms were arranged, while the union of employees believe that they were discharged because they took a prominent part in the agitation which secured the advance in wages. This question is to be settled by a public trial, and in the meantime the cars are to be run without molestation.

The Cholera has made its Appearance in France. The correspondent of the New York Times cabled last week: "No doubt there is cholera in the south of France; the marvel is that the authorities have been so long able to suppress knowledge of the fact. At Marseilles, so it is reported, there have been seventy cases in Camp Pas-de-Lanciers, and fifty cases have been sent to the hospital at Aix. This statement may, perhaps, be exaggerated; but the fact is, orders have been issued for the camp to be struck on Monday. Nothing further has been heard from Carcassonne, but it seems impossible that the outbreak can be staved off another week." Three suspicious deaths occurred at Marseilles on Friday. On Sunday Madrid was startled by the death of the Countess Romeral from the disease. She is the first person belonging to the upper classes who has died of the cholera this year in Madrid, and her death has caused almost a panic. The statistics published by the Spanish Government have been proved reliable. One day last week a correspondent counted two hundred and thirty-five interments of cholera victims in one cemetery alone, yet the Government figures were only one hundred and forty-four for the day.

The Foreign Policy of the New British Cabinet has been outlined by the Marquis of Salisbury, and it allays the apprehension felt that complications of a warlike character might arise out of the change of administration. The Prime-Minister said that he should not reverse the policy of his predecessors. With respect to the Anglo-Russian difficulty, he said: "The business of the Government is not now to consider or comment upon the past. It was their business to take up the policy of their predecessors, and to conduct it to an issue consistent with the public interest. Many pledges had already been given, and the first duty of any government was to see that pledges which an English Government had given should be observed." As to Egypt, Lord Salisbury said that the policy would be a firm one without oscillation, and the British troops would not be withdrawn until Egypt was safe. There was no alternative between taking a steady, cautious, and circumspect policy and taking a course which would cover England with shame—namely, to abandon Egypt to her fate.

An Evangelist's Gift to Saloon-Keepers is mentioned by a Southern journal. It states that the Rev. Samuel Jones, the famous Kentucky evangelist, received the gift of a purse containing $1500 as an acknowledgment of his services at the close of a series of meetings. He took out $200, and directed the committee to distribute the remaining $1300 among the families of the saloon-keepers who had been converted, and therefore thrown out of business.

The Use of an Old Rope is said to have led to a fatality in New York recently. Two painters were at work upon a scaffold, suspended in the usual way by a rope from the roof of the building, when the rope parted and the men were precipitated to the ground, and one of them died from his injuries. Last week a coroner's jury, composed of painters, sat to determine the cause of his death. The contractors claimed that the man's death was due to his own negligence in fixing the rope so that it chafed against the cornice of the building. They admitted that the rope had been five years in use, but insisted that a new rope would have parted if it had been fixed in the same way. The jury, after listening to other witnesses, came to a different conclusion. They expressed their belief that a rope which had been used for five years was unsafe, and that the dead man was the victim of the old rope. As they were experts, their opinion is entitled to respect, and workmen in future will hesitate to risk their lives on a rope that has been long in use. Happily for us, in the more important matter of the safety of the soul, there is no cause for apprehension on that score. The means of salvation God has provided will endure for all time; it is the new schemes of human origin which should be distrusted (Gal. 1:9).

An Excited Mother Dropped her Infant in the East River last week. On July 8th, as the steamer Laura M. Starin was returning from Glen Island, she passed an excursion barge off Astoria, N. Y. Many people on the barge waved their handkerchiefs, and among them was a woman on the upper deck, who had a baby on one arm. While waving her handkerchief she dropped the baby overboard, and, as it struck the water, she fainted and fell on the floor. Two men were in a rowboat near the barge, and they quickly pulled to the spot where the child fell, and were able to rescue it before it was drowned. When the mother recovered consciousness, her babe was placed in her arms. It is seldom that a mother is guilty of carelessness so gross in respect to the life of her child, but there is reason to fear that there are many parents quite as careless about the eternal life of their children. They are so engrossed with what is passing in the world, and so eager to share in any pleasure within their reach, that they pay no heed to the spiritual interests of those committed to their charge (Ps. 127:3).

Very Inadequate Consolation was Administered from the bench recently by a Wyoming judge, who passed sentence of death upon a condemned murderer in this wise: "I am by no means satisfied with the evidence in the case, and am not sure whether you killed John Forbes or whether he died by visitation of God, but my sentence is that you be hanged on the third Friday of next month, and should you know of your own innocence you will have the comforting thought that it is doubted by some of the wisest thinkers of the age whether life is in any circumstances worth living." A man must be strangely constituted if he could accept such a reflection as "a comforting thought." The condemned man will do well to leave "the wisest thinkers of the age" and their doubts to themselves, and turn his attention to the Word of God. He will find there that the remainder of his life, short as it may be, is so well worth living that it may become the portal to an eternity of happiness (Isa. 55:6, 7).

A Shot that Won a Wife was Described Recently by an old hunter in Virginia to a correspondent of the Philadelphia Times. The old man, who is now eighty years of age, is a fine, hardy specimen of hale, vigorous manhood. His experience in hunting made him the best marksman in Virginia, and it was in describing his achievements in that line that he told the reporter of the best shot he ever made. He had fallen in love with a young lady, but, owing to the objections of her parents, there seemed no prospect of marriage. One day, nearly sixty years ago, he was out as usual in the woods with his gun, feeling sorely depressed about his love affair, when he heard a woman's scream, and saw a lady on horseback rushing madly toward him. As she approached, he saw that a monster catamount was on the horse's neck, trying to reach the terrified girl. He raised his gun and fired, killing the catamount, and then ran to the girl's assistance. She was unhurt, and fainted on his shoulder. It was his own lady love, and he carried her to her home triumphantly. There was no further objection after that, and "this is old faithful" said the old man, as he told the story, taking down an ancient-looking gun from the rack and patting it affectionately, "what done the business for me. An' this," he continued, unrolling a musty looking parcel, "ar the skin of the varmint that brought about the nappy change, an' thar," pointing to a white-haired old lady who sat rocking and smiling in a corner of the room, "am the old gal herself." It was natural that the life the man saved should belong to him, and so the girl and her parents seem to have thought, but when that plea is applied to spiritual matters, it is not so readily conceded. Christ often gets small service from the men whose souls are saved by His death, though a complete surrender is but a reasonable service (Rom. 12:1).

An Unconscious Owner of a Fund in a New York bank applied to the Kings County Supreme Court last week for the money. The claimant, who is the wife of a Brooklyn physician, had never heard of the fund until a few days before applying to the court. It appears that more than thirty years ago two merchants in New York had dispute about a balance of $750 in their accounts, which were very extensive. The dispute grew, and the merchants were unable to agree. They had been friends from boyhood, and when the contention was at its height they seem to have recollected the fact, for they ended the dispute by a compromise. Rather than break their long friendship over a sum small in comparison to their transactions, they agreed to deposit it to the credit of a child, known to both of them, then an infant in arms. The money was so deposited immediately, and the matter seems to have passed from their minds. Neither of them mentioned it to the child or her parents, and when the merchants died, no one but the bank officials knew of the existence of the fund. Recently, however, as the principal and interest had increased to a considerable sum, the lady was informed of the circumstances, and lost no time in proving her claim to it. She has not acted as some Christians do, who, even after they learn of the treasures God has placed at their disposal, neglect to use them. It is true now, as when the apostle wrote, they have not because they ask not (James 4:2).

Cutting a Tiger's Claw is a Dangerous Under- taking; but it was successfully performed on July 4th, at the Zoological Garden, Cincinnati. The most ferocious of the tigers on exhibition there was suffering from a malformed claw, which grew into the flesh, and as it caused the animal pain every time it came in contact with the floor, the beast's temper grew worse daily. It was finally resolved to cut it out. A low, strong temporary ceiling was built in an inner cage, and so fixed that it could be lowered, reducing the size of the cage. The tiger was then driven in, and the ceiling gradually lowered. The beast fought terribly, and if the timbers had been less strong would have broken them. At length, the foot to be operated upon was drawn through the bars of the cage and secured with ropes, the tiger struggling fiercely all the time. One man came near losing his arm by a vicious blow from the infuriated beast. As soon as the foot was securely tied the superintendent went to work, and in a few minutes the claw was deftly cut away, and the end that was imbedded in the flesh extracted. The tiger was then allowed to return to its own cage, and, it may be hoped, find itself benefited by the operation. The tiger's resistance was perfectly natural, as it could not be expected to understand that the suffering was inflicted in kindness to save it from greater suffering. That excuse cannot be made for men who are restive and impatient under losses and trials; they should know enough of the wisdom and love of God to submit cheerfully (Lam. 3:33).

THE PURGING OF THE CONSCIENCE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh; How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" HEBREWS: 13, 14.

God's Idea of a Nation—Unrealized in the Wilderness—The Type to be Fulfilled—I. The Hindrance in the Way—Contact with Spiritual Death—A Sense of Past Sin—Of Present Defilement—Of Deficient Life—Contact with Evil—The True Purgation—The Purifying by the Sacrifice—Christ's Blood more Purifying—A Greater Sacrifice—Offered Himself—III. The Kind of Service Required—Living Service—Loving Service.

SOME of you may remember that six years ago I preached from this text, principally dwelling upon the type of the red heifer.* We then tried to show how in these ashes of the heifer, laid by in store and applied to the unclean with water, God gave to His people in the wilderness a purification of the flesh whenever they had defiled themselves by touching any dead thing. This was the great instrument by which they were delivered from a ceremonial quarantine under which they were kept apart till they had been purified. I am not going to enlarge upon that type to-day. I felt when preaching upon it that I had not reserved due space for the latter and more important part of the text; it is my purpose to make amends this morning.

God's idea of what a nation should be was set forth in the camp in the wilderness. If God's command had been fully carried out, the desert would have exhibited a scene of highest blessedness. Happy had they been if they could have carried out it would have been well with them in the highest degree. Alas! they were always seeking to be as the evil nations around them; they could not rest till they had descended to the level of the common mass of mankind; but if they could have risen to God's intent, so that the divine purpose of love had been fully carried out in them, they would have been the happiest of all the sons of men. We ourselves, as a church, if we can fulfil the type, if we live with God in the midst of us, if He is our dwelling-place throughout all generations, if we fetch our supplies from Him, if we move only at His bidding, if we intensely love Him, we shall be a people to be envied by all who know us.

But, alas! a great difficulty comes in the way; and of that I am going to speak this morning, in order to the removal of it. Our text very plainly points out the sad hindrance in the way of our service; we need that our conscience be purged from dead works, or else we cannot serve the living God. Secondly, our text leads us to consider the true purgation from this evil; if the blood of bulls and of goats purged the flesh of men so that they could draw near to the visible tabernacle of God, much more shall the blood of Christ purge our conscience from all that spiritual defilement which prevents our heart-worship of God.

I. First, then, let us briefly consider which lies in the way of the service of God. In the camp in the wilderness the law was that if a man touched a dead body he was made unclean by that touch; nay, if he only trod upon a dead bone in his daily walks, he was polluted by his accidental contact with death. If any person died in the tent, all the family, and the tent itself, became at once defiled, and they must undergo purgation before the inhabitants could mingle with the rest of the congregation, much less could go up to the holy place of assembly. My brethren, we are all under the ban by coming into contact with spiritual death. The apostle does not say, purge your conscience from evil works, because he wanted to turn our minds to the type of defilement by death, and therefore he said: "dead works." I think he had a further motive; for he was not altogether indicating wilful transgressions of the law, but those acts which are faulty because they are not performed as the result of spiritual life. I see a difference between sinful works and dead works which we may perhaps be able to bring into light as we go on. Suffice it to say for the moment, that sin is the corruption which follows necessarily upon spiritual death. First, the work is dead, and soon it rots into actual sin.

Upon our consciences there rests, first of all, a sense of past sin. Even if a man wishes to serve God, yet until his conscience is purged, he feels a dread and terror of God which prevent his doing so. He has sinned, and God is just, and therefore he is ill at ease. The law is not to be trifled with; it is sent into the world armed with terrible sanctions, and the conscience when awakened makes us know that we cannot sin with impunity. Sin, like a dark cloud, darkens our spirit, and shuts us out from joy. It is impossible for any man rightly to serve God with a living, loving worship while he is conscious of guilt. You see, then, that the first hindrance to holy service is our sense of guilt; and from this we must be wholly delivered: we must receive a new consciousness, a consciousness of perfect pardon and complete reconciliation, or else we cannot serve the living God.

On the back of this comes the consciousness that we ourselves are sinful, and inclined to evil. Men who know that they are forgiven, yet nevertheless are seized with trembling in the presence of the divine purity. They cry, "Woe is me! for I am a man of unclean lips." How shall we bear the vessels of the Lord if we are not clean? And clean we are not by nature. "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord? or who shall stand in His holy place?" We feel that we have not that perfect purity of heart and cleanness of hands which would fit us for the holy place; nor can we ever be saved from this fear, so as to take up our heavenly priesthood and serve God, till the precious blood of Christ shall be applied to the conscience, nor until we feel that in Christ we are accounted righteous. Happy are we if we are believers in Jesus; for He hath washed us and we are clean every whit.

But, besides this consciousness of sin and sinfulness, we are conscious of a measure of

DEFICIENT LIFE.

About us there is a body of death. Dead works are the things we most require to be purged from. Dead works need not be in themselves works of wilful sin. Without going into what the world calls actual sin, you and I may come into contact with spiritual death, nay, we carry death about us, from which we daily cry to be delivered. For instance, in prayer, or prayer in its form and fashion may be right enough, but if it lacks earnestness and importunity, it will be a dead work. A sermon may be orthodox and correct, but if it be devoid of that holy passion, that divine inspiration, without which sermons are but mere harangues, it is a dead work. An alms given to the poor is good as a work of humanity, but it will be only a dead work if a desire to be seen of men is found at the bottom of it. Like the almsgiving of the Pharisee, it will be a mockery of God. Without a spiritual motive the best work is dead. I confess that I never appear before you without a fear that my preaching may be a dead work among you. It must be so, as it comes from myself; its life must depend upon the spiritual power with which the Lord clothes it.

Do you not think that very much of common Christian conversation is dead, or very near to it? Ye stand and sing, but your hearts do not sing; ye bow your heads in prayer, but you are not praying; ye read the Scripture, but it is not inspired to you, so as to breathe its own life into you. Even our meditations and thoughts about God's work may be mere intellectual exercises, and so may be devoid of that power which alone can make them living works, fit for the service of the living God. Beloved friends, we want the precious blood of Christ to purge our consciences from this death and its working, and to lift us into holy and heavenly life.

Once more: I told you that the Israelites were defiled by even touching a dead bone, and this teaches us the easiness of being polluted. We have to come into in our daily dealings with ungodly men. Can we think of them, can we speak to them, can we trade with them, without incurring defilement? Even if we grow indignant with evil practices, may there not be sin in our indignation? and when we reprove the custom of the trade, may we not become Pharisees in that very act? We are seldom exactly right; in avoiding one sin we drop into another; we flee from the lion, and a bear meets us.

Can we walk through such a charnel-house as this world without being defiled even unconsciously? Remember, under the Jewish law the man who was defiled and knew it not was still under penalty; and when he did discover it, he was made to bring his sacrifice. He needed the blood of bulls and of goats and the ashes of an heifer even for his sin of ignorance. If we have heard an evil thing, or read an evil thing, it has probably left some stain upon us though we perceive it not. All the more surely it may be so because we do not see it; for that may but prove that the judgment has been depraved and the heart infected. The water of purification and the blood of atonement are needed day by day. Without these we cannot hope to minister before the Lord our God with acceptance.

II. Now, I want to show, in the second place, what is from this evil. Under the law there were several methods of purification, but the apostle was not of a mind, on this occasion, to speak particularly of any one of them; and therefore he summed them all up in these words: "The blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh." These things did purify the flesh, so that the man who had formerly contracted impurity might mix with his fellow-men in the congregation of the Lord. Now, if these matters were so effectual for the purifying of the flesh, well does the apostle ask, "How much more shall the blood of Christ purge our conscience from dead works?" Why does he say, "How much more?"

First, because it is more truly purifying. There was not really and truly anything of purification about the blood of bulls and of goats. Now, when the Lord Jesus Christ took upon Himself our human nature, and lived a life of perfection, and then made an offering of Himself in death, as the Just for the unjust; then there was a real sacrifice made unto the Most High God. Therefore he says "How much more?" if the shadow cleansed the flesh, how much more shall the substance cleanse the spirit?

Moreover, our Lord Christ offered a much greater sacrifice. Why doth the text here show the term "Christ?" The Apostle Paul uses the name of our Lord with considerable variety; it is sometimes "Christ," sometimes "Jesus," sometimes "our Lord Jesus," sometimes "our Lord Jesus Christ," sometimes "Christ Jesus." But there is a reason for the use of each name wherever it occurs. It would be an instructive study for you to try to find out why in such a place our Lord is called "Christ" and not "Jesus," or "Jesus" and not "Christ." In this passage the name used is "Christ." One reason why the precious blood has such power to put away sin is because it is the blood of Christ—that is, of God's Anointed, God's Messiah, the Sent One of the Most High. Our Lord came not as an amateur, but He came with a commission, He came with an appointment and unction from the Holy One. If, therefore, the Lord Jesus Christ be offered a sacrifice for us, He is appointed to that end by God Himself, and therefore He must be accepted of God.

* Published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 17th, 1899.

Note what it was that Christ offered, and be sure that you lay great stress upon it. "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself?" What a splendid word that is! Did He offer His blood? yes, but He offered "Himself." Did He offer His life? yes, but He specially offered "Himself." Now, what is "Christ?" The "anointed of God." In His wondrous complex nature He is God and man. He is prophet, priest, and king. He is—but time would fail me to tell you what He is; but whatever He is He offered Himself.

THE SPIRITUAL SACRIFICE.

Observe, then, the sacrifice was a spiritual one. You must never look at Christ's sacrifice as a carnal way, as though the mere drops of literal blood, as a material substance, could have virtue in them for the purging of sin. Do not know Christ after the flesh; be no longer children, but understand spiritual things. It is true that our Lord had a material body and poured forth material blood; but the essence of His sacrifice lay in His will, intent, motive, and spirit. I once heard a dissertation upon what became of those drops of blood which fell to the ground on Calvary, and I felt that it was foolish talk.

By the blood of Christ we mean His suffering unto death, the obedience which made Him yield His life, and especially the will of His soul to suffer, and the object of His mind in suffering. When the bullock was brought up to be a sacrifice in spirit; the bullock had no intention to die, and no understanding of the reason of its death; the bullock was not willing to die, and therefore it presented no sacrifice by the spirit. But Christ knew what He was, and why He was there, and why He must die, and He gave His willing assent thereto. He entered with His whole heart into the substitution which involved obedience unto death. "For the joy that was set before Him he endured the cross." It was by His spirit that He offered up a true and real sacrifice; for He says, "I delight to do Thy will, Oh, my God."

But then you must not forget that this spirit was divine—"by the eternal Spirit." The spirit of Christ was an eternal spirit, for it was the Godhead. Brethren, I never feel it hard to trust my sinful soul with the great sacrifice of Christ; I feel, on the contrary, that if I had all your souls within my body and all your sins heaped upon me, and all the sins of all the redeemed blackening my conscience, I could now readily trust to that divine sacrifice for the taking away of all that guilt. What limit can you set to the merit of one who by the eternal spirit offered up Himself? What bound can there be to a sacrifice divine? You can no more set a limit to our Lord's sacrifice than to Godhead itself.

ITS EFFICACY.

Now, all this tends to make us feel how clean are they who are purged by this sacrifice which our Lord offered once for all to God. Need I call your attention to the fact that He offered Himself "to God?" Yes, I must; for of late some have blasphemously said that the sacrifice was made to the devil. To mention such profanity is to condemn it.

Further, brethren, it comes home to us this way: we read in the Word of God that "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life," and we say to ourselves, "Then we have everlasting life, for we have believed in Him." We read, "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin," and our conscience whispers, "We are cleansed from all sin." So you see, brethren, that what the blood of bulls and of goats could not do, the blood of Christ has done; it has passed beyond the flesh, which, indeed, it has never touched in our case, and it has sanctified the heart, and calmed the spirit, thus preparing us to serve the Lord.

III. This brings me to my last head, which is this: consider the kind of service which we now render. After so much preparing, ourselves in the house of God?

I am not speaking to you who have never been purged from dead works by the application of the precious blood of Christ; for you cannot serve God, you are forbidden to come into His presence, or to stand among His saints. You are in quarantine, even as lepers put forth from the camp. Go home and set a red cross upon your door, and write over it, "Lord have mercy upon us." That would best befitt your unclean condition. As Joshua said to Israel, even so say I unto you, "Ye cannot serve the Lord; for He is an holy God; He is a jealous God." Ye must be born again ere ye can be acceptable unto Him; for as ye are, an infection is upon all your doings, and ye may not hope that He will accept anything at your hands.

But to you who have had that blood applied to your conscience by the Spirit of God, even to you I speak. You should present unto the Lord the constant worship of living men. You see it is written, "Purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God." You are not at this day likely to die in order to prove your love to God; but if you are ever called to it, you must be prepared to lose your lives for Christ's sake. But what you have to do is to "present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God." Now, a living sacrifice is much more difficult of presentation than a slain one. I believe there are thousands of men who could go to the stake and die, or lay their necks on the block to perish with a stroke for Christ, who nevertheless find it hard work to live a holy, consecrated life.

The act of one moment, however painful, must be much easier than that service which is to run through a series of years, until life itself shall close. But if the Lord Jesus gave Himself for you, will you not give yourselves for Him? If He died for you by His eternal spirit, will you not live for Him by that new spirit with which He has quickened you? Yes, brothers, sisters, it must be a lifelong sacrifice that we now present unto Him that liveth forever. Let us have no more dead works, no more dead singing, no more dead praying, no more dead preaching; no more dead hearing. "Oh," said one, when he heard a sermon, "it was very good, if it had been alive." Dead-and-alive Christianity is poor stuff. No dish ever comes to table which is so nauseous as cold religion. Put it away. Neither God nor man can endure it.

LOVING SACRIFICE.

I close by noticing how this precious blood of Christ will work all this in us. It will operate upon us thus: when our conscience is perfectly pure from sin, and we know that we are forgiven and accepted in the Beloved, then how happy we shall be! and there is no service so acceptable to God as that which is joyfully rendered. When it is a joy to us to serve Him, then it is a joy to Him to be served; when it is a delight to us to honor God, then God delights in such honor. He seeks not slaves to grace His throne. When we know that we are perfectly forgiven, then we are full of gratitude, we feel that we must serve God, not because of anything we are to get for it, but because we long to do so. It is the cleansing blood which brings us near enough to do this.

This precious blood of Christ has now given us perfect peace with God, and therefore we can serve Him without fear. You cannot serve an enemy; while you hate Him you cannot please Him; but our enmity to God is slain; He is our friend, our father, and our God. His will is our will, His designs are our designs. As far as the little can keep pace with the great, and the minute with the infinite, we run parallel with God; and if we ever quit the lines for a moment we are in misery till we get back again. What the Lord aims at we aim at, what He desires we desire. Is Christ's coming God's ultimatum? so it is ours, and we cry, "Even so, come Lord Jesus!" Shall "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ?" it is our last, best, highest prayer. Thus are we truly serving the Lord.

See ye not, then, how the washing of the precious blood has made us partakers of the service of heaven? How close it has brought us to God! In what amity and accord we walk with Him! With what sympathy we enter into all that He does! With what intense delight we joy in Him through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom also we have received the atonement! How I wish that every soul here believed in Jesus! Oh, that you would do so at once! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

"THE EXPOSITOR IN THE PULPIT"

contains some excellent advice to young preachers. It is an address which was originally delivered by Rev. Marvin R. Vincent, D.D., before the students of Union Theological Seminary, New York. Its object is to show the preacher how important a part the exposition of the Word should have in pulpit ministration. The young minister is liable to forget the fact. Quoting Dr. Whately, Dr. Vincent reminds his readers that "A hortatory discourse in a style of florid declamation is an easier thing than a good explanation, and also more likely to be popular, and to gain a man the credit of being a fine preacher." But the pastor who desires that his hearers may profit under his preaching will deal largely in exposition. As an illustration of the need there is for this class of work, Dr. Vincent mentions that, he was himself asked by an elderly church member what description of script it was that the apostles were forbidden to carry (Matt. 10: 9, 10), and being told that it was a pouch, confessed that he had always supposed that it was "some kind of certificate." Evidently that church member had been in Wall Street and understood the meaning of the word in that locality. Dr. Vincent believes that a true estimate of the value of exposition will prevent the common practice of wresting Scripture and extracting from isolated passages lessons they were never intended to convey. As an illustration of this tendency, he mentions a sermon against fashionable costumes from the text, "top-not come down" (Matt. 24: 17). And another on the dangers of the American Republic from the words, "Let her drive" (Acts 27: 15). Another curious illustration showing the evil of neglecting exposition, in order to force private and personal application, is that Dr. Vincent gives of a backwoods' preacher who, speaking from the text, "Enoch walked with God, and he was not for God took him" (Gen. 5: 24), said: "Enoch was not an Episcopalian; for he walked; he did not dance. Enoch was not a Baptist; for he walked; he did not swim. Enoch was not a Presbyterian; for he walked with God. Enoch was a Methodist, for God took him." Dr. Vincent's counsel is that, though it will seem sometimes that "the true meaning of your text yields you baser ore than your own thought about it, if you work your shaft resolutely on the line of the Word you will soon be undeceived. God's thought is always richer than man's. You may groan over a vanished sermon, but your people will rejoice in a better one." Dr. Vincent's book is very short, but it is so good that we wish it had been longer. There is, however, sufficient advice in it, if it is heeded, to work a very welcome change in the sermons under which congregations are amused, but not edified. Pp. 38; price, 30 cents. "THE LADY, OR THE TIGER?"

and other stories, by Frank R. Stockton, will probably amuse many people who are taking mental as well as physical recreation during the holiday season. The stories are of the light, entertaining kind which may be read without tiring the most exhausted mind. A vein of quiet humor runs through them, which, with their simplicity and originality, renders their perusal a real pleasure. They abound with ludicrous situations described with the utmost gravity The characters are life-like and well drawn. Mr. Tolman, the hero of one of the stories, is one of the most amusing personages who has appeared on the stage of fiction; full of whims and eccentricities, yet getting along without making himself the disagreeable individual that the eccentric man generally is. "The Transferred Ghost," and its sequel, "The Spectral Mortgage" are, as is indicated by their titles, an introduction to the supernatural world, but they are not ordinary ghost stories. The reader is invited to enter into close and uncanny relationship with the ghosts, and study their manners and occupations. These as described in the stories are surprising, and include a love affair between one of the phantoms and a young lady in the flesh, and an episode in which a ghost kindly assists a timorous suitor whose love-making is halting through want of confidence in himself. The volume closes with a laughable series of model letters, under the caption, "Every Man His Own Letter-Writer," providing models for correspondence in circumstances not foreseen by the compilers of "Complete Letter-Writers." Among them is one for the use of "a father to his son at school, in answer to a letter asking for an increase of pocket money." We fancy, however, that these models are intended for amusement rather than use. Fathers animated by feelings like those expressed in this letter, are usually able to find words to convey their meaning intelligibly without assistance. Pp. 207; price, 50 cents. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

"ABOARD AND ABOARD."

by Rev. W. P. Breed, D.D., is a collection of letters written, some of them, on shipboard, and others from Great Britain, where the author went to attend the great Presbyterian Council, in Belfast, Ireland, last year. The letters are simple, chatty, sprightly narratives of the author's experience, relating what he did, and describing what he saw in a plain but humorous phraseology. Dr. Breed, like a good American, put up on his arrival in London at the Franklin House, No. 7 Craven Street, where Benjamin Franklin resided while on his mission to London. We regret to notice that the good American doctor fell a prey to British smartness, which, for the honor of his country, he should not have done. He was cheated by the "cabbies," and had a leaden coin, knavishly professing to be worth fifty cents passed upon him. Dr. Breed duly climbed the Monument, visited the Tower, Westminster Abbey, and the Houses of Parliament. The letters are short, pithy, and interesting. Pp., 162; price, 15 cents. Published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls.

THE SWITCHMAN'S CHILD.

(See Illustration.)

ON a railroad in Prussia, where the switches are placed in the old-fashioned way, at the side of the rails instead of in the boxes, it was the duty of one of the switchmen to attend to these switches. One day he had just left one of them and was turning to another, when he heard the whistle of an approaching train. He ran to the switch and held it down, for the incoming train had to be switched at that point on to another line of rails, that it might pass safely a train ahead on the same track. As he laid his hand on the handle of the switch he saw, to his horror, his little son standing unconcerned on the track. What could he do? He might spring to his child and rescue him, but to do that he must loose the switch, and the wretched apparatus had no locking attachment and would spring back the moment they were loosed, and hundreds of lives might be lost. He was in sore trouble, but he could not neglect his duty, and crying out to his little boy, "Lie down! Lie down!" he stood by the switch.

The child, knowing well that his father must have some reason for his command, at once lay down, and the heavy train thundered over him. Little did the passengers think, as they passed safely over the switch, what their safety had cost one noble heart. The father rushed forward to where his boy lay, fearful lest he should only find a mangled corpse; but to his great joy he found the child alive and unhurt. The boy knew his father well; he knew that father would give no unnecessary orders, and he knew his father loved him; and that knowledge saved his life. One of the passengers in that train, an earnest Christian worker, who relates the incident, says that the lesson came to his heart with a force which has never passed away. Many a time since, when life has seemed hard to him and some sorrow seemed unnecessary and incomprehensible, he has thought of the prompt obedience of the switchman's child, and has, like him, obeyed blindly in simple trust.

A LIFE SAVED BY AN ALBATROSS.

(See Illustration.)

ONE of the most remarkable instances of rescue from a watery grave is related in a letter to a family in Montreal, from a friend who is an officer in an English regiment doing duty in India. He states that while the vessel in which his regiment was embarked was nearing the Cape of Good Hope it became necessary to administer corporal punishment to one of the soldiers. The man was publicly flogged, and though the punishment was not severe, the disgrace seemed to madden him. No sooner was he released than, in the sight of his comrades and the ship's crew, he sprang overboard. It may be supposed he intended to commit suicide, but if so his resolution failed when he struck the water, for as soon as he rose to the surface he made vigorous efforts to keep himself afloat.

There was a high sea running, and as the man was quickly swept astern there seemed small hope of rescuing him. Nevertheless, the captain had the ship's engines stopped and ordered a boat lowered. It seemed to the anxious watchers on board that hours passed before the boat was on its way to the spot where the man was struggling with the huge waves, but it was a dangerous undertaking, and apparently a hopeless one, to send a boat out on such a sea, and caution was necessary.

The soldiers crowded eagerly to the ship's side to look for their drowning comrade, and there they saw a strange sight. As the man was buffeted with the waves an albatross, a large bird frequently seen in those latitudes, flew immediately over him and made a swoop at him. The bird missed its mark, but the man caught it by the legs and held on with a death grip. The bird struggled to free itself, and fluttered its powerful wings in a vain effort to regain its liberty. How long the struggle would have continued it is impossible to say, but it was maintained until the boat reached the would-be suicide and took him on board. Incredible as this narrative appears, the name and position of the writer of the letter, who was an eyewitness of the incident, establish its veracity.

"A lucky escape," some will say, but the Christian, who knows that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the will of God, sees in such a marvellous deliverance an interposition of divine providence more unusual, but not more direct, than many deliverances from peril which have occurred in his own experience. God has kept faith with His people in His promise, "I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honor him" (Ps. 91: 15).

A TEXT IN THE STEERAGE.

(See Illustration.)

WHEN the Apostle John, in apocalyptic vision, saw the new heaven and the new earth, he tells us (Rev. 21: 7) that he noticed that there was no sea. Wealthy travellers, whose experience of the sea is gained in their own yachts, or in the saloons of the floating palaces, in which they enjoy luxuries of all kinds as they journey across the Atlantic, cannot appreciate the change mentioned by the apostle; but in the steerage of the transatlantic steamers on every voyage may be found many passengers to whom a world without a sea would be a happier world than this. During the last three years the revelations of the newspapers have made the great steamship companies ashamed of their conduct, and there is now on the chief lines some slight improvement; but even now much remains to be done in the interest of the passengers.

Have any of my readers been down into the steerage of a great ship? The foul smells, the semi-darkness, the filthy litter, the crowd of weary, sea-sick, miserable people, huddled together day and night without regard to comfort or decency, combine to render the place unspeakably offensive to sight, and touch, and smell, a place none who enter it ever forget. Those whom necessity compels to spend days, and nights in such a place are entitled to our sympathy, and there are many among them whose senses are quite as delicate and refined as those of their fellow-passengers in the saloon. Rough men and gentle women, old men and children, are crowded into those close quarters, to bear, with what patience and equanimity they can, the rolling and tossing of the ship, and the inevitable discomforts of a voyage. In such an experience the Christian who lives near to God finds many opportunities for usefulness. Relieved himself from fear of disaster, assured that shipwreck would be no catastrophe to him armed by his faith against temptations to repining and impatience, he is able to comfort and encourage those around him, and by his cheerful demeanor to be a light to their souls.

How much one steerage full of passengers owed to one Christian among them has recently been told by a grateful writer. There was, it appears, the usual crowd in the steerage, which was dark and gloomy as usual. It was in the winter and the passage was rough. The women, of whom there were many, and the children, suffered much from sea-sickness, and even the strong men, some of whom had made several voyages, lost their jollity before they had been two days out. On the third day the wind rose to a gale and the misery increased. The ship pitched and rolled with that constant motion which makes the unaccustomed voyager feel that one minute of stillness would be bliss—the floor quivering beneath their feet keeping sickly rhythmical time with the propeller, the wall in front constantly changing its position, now slanting forward, as if it would fall upon them, and now away, as if it was falling outward, not perpendicular for a moment, and the ceaseless roar outside of the waves, as if a thousand demons were clamoring for the lives of all on board. Ah! it was a miserable time.

One woman, with a baby at her breast, was sitting weeping silently, and others had huddled themselves into corners, as if they dreaded being spoken to. The men were speaking in subdued voices, or had fallen silent altogether, for a general impression prevailed that there was danger, and a rumor was current that a sailor had been heard say that the vessel could "not stand much more of that, for she was leaking already." Some were moaning, some were walking about discussing the situation in tones of solicitude, and a few were praying—all were sad and anxious.

"Come and sit here, mother," said a boy of some thirteen years, of bright, intelligent face, as he laid his hand tenderly on the shoulder of the woman with the baby. He pointed to a spot a few yards distant under a swinging lamp, to which he had dragged a box as a seat for her. The woman seemed little inclined to move, but the boy persisting, she apathetically consented, and the lad tenderly conveyed his mother to the seat he had prepared for her.

"Look there, mother," he said, pointing to a Scripture text which he had fixed under the lamp. "There's some comfort for you. When you feel dull you can look at that."

The mother looked up and read, "Trust in Him at all times; ye people, pour out your heart before Him: God is a refuge for us" (Ps.

62: 8). "Thank you, my boy," she said; you are a good son to your mother. May God bless you, as I'm sure He will."

The boy's upraised finger, on which the lamp shone, attracted the attention of others, and soon there was a group around the text which he had contrived to fix up. His Sunday-school teacher had given it to him as he said good-by to her, and instead of taking it to his new home, as he intended, he had concluded to put it to use now that there was need of it.

It was a spectacle to be remembered—that group of faces reading the text which seemed written for just such a time. There was no scoffing, no ridicule, but all seemed touched by the appropriateness of the words and the boy's strong faith in the promise as the best comfort. Doubtless many who read the words with emotion then forgot them when, a few days later, the vessel entered the bay and that danger was over; but even with them the lesson may not be lost. None will remember that voyage and the scene in the steerage without thinking of the text which perhaps in other scenes the Holy Spirit may apply to their hearts.

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

The First Shell.

AT nightfall Louise and I went home, worn-out and very downcast; for her mother had not yet entered the city, and we did not dare to guess at the reason. I said perhaps she had gone back to Saverne; but Lisbeth shook her head sadly, without speaking. I knew very well what she thought. For a day or two Louise persevered in her mournful watching; but after that Sylvie persuaded her to go to school with her, where there were some girls from Pfalzburg and Saverne, who could talk to her about those places. Still, whenever she was at home, she would creep away into one of the balconies, and peer down, with her distressed little face, as if still seeking her lost mother among the people passing along the street below. It used to make my heart ache to see her there, when I was coming home. But her mother never came.

All that time Lisbeth's attic used to be my favorite place. You could see the German camp, with its long lines of tents, almost as large as villages, which had sprung up like mushrooms upon the plain, stretching all across the south of the city. I knew it was the same to the north, but there was no window looking out that way—I had to go to the ramparts to see that camp. Sometimes I could catch the flashing of bright bayonets and spears, gleaming like lightning along the far-off fields, as the regiments marched in to take possession of their tents.

It was not till the 17th of August, nearly three weeks after the siege was proclaimed, that the enemy's circle was completed, and we were fairly shut in. Now there could be no more coming in or going out of Strasburg, until Marshal Bazaine came to our aid, or General Urrich and his brave garrison drove the invaders back to their own side of the Rhine.

One evening, when I came home a little before supper-time, I found a number of buckets full of water ranged on every landing, ready for some use. I ran up to Lisbeth's attic, where it was no play to carry water, and there I found nearly every pail and jar she had full up to the brim. Elsie was floating a little walnut-shell boat I had made for her the night before upon one of the pails. She sprinkled some drops of water upon my hot face as I sprang up the steps, and screamed, half in fear, when I made a dart at her as if I was angry. Lisbeth looked out to see who Elsie was at play with.

"Whatever is this for?" I asked, pointing to the water.

"The Committee of Safety has ordered it to be ready in every house," she said, "to put out any fire the moment it breaks out. The bombardment may begin any time now."

"Elsie," I said, "come and show me how you are getting on with your knitting."

"It's too dark to work now," she answered; "but it will be finished in time. Mother says it is sure to be finished in time."

She was getting on nicely with it, Lisbeth said; and the child unwrapped it carefully, to show me how clean and white she was keeping it.

"You are quite sure He knows I am doing it?" she asked, wistfully.

"Quite sure," I answered; "just the same as I do, Elsie."

"It is time for Elsie to sing her even-song," said Lisbeth, lifting her on to her lap. She sat there, upright, with clasped hands, and her blue eyes looking out earnestly at the faint sky, when the light was fading away fast. One verse she sang I remember well:

"Ah! dearest Jesus, holy child,
Make Thee a bed, soft, undefiled,
Within my heart, that it may be
A quiet chamber, kept for Thee."

I turned away that they should not see the tears in my eyes, to look through the casement at the watch-fires beginning to glimmer like glow-worms in the German camp. They stretched so far and wide, for miles upon the plain, that I felt, all at once in dismay, how great a host had come up against us.

"Elsie is not frightened," Lisbeth was saying, when I turned my head back again, as if she knew my thoughts, and my heart-sinking, of which I was ashamed.

"No, not here," she said, nestling closer to her mother; "there is nothing to be frightened at here."

"Just so," said Lisbeth, looking me steadfastly in the face; "just so are we in the arms of God; and there ought to be nothing to be frightened at there."

"Oh, Lisbeth!" I cried, "how do you know it?"

"Can a mother forget her child?" she said, with a quiet smile; "yes, she may forget; yet will not I forget thee." These are the words, Max.

"But," I answered, pointing to the German camp, "His arm is round them as well. He says the same words to them."

"Yes," said Lisbeth, "we are like children quarrelling on the same mother's lap; but her arms are round both, and she loves one as much as the other. It must be a great grief to the mother, though," she added, softly, as she laid her hand gently on Elsie's wide-open, shining eyes, and rocked her to and fro in her arms, till she fell asleep. Then I stole away across the floor, and went down-stairs, perplexed, and full of thought.

Were there any men who believed that—really believed it? That we were all brethren, with one Father in heaven, and one elder brother, Christ Jesus? If they believed it, how could there be any more war? And yet, as Lisbeth said, the children of one mother will quarrel, even on their mother's lap.

I opened the door of our dining-room, where supper was ready on the table, and Gretchen standing behind my grandmother's chair. Both of them looked troubled and disturbed, and Gretchen was the first to tell me the cause.

"We have a sergeant and three men quartered upon us," she said, "to sleep in our soft beds, and sit on our chairs. I never thought to live to see such times as these! Where will all the polish of the floors be, with their heavy tramp, tramp, and their thick boots? My mistress has offered to pay for them to be billeted elsewhere; but they say the city is crowded, what with peasants and soldiers. I thought it was hard enough to take in Louise; but four rough men—"

Gretchen could say no more, for her throat was choked; and my grandmother spoke, with a mournful quaver in her voice.

"It is true, Max. I do think it very hard, when we are only a family of women and children. But this is what war brings. Our houses are our own no longer."

"Are they to eat here?" I asked, for Gretchen had been buying in provisions, and it was not likely she had laid in store enough for four men.

"No," she said, recovering her voice; "they are only to sleep and live here. They take their meals with their regiment."

"Well, then," I went on, "if they only have my room, which is the largest, and opens close upon the staircase, you will not have much to do with them. You might pay Lisbeth to keep it in order for them; and the floor there is not so bright as the other rooms—that was why you gave it to me."

I saw that they were pleased with the idea; though it still seemed a great calamity to them to have these strangers thrust upon them. They talked it over all the time we were at supper; and then Gretchen and I went to make the needful arrangements, for the men were coming in that very night.

It certainly was vexatious to know that the bright floor would be all marked and spoiled, and that the smell of tobacco would fill the place; but it was not I who was put out by it. I was glad to know that some men were coming into the house, who would often be at hand to talk to, and to give me news of what went on in the citadel; and when they came I had no reason to be disappointed. They were decent, well-conducted men, who kept strictly to their own place, and never came into my grandmother's way. I saw more of them than any one else; for, besides going to inquire if they were content with their treatment, as being the only male representative of the family, I met them often in Lisbeth's attic, where they went partly to see Elsie, who was a great favorite with them, and partly to look out through the window over the enemy's camp. It was nearly as good a post of observation, they said, as the Cathedral tower, so far as the south of the city was concerned.

It was on the 21st of August, four days after the enemy had shut us in, that, as I passed through the long, broad archway by which we reached the square court belonging to our house, I overtook Sergeant Klein, with a basket on his arm, and Elsie perched aloft upon his shoulder. She looked all contentment, and nodded merrily to me as I joined them. The sergeant was striding along, but with slower steps than usual; and he gave me a military salute as soon as he saw me, saying, "Good-morning, Herr Max!"

"Good-morning, sergeant," I said, taking off my cap to him; for we liked one another, did Sergeant Klein and I.

"We are going to market for Lisbeth," he said, "but without speaking to her beforehand. She is not a capitalist, you know; and there are not as many caps to iron as there ought to be. Her purse is neither long nor well-lined; and my little one here has not had much breakfast this morning. There is no milk for Elsie now."

"No," answered Elsie, "but I am not hungry. Elsie never is hungry."

"A good thing for a siege, my little puss," said Sergeant Klein.

I looked what money I had in my purse. There were two francs and a few centimes; quite enough to buy vegetables to last Lisbeth and Elsie a week. Gretchen, I knew, had laid in a stock of provisions. But I had never thought of Lisbeth, and hundreds like her, who would have no money to buy in a store beforehand. Here, on the fourth day of the investment, all her food was gone, and she was dependent upon what she could manage to get from day to day. We went on to the market-place; but how different it was to what it had been only a few weeks before! Now, instead of hundreds of stalls, and people eager to sell, there were only a few salesmen, and a crowd of persons anxious to buy, but without money to pay the prices demanded.

Sergeant Klein pushed his way through the throng, and I followed him closely. There was rather a poor show of vegetables and fruit upon the stalls; but at the first answer to our inquiries I received a shock. The potatoes we asked for were a penny apiece; all the money I had would only buy thirty, and those were not large ones.

"So soon!" exclaimed the sergeant, "and we are not at the beginning yet! What is to become of us before the end is at hand?"

"Not at the beginning?" I repeated. "Why! the gates have been closed these four days!"

"But the music has not struck up yet, and the dance will begin after that," he said, significantly; "you know nothing of a siege, Herr Max."

"I am tired," said Elsie, on his shoulder; "carry me in your arms now."

She slipped down from her high seat, clasping his neck with her small hands. He bent down his head over hers, and I saw his eyes glisten with tears he would not let fall.

"I have two little ones at home," he said, glancing at me to see if I noticed them—"two little children and their mother, in an open village near Pfalzburg, and if these brigands should pass their way, the good God alone knows what would become of them."

"Do you like to be a soldier?" asked Elsie, stroking his cheek. It was a habit she had with those she loved, and I liked to feel her soft little fingers about my face.

"Bah! little one," he answered, "nobody asked me whether I should like to be a soldier or no. They just take us. No; Herr Max, believe me the peasants hate war. It is all loss and no gain to us. It is no fine thing, I tell you, to be torn from your own house, where there are the children, and the cattle, and the harvest all dependent upon you, and be driven, with thousands of poor fellows like yourself, where the bullets are rattling and falling round you like rain-drops in a thunder-storm. We are human beings, you see. We love our homes and our children as much as you others, who are living quietly in your own houses. We hate battles, and wounds, and death, as much as any one. And a siege is not a whit more to my taste than a battle. You will be of my mind before it is over."

"What will become of the poor?" I asked, looking down at the basket, which hung but lightly on my arm.

"Ah! God knows!" he said, again; "there are ten thousand peasants in the city—all extra mouths. But we must always hope!"

"See! see!" cried Elsie, pointing upward with her finger.

A large black ball was moving rather slowly—slowly enough for us to watch it—across the blue sky, at a good height above the spot where we stood; but it was already making a curve downward, as if it was about to fall at a little distance to the south. The sergeant's face changed, and he stood still, clasping Elsie closer to him, and holding my shoulder with a tight grip. We watched it out of sight.

"Listen!" he said.

It was several moments before any sound reached us. I saw the people strolling about the street, and talking to one another, unconscious of what was about to happen. Then there came a crash, followed by piercing shrieks, which rang through the air. For an instant every person within sight stood still, as if struck into stone; but afterward there was a frantic flight in all directions, some fleeing to the cathedral, which was close by, and others running swiftly to the place where the first shell had burst.

"The music and the dance are both begun," said Sergeant Klein, grimly. "Here, Max, take the child into the cathedral, and wait for me there. I shall be back presently."

ELIJAH THE TISHBITE.

S. S. Lesson for July 26, 1 Kings 17: 1-16. Golden Text, Prov. 10: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter. Elijah's Abrupt Appearance in the Palace—His Startling Announcement—A Human Religion—God's Witness—His Faith in God's answer to Prayer—The Unwonted Purveyor—Witnesses to God's Direct Provision—Elijah's Faith Tried—The New Provision—Apparently Unpromising—The Believing Widow—Looking to God not at Difficulties—Sickness as God's call.

WHILE the successors of Jeroboam were going to greater and yet greater lengths of wickedness, God was quietly preparing one of His own people to be a witness for Him, to kings, prophets, priests—in short, to all Israel. Of the birth and parentage of Elijah the Tishbite we are told nothing. Abruptly and unexpectedly he comes into the presence of the king with

THE STARTLING ANNOUNCEMENT.

"As the Lord God of Israel liveth before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years but according to my word." The king had ignored God, and chosen a religion which did not rebuke sin, and which entailed no responsibility on those who professed it, a religion to be controlled at will, which should minister to, rather than restrain the unholy passions of men; and which should serve the purpose of men who lived only for themselves. Was God aware of all which was going on? Yes, in the darkest times of sin and superstition, God has been at work. "My Father worketh hitherto and I work" (John 5: 17). He revealed Himself to Abraham just when all his antecedents had been those of idolatry and utter ignorance of God. Moses was called out of the most complete worldliness and ignorance of God. And in Ahab's time in the midst of the reign of sin, which was prevalent in Israel, God not only called an Elijah, but won seven thousand believers to Himself.

GOD'S WITNESS.

The very name of Elijah or Eljah was a witness to his God; it means "My God is Jehovah." He bore his message in the authority of God, it was not his part to make Ahab believe it, he adduced no arguments, added nothing of his own, took no responsibility upon himself; he gave his message and departed. But on, the power of those words! It was the simple but unanswerable word of the Creator which events must prove. God has made provision that all true preaching shall be thus powerful, thus divine. He has commanded His own people not to think beforehand what they shall say or what they shall speak; "It shall be given you in that hour what ye shall say and what ye shall speak, for it is not you that speak but the Holy Ghost." He would have us know His Word and keep it; He would have that Word dwell in us "richly in all wisdom." He would have us compare "spiritual things with spiritual." But when He gives us a message it must be "Hands off," and He is responsible to carry it home with power. The amount of preaching and teaching which does not accomplish its object is terrible, and the reason is clear, it is human not divine.

The prophet was a man of faith. The awful state of his land weighed heavily upon him. He communed with God, and then prayed the prayer of faith, not doubting in his heart (Mark 11: 23). "Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months" (James 5: 17). Had he no compassion for those who would suffer? Yes, indeed. But God taught him that His people could only be touched by real need. Elijah's message to the king was the result of his faith. The drought had not commenced; there was no visible sign of the answer of God. But so sure was Elijah that God had undertaken, that he delivered the message in unhesitating confidence. Afterward "The word of the Lord came unto him, saying, Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan." And it shall be, that thou shalt drink of the brook; and the ravens to feed thee there." Could Elijah trust God to maintain him where there was no human prospect of his procuring food? Might he not have said that he knew the habits of ravens too well to expect them to be his purveyors? The prophet saw God Almighty and abandoned himself to His care. "So he went and dwelt by the brook Cherith that is before Jordan." And God did not leave him long in suspense; one night's sleep and then the unwonted messenger of God brought him bread and flesh. It was not for him to inquire where it had been procured, a first cause was at work, and gratefully he took his morning meal. In the evening it was the same, and day by day the man of God was thus fed.

Thank God, in our day the Lord is raising up MANY WITNESSES who can prove by blessed experience that in food, and clothing, and other earthly necessities our heavenly Father careth for us, and "knoweth that we have need of all these things" (Matt. 6: 32). That eminent man of God, Mr. George Müller, of Bristol, with his two thousand and more orphan children, depending directly on the Lord, the numerous missionaries of the China Inland Mission, who go forth "without scrip or staff," with no salary guaranteed to them; the scattered faith missionaries in India; the Faith Homes of Dr. Cullis, in Boston; Mr. A. B. Simpson, in New York; Miss Carrie Judd, in Buffalo, and many others in America; of Mr. Zeller at Männedorf, in Switzerland, and Mr. Stockmayer at Hauptweil, as well as Mrs. Ginner's orphanage, Miss Mittendorf's, and many others in England, bear witness to the precious fact that God cares for our bodily needs, and is to be trusted for their supply. And yet this is no premium upon idleness. The command of God through Paul is clear enough, "If any would not work, neither should he eat" (II Thess. 3: 10). And it is no premium upon begging; faith and begging cannot go together. Paul himself worked for his daily bread. But there are some positions of usefulness where God Himself calls for an abandonment of those earthly cares to Him, because He has made the spiritual work itself to absorb all the time and strength.

FAITH ON TRIAL.

Elijah's faith was not without trial. "After a while the brook dried up, because there had been no rain in the land." The prophet who had prayed that there should be no rain—for the sake of the testimony it would be to the landowners and citizens, the rich and poor, that the Almighty God reigned—would not pray for rain that his personal needs should be supplied, he left his case with God. And not in vain. "The word of the Lord came unto him, saying, Arise, get thee to Zarephath, which belongeth to Zidon, and dwell there: behold, I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee." "A poor lookout!" some man of the world might say, "a widow sustain a stranger in a time of famine?" Yes; a widow in the hand of an Almighty God. Elijah was not afraid; reasonings he had none; possibilities and probabilities he left to those who had not the living God to trust to. "I have commanded" was his warrant, he counted on the Word of God.

On arriving at the city, he found the widow woman gathering sticks, and begged her to give him a little water. As she was going, he called to her, and said, "Bring me, I pray thee, a morsel of bread in thine hand." Could he have been mistaken in the woman? She answered, "As the Lord thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruse; and, behold, I am gathering two sticks, that I may go in and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die." Was it possible that God would have him take the last morsel from this poor widow? God could not make a mistake; He gave His servant a message to the widow, "Fear not; go and do as thou hast said; but make me thereof a little cake first, and bring it unto me, and after make for thee and for thy son. For thus saith the Lord God of Israel, The barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the Lord sendeth rain upon the earth." God was at work, making the poor woman believe it. She went and did as he had said, and the result was the little company of three were sustained during the time of famine. All through we see Elijah did not look at the difficulties, but at the Lord. If he had felt that he ought to rebuke the king, how awkward he would have been, and probably he would have lost his life. But when God sent him, He sustained him too. Had he looked at the ravens, he could not have brought himself to depend on such an extremely precarious mode of supply. Had he looked at the widow, he would rather have done anything than depend upon her in the time of her distress; but

and he was lifted above all circumstances whatsoever. We cannot be placed in circumstances which are too difficult for God. Believing that He is, and that He is a Rewarder of them that diligently seek Him (Heb. 11: 6), we can put any need, every need that arises, into His hands. He is enough for it. The difficulty may be insuperable to human resources, but God can master it. There may be complications which involve others, and we may be little able to count on them, but what cannot Almightyness accomplish? It is a blessed sign in these last days, that men are beginning to trust God with their bodies as well as their souls, with their earthly, as well as their spiritual needs. It is a witness to the unconverted that God exists, when they see cancers, lameness, paralysis, blindness, deafness yield before a present God. It is something which the most careless can understand, when those who never ask for money yet never suffer in a time of commercial distress, although they have no human means to fall back upon.

God had another work to do in the house. Sickness came in and attacked the widow's only son, so that he succumbed to it and died. Sickness is that we may hearken to His voice (Job. 33: 19-33). The widow recognized it as such, and came to the man of God convicted, "Art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?" For once Elijah had a moment of conflict, "O Lord my God, hast Thou also brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son?" His gratitude to the woman made him unwilling that sorrow should come upon her. In an instant he had turned to his omnipotent God, "he stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the Lord, and said, 'O Lord, my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come into him again.'" It was the first time in the world's history that such a prayer had been offered, but Elijah measured death with the Author of life, and believed in Him as the Overcomer. "The Lord heard the voice of Elijah; and the soul of the child came into him again, and he revived." Oh, what a new light on the faithfulness of God! Oh, what joy to take the risen child and say to his mother, "Lo, thy son liveth!" Oh, what greater joy to hear from her lips what neither sickness nor death had taught her. "Now by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the Word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth!"

COUNT THE MERCIES.

BY MRS. MARY D. JAMES.

Count the mercies! Count the mercies!
Number all the gifts of love!
Keep a daily, faithful record
Of the comforts from above.
Look at all the lovely green spots
In life's weary desert way!
Think how many cooling fountains
Cheer our fainting hearts each day.
Count the mercies! Count the mercies,
See them strewn along our way!

See oh, see, the countless beauties
In the charming scenes of earth!
Think of all the untold blessings,
Clustering round our home and hearth.
Think of friends and loved ones
To our hearts so dear and sweet.
Think of heaven's unnumbered blessings
Which you all the time receive!
Count the mercies! Count the mercies
Making bright paths for your feet.

Count the mercies, though the trials
Seem to number more each day;
Count the trials too, as mercies,
Add them to the grand array.
Trials are God's richest blessings,
Send to prompt our upward flight,
As the eagle's broken wings,
Make them fly to loftier heights.
Count them mercies—count them mercies
That bring heaven within our sight.

Count them mercies which shall sever
Cords that bind our spirits down—
Causeth them help to grovel,
And forget our heavenly crown.
Let all earthly ties be broken,
Nests be broken, hopes decay,
If to God our souls be driven,
If from earth we soar away.
Wondrous mercies! hallowed mercies!
Urging us the heavenward way.

Thus we find the purer comforts,
Richer far than those of earth—
Joy unalloyed and enduring,
Treasures of surpassing worth.
Beams of bright, celestial radiance,
From the Centre of our Light,
Spreading o'er each scene of sadness,
Hails gladdening to our sight.
Count the mercies—count the mercies—
Filling us with joys so bright!

Let us number all our jewels,
Let us estimate all our gains,
Let us thank the Gracious Giver,
Strewing blessings o'er the earth;
All our hearts overflow with gladness,
Let us tell the wonders o'er;
Till our multiplying treasures
Seem a countless, boundless store.
Then let praises—grateful praises,
Be our language evermore.

The Christian's Secret of A Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH.

BAPTIST COMMENDATION.

"We are delighted with this book. It reaches to the very core of Christian experience, and is eminently experimental in its teachings. It meets the doubts and difficulties of earnest seekers after the bread and water of life, but whose efforts result only in alternate failure and victory. The author, without claiming to be a theologian, sets forth the results of a happy and rich experience to help others into a happy Christian life."—Baptist Weekly.

METHODIST VIEW OF PRAISE.

"We have not for years read a book with more delight and profit. It is not a theological book. No effort is made to change the theological views of any one. The author has a rich experience, and tells it in a plain and delightful manner."—Christian Advocate.

How to See Jesus with Fullness of Joy and Peace.

250 pp. Cloth. Price, 75 cents.

This precious book has been the means of comfort to many a weary soul, and hoping that many more may be led to read its exhortations. We give a few of the many commendations we have received. A new edition has just been printed, and we send it forth earnestly hoping that it may have even more blessed in its ministrations than the former ones.

"I have been fifty years a member of the Presbyterian Church. Your 'How to See Jesus' has helped me to a better understanding of some things, and to a deeper interest in the Scriptures. Your words are so plain and simple that they come at once to the heart as food in season."—Rev. J. W. Kimball, Mass.

"I have read 'How to See Jesus' with much joy. It brings so much help to me."—Oakland, California.

"I find in 'How to See Jesus' just the reading we invalids need."—St. Louis, Mo.

"How to See Jesus' is such a good book I want it to be comforting many who need it."—Altoona, Pa.

"While in Des Moines, Iowa, I found your book 'How to See Jesus.' I have thought many times since the good Lord must have led me to it, as found in it just the comfort I needed. It will be a benefit to many of my friends; have decided to make them a present of it; so please send me twelve."

"Thanks for the precious book 'How to See Jesus.' I have never read a book that has done me any good."—S. A., Colorado.

"Many thanks for calling my attention to 'How to See Jesus.' And it is grandly helpful!"—W. J., South Pueblo, Col.

Heaven: My Father's House.

It is often said we know nothing of heaven, but Jesus says, "All things that the Father hath are mine; the Comforter shall take of mine and show it unto you." True to his promise, from the day I knew the Lord, the Comforter began to show me heavenly things. What I freely received, He made me freely give. The kind approval here recorded increased my obligation, and not less my delight to share these joy-inspiring things with as many as I may. I pray God that each reader may find them his Lord's own revelations to himself.—Profess.

"I am surely say that, excepting my Bible, no book has ever done me so much good as 'Heaven: My Father's House.' After a day spent in the sick room trying to calm the feverish brain and ease the aching limbs, you cannot imagine with what eagerness I turn to that book for rest, and it never fails to bring it, and with it the prayer, 'Not as I will, O Father.'"—E. E. Jones.

"Death, as seen from Mr. K's point of view, is a natural event in the Christian's life. Instead of recoiling from the inevitable destiny, we are led to this in the hope to look into the change with joy, and with cheerfulness."—Rev. Dr. H. B. Swinton, Theological Seminary.

"Full of life and illustrations, fresh, vigorous writing, and, notwithstanding its religious character, is borne of daily; the writer speaks as though his thoughts were upon him. Afulness of nature, and joy in life through it."—E. E. Jones.

Encouragements to Faith.

This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it.

"This volume is simply a transcript of direct, affectionate conversational endeavors which the Lord designed to use to help a troubled soul out of a sea of doubts. The difficulties dealt with are the difficulties of the human heart, and not unlike any one who is exposed to the hear the commands of God slighted, and his promises spoken of as not to be relied upon. There are to-day thousands of our week-day and Sabbath schools struggling with the same. Here is a warm hand longed for, and a light thrown upon the way from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them."—Profess.

"About three years ago I first saw your 'Encouragements to Faith,' at the house of a friend; and being at that time under a cloud spiritually, I begged to have it. It was just what I needed, and it has freed me under my disability to be a Christian Worker, and in my weakness began to doubt God's notice of His creatures, added nothing to my faith in my Pastor in my distress, but he treated it lightly, having more faith in me than I had in myself. Then I came

PRESBYTERIAN ENDORSEMENT.

"The book is so truly and reverently devoted to its spirit that it disarms criticism. It contains so much that is sound and practical, so much that, if heeded, will make our lives better, happier and more useful, that the intelligent reader who really wishes to have his heart with Christ in God, can scarcely fail to derive profit from it personal."—Interior.

CONGREGATIONAL COMMENT.

"It contains much clear, pungent reasoning and inspiring incidents. It is a practical and experimental lesson taught out of God's word, and is worthy of universal circulation."—Church Union.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD.

PROMINENT MEMBERS OF THE NEW ADMINISTRATION IN GREAT BRITAIN.

TEN MEMBERS OF THE BRITISH CABINET.

On the first page and page 476 of this number are portraits of the most prominent statesmen to whom has been committed the administration of the government of the British Empire. Lord Salisbury has made his Cabinet unusually large. It contains sixteen members. Usually only nine or ten of the Secretaries have seats there, but as the statesmen who sat in the previous Conservative cabinets could not be excluded from this without affront, they have been admitted, while the younger statesmen, whose energies are really needed, have necessarily been admitted also. The Premier will doubtless find so large a number inconvenient, but to have made it smaller would have aroused jealousies which would have involved danger.

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY.

Premier and Secretary of State.

A SKETCH of Lord Salisbury's life appeared in our issue of June 28th; it is therefore unnecessary to recapitulate; but we may add to the details given in that notice a few personal facts collected by Mr. Henry W. Lucy, and published in a recent number of Harper's Magazine.

"As a Parliamentary orator," says that writer, "the Marquis of Salisbury is unquestionably the chief figure in the House of Lords. He possesses in almost equal degree with the late Lord Beaconsfield the quality of being personally interesting, of which he is now the only remaining example in either House of Parliament. . . . His very manner in the House of Lords makes his speeches the more charming. Half leaning on the table, and speaking in a level, conversational tone, as if his helpless victims were not of sufficient importance to inspire either gesture or declamation, he lets fall some of the most rasping sentences which it is possible to combine in the English language. . . . There was a time when all the infinite scorn of Lord Salisbury's soul was poured on Mr. Disraeli—a personal attitude much easier of comprehension than that of later years, when the two statesmen sat shoulder to shoulder on the ministerial bench. . . . Regarded personally, Lord Salisbury is the most striking figure in the peerage, the nearest realization modern conditions permit of the capable, headstrong, and imperious English baron of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, K.G.

President of the Board of Trade.

THE present ducal house of Richmond dates from 1675, and was the creation of King Charles II. That licentious monarch, the most vicious of the infamous race of the Stuarts, turned the royal palace into a harem, and for some time the most favored woman in it was the degraded creature called Louise de Querouaille. She was a woman of some ability, which she used to hold Charles under the influence of the King of France, and gave him money, as a bribe, to betray the interests of his country. The son of this vicious pair was created Duke of Richmond when he was three years old, and became the ancestor of the present Lennox duke.

Charles H. Gordon Lennox, Duke of Richmond, was born at the London family mansion, Richmond House, Whitehall, on February 27th, 1818, and is now sixty-seven years old. He was educated at Westminster School, a nursery for the British army. Thence he proceeded to Oxford University, where he graduated B.A. in 1839. He immediately entered the army, but never saw any active service. He became a captain in 1844, and was aide-de-camp to the Duke of Wellington, and Viscount Hardinge, bearing the title of the eldest son of the Richmond family, Earl of March.

The southern family seat is Goodwood Park, near Chichester, which is maintained in princely style, and at certain seasons the Dukes of Richmond are wont to entertain royalty, foreign as well as English. The late duke lavished untold sums upon the improvement of the historical patrimony. He was a man of great talent, and, like his son, a soldier, but he had seen active service, and had a deep bullet wound in his chest, from which he suffered much during the later years of his life. His philanthropy and strong attachment to the Church of England were marked characteristics in him, as in the present duke.

The duke, prior to his father's death, sat in the House of Commons, and took a deep interest in agricultural questions. He has been in office before, and during one of his terms had charge of the measures for stamping out the cattle-plague. The Dukes of Richmond were until lately in receipt of an income the product of an onerous burden that became intolerable. It was laid upon the shoulders of the English nation by Charles II., who, in order to provide for his illegitimate son, empowered him and his successors to collect twenty-five cents on every ton of coal shipped in the river Tyne. That tax was collected until the year 1800, a period of one hundred and twenty-eight years, when the late duke was persuaded to relinquish his tax for a pension of $95,000 a year, which ceased upon his death.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

Secretary for India.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL is the son of the late and the brother of the present Duke of Marlborough, a descendant of John Churchill, the conqueror of Blenheim, the favorite of Queen Anne, who gave him his dukedom and a pension for himself and his heirs of $20,000, which is still being paid. In the one hundred and seventy-three years which have passed since the grant, the Dukes of Marlborough have received by this pension $3,460,000. Lord Randolph does not get any of it, as his brother, the duke, is a licentious, dissolute man, who needs it all for his expensive vices.

Lord Randolph Churchill entered Parliament in 1874, on the crest of the wave of Tory reaction. He sits for Woodstock, a family possession that went with Blenheim. Few knew him when he rose the first time to address the House of Commons, but he soon proved that he possessed an instinctive knowledge of what the House of Commons likes, and the power of saying the right thing just at the right time. In this he is like the late Earl of Beaconsfield, whom he seems to have made his model.

He commenced as Mr. Disraeli did, by attacking the chief of his own party, Sir Stafford Northcote, whom he has now driven out of the House of Commons. He was despaired at first, but he made so many telling points that the House began to listen to him with attention. Sir Stafford Northcote was becoming lethargic and unfit to lead a great party, and Lord Randolph Churchill's criticisms were well aimed, and they told. Gradually he gathered a group of young Tories around him, and his influence in the House increased. Now it has been found necessary to placate him by removing Sir Stafford Northcote to the House of Lords, and putting Lord Randolph in office.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH.

Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE statesman whom Lord Salisbury has selected for the office which we in this country call Secretary of the Treasury is forty-eight years of age. He was born in London in 1837, at the town residence of his father, who was Member of Parliament for the eastern division of Gloucestershire. He was educated at Eton, from whence he went to the University of Oxford, where he gained the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1858, being placed in the first class of law and modern history. He graduated Master of Arts, after the usual interval.

Entering upon political life, he was elected, in July, 1864, Member of Parliament by his father's old constituents in East Gloucestershire, whom he has continued to represent in the Conservative interest to the present time. This is not the first time he has held office. He was Parliamentary Secretary to the Poor Law Board from February till December, 1868, with the exception of a few weeks, during which he was Under-Secretary for the Home (Interior) Department. He also served as a member of the Royal Commission on Friendly Societies.

When the Conservatives again came into power, after the election of February, 1874, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach was appointed by Mr. Disraeli to the responsible and difficult office of Chief Secretary for Ireland. Subsequent experience fully proved that the Premier was not mistaken in his estimate of Sir Michael's talents, for the Conservative Chief Secretary displayed such tact and moderation in the House of Commons as to extort compliments even from the Home Rule members at the termination of the protracted debates on the Irish Coercion Acts in the Session of 1875.

He has yet to prove whether he possesses the financial capacity requisite for a successful Secretary of the Treasury. The Conservatives have never been remarkable for ability in that department, and their errors never escape notice, for they have in Mr. Gladstone an opponent who whatever other defects he may have, is the most brilliant financier in the world. Beside this office, which in the circumstances is exceptionally difficult, Sir Michael is, by virtue of it, leader of his party in the House of Commons, and in any great debate will be expected to defend the home and foreign policy of the administration.

LORD JOHN MANNERS.

Postmaster-General.

THE dukedom of Rutland, which Lord John James Manners will inherit if he outlives his elder brother, is a very rich peerage. The motto of the family is "Pour y parvenir," (to attain to the object), and it is a very appropriate one. The Dukes of Rutland have kept one object consistently and steadily before them, and have "attained" it to a marvel. They made it their object to become rich in land and money, and they now possess 69,021 acres, a large part covered with valuable buildings, paying a rental of $450,000 a year. A large portion of this property came into the family in the sixteenth century.

The head of the family in that time was favorite of Henry VIII., and when that king suppressed the monasteries Rutland succeeded in getting a fat slice of the plunder. Since the Rutlands have not been idle. At various times lands have been left to the people of the country as "common lands," where a poor man who had saved money enough to buy a horse or a cow might have free pasture for it. Wherever any of these lands lay near the Rutland estate the duke has stolen them or swindled the people out of them. In one parish alone—that of Braunston—he seized 1286 acres, which his son still holds.

Lord John Manners is the second son of the late, and brother of the present Duke of Rutland. He was born December 13th, 1818, and therefore in his sixty-seventh year. He was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated M.A. in 1839, and in June, 1841, he was, with Mr. Gladstone, elected Member of Parliament for Newark. In 1850 he was elected Member for Colchester, and continued to represent that borough till March, 1857, when he was elected for North Leicestershire.

He made his maiden speech in February, 1841, when he opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws, advocating, subsequently, the cultivation of diplomatic relations with the See of Rome, and of better understanding with the Irish priesthood and in many other matters showing that he held too broad opinions to act always with his party though he opposed Sir R. Peel's free-trade measures in 1845-46, and from that time identified himself with the Conservatives.

Lord John Manners's official experience was in minor offices until 1874, when he was placed in the office to which he is now again appointed—that of Postmaster-General.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON.

Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

THREE earldoms are in the possession of the fortunate family to which the Right Hon. Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, Earl of Carnarvon, belongs—those of Carnarvon, Powis, and Pembroke. The present Earl of Carnarvon was born June 24th, 1831, and has therefore just completed the fifty-fourth year of his age. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated as a first-class in classics in 1852, and D.C.L. in 1859.

Lord Carnarvon was Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Derby's second administration, 1858-'59, and was appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Derby's third administration, June, 1866.

Lord Carnarvon has a habit of disagreeing with his colleagues, and on this occasion he resigned the Colonial Secretaryship on account of a difference of opinion respecting Parliamentary Reform. Lord Carnarvon, in the speech he delivered on the occasion, avowed that he was opposed to allowing so large a number of poor and uneducated people to vote at elections as would be admitted to the franchise under the bill. So he resigned his office.

On the formation of Mr. Disraeli's (Earl of Beaconsfield's) Cabinet, in February, 1874, he was for the second time appointed Secretary of State for the Colonies. He resigned his seat in the Cabinet on January 24th, 1878, in consequence of his disagreement from his colleagues as to the policy of ordering the British fleet to proceed to the Dardanelles. Lord Derby, Foreign Secretary, tendered his resignation at the same time, but was induced to remain in office a short time longer, when he again resigned and joined the Liberals.

The appointment to the Vice-Royalty of Ireland is considered a wise one, as Lord Carnarvon is of a conciliatory disposition, and is known to be inclined to consider favorably proposals for a tentative experiment of local self-government. He has been favorably received in Dublin by the press and people.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD.

Lord High Chancellor.

THE coveted prize of the legal profession in Great Britain has fallen to a man but little known in this side the Atlantic. The office itself is a very valuable one, both in pay and patronage. The salary is $50,000 a year, and a pension on retirement for life of $25,000. It also carries the presidency of the House of Lords for the incumbent, and a seat there for his heirs in perpetuity.

Lord Salisbury has given this office to Sir Hardinge Stanley Giffard, who in 1875 held the office of Solicitor-General in the Cabinet of the Earl of Beaconsfield, when he also received the honor of knighthood. He is a son of the late Mr. Stanley Giffard, Barrister-at-Law, of Kilcorral, in Ireland. He was born about the year 1830, and is now fifty-five years old. He was educated at Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1852, and M.A. in 1855. He was called to the bar of the Inner Temple in 1859. He represented the Cornish borough of Launceston in the House of Commons.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE.

First Lord of the Treasury.

SIR STAFFORD HENRY NORTHCOTE, who has now been created Earl of Ildesleigh, and whose portrait appears on page 476, was born in London, October 27th, 1818, and is now in his sixty-seventh year.

Having passed some time at Eton, he was sent to Balliol College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1839, taking a first-class in classics. He subsequently acted as private secretary to Mr. Gladstone while that statesman was President of the Board of Trade, from 1843 to 1845, and on being called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1847 he became Legal Secretary to the Board of Trade. On the death of his grandfather, Sir Stafford Henry Northcote, in 1851, he succeeded to the family title and estates.

In March, 1855, he was elected a Member of Parliament for Dudley, and continued to represent that constituency till April, 1857. From July, 1858, till May, 1866, he sat in the House of Commons as member for Stamford, and was then elected for North Devonshire, though it had rejected him a few years previously. This constituency has since returned him at every succeeding general election.

Soon after his entrance into Parliament his experience of official life commenced. He held the post of Financial Secretary to the Treasury during the first half of the year 1859, and he was appointed President of the Board of Trade in Lord Derby's third administration in 1866. From the early part of 1867 until the end of 1868 he acted in the responsible capacity of Secretary of State for India. He was also a member of the Joint High Commission whose labors resulted in the Treaty of Washington in 1871.

When Mr. Disraeli (afterward Lord Beaconsfield) formed his Cabinet in 1874, Sir Stafford Northcote was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, and on the removal of the Premier to the House of Peers he became also the leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons, which he has held until the present time. It is understood that he does not regard his elevation to the peerage as a promotion. He would have preferred to retain his post of Conservative leader in the Commons had not Lord Randolph Churchill insisted that a more capable man was needed in the Commons. As he has been, by his position as leader of the Conservatives, pitted against Mr. Gladstone, the difference in the abilities of the two men has been somewhat sharply defined. A witty but irreverent Member of Parliament recently hearing the Liberal leader described by the title his admirers give him of "the Grand Old Man," promptly gave his rival, Sir Stafford, the title of "the Grand Old Woman," and so querulous and indecisive is the late Conservative leader, that the title was too appropriate to be forgotten.

THE RIGHT HON. W. H. SMITH.

Secretary for War.

MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, whose portrait appears on page 476, is a Londoner by birth. He was born in 1825. He received his early education at a free grammar school, where he continued a pupil until he was ready to enter his father's business. This was the book trade, in the days when cheap literature had not become the order of the day. The time, however, arrived when the popular newspapers were reduced to a penny, when cheap literature was published by the ton weight, and the copies numbered millions per week. As these were printed there came an increased demand for them. The Post Office was considered too slow and too expensive in its operations to transmit the weighty loads week by week into the country, or to distribute them in and around London; and it was then that the father of Mr. W. H. Smith proved himself to be a man equal to the emergencies of the hour. He opened stalls at the railway stations, where the morning papers were sold, and orders taken for other publications and the trade supplied.

The business became a great success in the hands of Mr. W. H. Smith alone, and before the firm became "W. H. Smith & Son." When the latter, however, entered the concern, he threw into it an amount of energy and tact that soon made a business which had been large before one of the most important in the country, and, being a monopoly, one of the most prosperous.

In 1868 the idea of his election as a Conservative for the radical constituency of Westminster might have seemed Utopian. Westminster had been for three years represented by Mr. John Stuart Mill, one of the broadest of the broad in politics, religion, and moral principles. But such was the reputation which Mr. W. H. Smith had gained among the electors since the previous election in 1865, when he failed, that in 1868 they were proud to choose as their representative one who owed his rise from the ranks neither to aristocratic influence nor to subservient adulation of the people.

He had not long been in Parliament when the late Lord Beaconsfield offered him the post of Financial Secretary of the Treasury, a position demanding business qualifications of the highest order. During the subsequent Premiership of Lord Beaconsfield, in 1870, he was First Lord of the Admiralty. He is now made chief of the military department, though he knows as little about soldiers as he did about ships.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR R. A. CROSS.

Secretary for the Home Department.

RICHARD ASSHETON CROSS, whose portrait appears on page 476, was born at Red Scar, near Preston, Lancashire, on May 30th, 1823, and is therefore now sixty-two years of age.

He was educated at Rugby School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1846 he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts. In 1849, having chosen the law for his profession, he was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple.

In March, 1857, he was elected Member of Parliament for Preston as a Conservative, and continued to represent that borough until 1862. At the general election which took place in December, 1868, he came forward as a Conservative candidate for South-west Lancashire, in opposition to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. The election, which, as might have been expected, was watched with the keenest interest throughout the United Kingdom, terminated in Sir Richard Cross obtaining a majority of three hundred and fourteen votes above Mr. Gladstone. At the general election of 1874 Sir Richard Cross was returned without opposition.

On the formation of Mr. Disraeli's administration Sir Richard Cross was appointed Secretary for the Home Department—or, as we call it, "the Interior"—on February 31st, 1874, and on the same day he was sworn in as a member of the Privy Council. During the time he has been in Parliament he has been instrumental in passing several important acts, chiefly with the object of giving the poor and the workmen legal protection against the rapacity of employers and landlords.

His services at the Home Office, during the last Conservative administration, met with general approval, and by his undoubted skill in debate he rendered valuable and efficient aid to the Government, whose Eastern policy he skillfully vindicated in several powerful speeches.

Sir Richard Cross has also obtained a large share of public honors outside of Parliament, holding many coveted offices to which no salary is attached, but which prove that he is held in esteem by the people.

The First Jewish Peer ever Admitted into the British House of Lords, was sworn in on July 9th. The New York Herald says that Lord Rothschild was introduced by the Earl of Rosebery, husband of Hannah Rothschild, daughter of the late Baron Mayer, and by Lord Carrington, son of that Lord Carrington who, during ten years of contention, from 1848 to 1858, voted against the bill admitting Lord Rothschild's father, Baron Lionel, to the House of Commons. Several peers who fought in the latter period against Tory bigotry were present to see the revenge that the whirligig of time had brought. In the gallery were the proud and happy faces of Lady Rosebery, Lady Rothschild, Lady Anthony de Rothschild, Miss Alice de Rothschild, who watched the proceedings. The oath was taken with great solemnity on a Hebrew copy of the Pentateuch, held by Deputy-Clerk Ralph Disraeli, brother of the late Earl of Beaconsfield, while Lord Rothschild stood with his head covered. Then, as the first Hebrew peer took his seat on the front opposition bench below the gangway, all his colleagues cheered.

THE THREE RINGS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Put a ring on his hand."—LUKE 15 : 22.

The Richest Ring in Existence—God's Service a Joyous One—I. The Ring of Adoption—A Child's Old Dress Given Away in Philadelphia—Children of the Ruler—The Family Secrets—The Brotherhoods—II. The Marriage Ring—A Procession of Memories—No Divorce of that Marriage—Margaret, the Scottish Girl—III. The Ring of Festivity—The One Gold Ring—A Pillow of Rest—The Safe Anchorage—Life's Saturday-Night—A General Invitation—The Final Step.

I WILL not rehearse the familiar story of the fast young man of the parable. You know what a splendid home he left. You know what a hard time he had. And you remember how after that season of vagabondage and prodigality he resolved to go and weep out his sorrows on the bosom of parental forgiveness. Well, there is great excitement one day in front of the door of the old farm-house. The servants come rushing up and say, "What's the matter? What's the matter?" But before they quite arrive, the old man cries out: "Put a ring on his hand." What

A SEEMING ABSURDITY.

What can such a wretched mendicant as this fellow that is tramping on toward the house want with a ring? Oh, he is the prodigal son. No more tending of the swine-troop. No more longing for the pods of the carob-tree. No more blistered feet. Off with the rags! On with the robe! Out with the ring! Even so does God receive every one of us when we come back. There are gold rings, and pearl rings, and coral rings, and diamond rings; but the richest ring that ever flashed on the vision is that which our Father puts upon a forgiven soul.

I know that the impression is abroad among some people that religion becometh and belittles a man; that it takes all the sparkle out of his soul; that he has to exchange a roystering independence for an ecclesiastical strait-jacket. Not so. When a man becomes a Christian, he does not go down, he starts upward. Religion multiplies one by ten thousand. Nay, the multiplier is in infinity. It is not a blotting out—it is a polishing, it is an arborescence, it is an efflorescence, it is an irradiation. When a man comes into the kingdom of God he is not sent into a menial service, but the Lord God Almighty from the palaces of heaven calls upon the messenger angels that wait upon the throne to fly and "put a ring on his hand." In Christ is the largest liberty, and brightest joy, and highest honor, and richest adornment. "Put a ring on his hand."

I mark, in the first place, that when Christ receives a soul into His love, He puts upon him

THE RING OF ADOPTION.

Eight or ten years ago, in my church in Philadelphia, there came the representative of the Howard Mission of New York. He brought with him eight or ten children of the street, that he had picked up, and he was trying to find for them Christian homes; and as the little ones stood on the pulpit and sang, our hearts melted within us. At the close of the services a great-hearted wealthy man came up and said: "I'll take this little bright-eyed girl, and I'll adopt her as one of my own children;" and he took her by the hand, lifted her into his carriage, and went away.

The next day, while we were in the church gathering up garments for the poor of New York, this little child came back with a bundle under her arm, and she said: "There's my old dress; perhaps some of the poor children would like to have it," while she herself was in bright and beautiful array, and those who more immediately examined her said that she had a ring on her hand. It was a ring of adoption.

ANCESTRAL PRIDE.

There are a great many persons who pride themselves on their ancestry, and they glory over the royal blood that pours through their arteries. In their line there was a lord, or a duke, or a prime-minister, or a king. But when the Lord, our Father, puts upon us the ring of His adoption, we become the children of the Ruler of all nations. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God." It matters not how poor our garments may be in this world, or how live in, or how mean the hut we live in, if we have that ring of Christ's adoption upon our hand we are assured of eternal defenses.

Adopted! Why, then, we are brothers and sisters to all the good of earth and heaven. We have the family name, the family dress, the family keys, the family wardrobe. The Father looks after us, robes us, defends us, blesses us. We have royal blood in our veins, and there are crowns in our line. If we are His children, then princes and princesses. It is only a question of time when we get our coronet. Adopted! Then we have the family secrets. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him." Adopted! Then we have the family inheritance, and in the day when our Father shall divide the riches of heaven we shall take our share of the mansions, and palaces, and temples. Henceforth, let us boast no more of an earthly ancestry. The insignia of eternal glory is our coat-of-arms. This ring of adoption puts upon us all honor and all privilege. Now we can take the words of Charles Wesley, that prince of hymn-makers, and sing:

"Come let us join our friends above,
Who have obtained the prize;
And on the eagle wings of love
To joy celestial rise.

"Let all the saints terrestrial sing
With those to glory gone;
For all the servants of our king,
In heaven and earth, are one."

I have been told that when any of the members of any of the great secret societies of this country are in a distant city and are in any kind of trouble, and are set upon by enemies, they have only to give a certain signal and the members of that organization will flock around for defence. And when any man belongs to this great Christian brotherhood, if he gets in trouble, in trial, in persecution, in temptation, he has only to show this ring of Christ's adoption, and all the armed cohorts of heaven will come to his rescue.

Still further: when Christ takes a soul into His love He puts upon it

A MARRIAGE RING.

Now that is not a whim of mine. "And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in lovingkindness, and in mercies" (Hosea 2 : 19). At the wedding altar the bridegroom puts a ring upon the hand of the bride, signifying love and faithfulness. Trouble may come upon the household, and the carpets may go, the pictures may go, the piano may go, everything else may go; the last thing that goes is that marriage ring, for it is considered sacred. In the burial hour it is withdrawn from the hand and kept in a casket, and sometimes the box is opened on an anniversary day, and as you look at that ring you see under its arch a long procession of precious memories. Within the golden circle of that ring there is room for a thousand sweet recollections to revolve, and you think of the great contrast between the hour when, at the close of the "Wedding March," under the flashing lights and amid the aroma of orange-blossoms, you set that ring on the round finger of the plump hand, and that other hour when, at the close of exhaustive watching, when you knew that the soul had fled, you took from the hand, which gave back no responsive clasp, from that emancipated finger, the ring that she had worn so long and worn so well.

On some anniversary day you take up that ring, and you polish it until all the old lustre comes back, and you can see in it the flash of eyes that long ago ceased to weep. Oh, it is not an unmeaning thing when I tell you that when Christ receives a soul into His keeping He puts on it a marriage ring. He endows you from that moment with all His wealth. You are one—Christ and the soul—one in sympathy, one in affection, one in hope.

There is no power in earth or hell to effect a divorce after Christ and the soul are united. Other kings have turned out their companions when they got weary of them, and sent them adrift from the palace gate. Ahasuerus banished Vashti; Napoleon forsook Josephine; but Christ is the husband that is true forever. Having loved you once, he loves you to the end. Did they not try to divorce Margaret, the Scotch girl, from Jesus? They said: "You must give up your religion." She said: "I can't give up my religion." And so they took her down to the beach of the sea, and they drove in a stake at low-water mark, and they fastened her to it, expecting that as the tide came up her faith would fail. The tide began to rise, and came up higher and higher, and to the girdle, and to the hip, and in the last moment, just as the wave was washing her soul into glory, she shouted the praises of Jesus.

Oh, no, you cannot separate a soul from Christ. It is an everlasting marriage. Battle and storm and darkness cannot do it. Is it too much exaltation for a man, who is but dust and ashes like myself, to cry out this morning: "I am persuaded that neither height, nor depth, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor any other creature shall separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus my Lord"? Glory be to God that when Christ and the soul are married they are bound by a chain, a golden chain—if I might say so—a chain with one link, and that one link the golden ring of God's everlasting love.

I go a step further, and tell you that when Christ receives a soul into His love He puts on him

THE RING OF FESTIVITY.

You know that it has been the custom in all ages to bestow rings on very happy occasions. There is nothing more appropriate for a birthday gift than a ring. You delight to bestow such a gift upon your children at such a time. It means joy, hilarity, festivity. Well, when this old man of the text wanted to tell how glad he was that his boy had got back, he expressed it in this way. Actually, before he ordered sandals to be put on his bare feet, before he ordered the fatted calf to be killed to appease the boy's hunger, he commanded: "Put a ring on his hand."

Oh, it is a merry time when Christ and the soul are united. Joy of forgiveness! What a splendid thing it is to feel that all is right between me and God. What a glorious thing it is to have God just take up all the sins of my life and put them in one bundle, and then fling them into the depths of the sea, never to rise again, never to be talked of again. Pollution all gone. Darkness all illumined. God reconciled. The prodigal home. "Put a ring on his hand."

THE ONE GOLD RING.

Every day I find happy Christian people. I find some of them with no second coat, some of them in huts and tenement houses, not one earthly comfort afforded them; and yet they are as happy as happy can be. They sing "Rock of Ages" as no other people in the world sing it. They never wear any jewelry in their life but one gold ring, and that was the ring of God's undying affection. Oh, how happy religion makes us. Did it make you gloomy and sad? Did you go with your head cast down? I do not think you got religion, my brother. That is not the effect of religion. True religion is a joy. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

Why, religion lightens all our burdens. It smooths all our way. It interprets all our sorrows. It changes the jar of earthly discord for the peal of festal bells. In front of the flaming furnace of trial it sets the forge on which sceptres are hammered out. Would you not like to-day to come up from the swine-leaving and try this religion? All the joys of heaven would come out and meet you, and God would cry from the throne: "Put a ring on his hand."

YOU ARE NOT HAPPY.

I see it. There is no peace, and sometimes you laugh when you feel a great deal more like crying. The world is a cheat. It first wears you down with its follies, then it kicks you out into darkness. It comes back from the massacre of a million souls to attempt the destruction of your soul to-day. No peace out of God, but here is the fountain that can slake the thirst. Here is the harbor where you can drop safe anchorage.

Would you not like, I ask you—not perfunctorily, but as one brother might talk to another—would you not like to have a pillow of rest to put your head on? And would you not like when you retire at night to feel that all is well, whether you wake up to-morrow morning at six o'clock, or sleep the sleep that knows no waking? Would you not like to exchange this awful uncertainty about the future for a glorious assurance of heaven? Accept of the Lord Jesus to-day, and all is well. If on your way home some peril should cross the street and dash your life out, it would not hurt you. You would rise up immediately. You would stand in the celestial streets. You would be amid the great throng that forever worship and are forever happy. If this day some sudden disease should come upon you, it would not frighten you. If you knew you were going you could give a calm farewell to your beautiful home on earth, and know that you are going right into the companionship of those who have already got beyond the toiling and the weeping.

LIFE'S SATURDAY NIGHT.

You feel on Saturday night different from the way you feel any other night of the week. You come home from the bank, or the store, or the shop, and you say: "Well, now my week's work is done, and to-morrow is Sunday." It is a pleasant thought. There is refreshment and reconstruction in the very idea. Oh, how pleasant it will be, when we get through the day of our life, and lie down in our bed of dust, we can realize: "Well, now the work is all done, and to-morrow is Sunday—an everlasting Sunday."

"Oh, when, thou city of my God,
Shall I thy courts ascend?
Where congregations ne'er break up,
And Sabbaths have no end."

There are people in the house to-day who are very near the eternal world. If you are Christians, I bid you be of good cheer. Bear with our congratulations to the bright city. Aged men, who will soon be gone, take with you our love for our kindred in the better land, and when you see them, tell them that we are soon coming. Only a few more sermons to preach and hear. Only a few more heartaches. Only a few more toils. Only a few more tears. And then—what an entrancing spectacle will open before us!

"Beautiful heaven, where all is light,
Beautiful angels, clothed in white,
Beautiful strains that never tire,
Beautiful harps through all the choir;
There shall I join the chorus sweet,
Worshipping at the Saviour's feet."

I stand before you on this Sabbath, the last Sabbath preceding the great feast-day in this Church. On the next Lord's day the door of communion will be open, and you will all be invited to come in. And so I approach you now with not picking out here and there a man, or here and there a woman, or here and there a child; but giving you an unlimited invitation, saying: "Come, for all things are now ready." We invite you to the warm heart of Christ and the enclosure of the Christian Church. I know a great many think that the Church does not amount to much—that it is obsolete; that it did its work and is gone now, so far as all usefulness is concerned. It is the happiest place I have ever been in except my own home.

I know there are some people who say they are Christians who seem to get along without any help from others, and who culture solitary piety. They do not want any ordinances. I do not belong to that class. I cannot get along without them. There are so many things in this world that take my attention from God, and Christ, and heaven, that I want all the helps of all the symbols and of all the Christian associations; and I want around about me a solid phalanx of men who love God and keep His commandments. Are there any here who would like to enter into that association? Then by a simple, childlike faith, apply for admission into the visible Church and you will be received. No questions asked about your past history or present surroundings. Only one test—do you love Jesus?

Baptism does not amount to anything, say a great many people; but the Lord Jesus declared: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," putting baptism and faith side by side. And an apostle declares: "Repent and be baptized, every one of you." I do not stickle for any particular mode of baptism, but I put great emphasis on the fact that you ought to be baptized. Yet no more emphasis than the Lord Jesus Christ, the Great Head of the Church, puts upon it.

THE FINAL STEP.

The world is going to lose a great many of its votaries next Sabbath. We give you warning. There is a great host coming in to stand under the banner of the Lord Jesus Christ. Will you be among them? It is going to be a great harvest day. Will you be among the gathered sheaves? Some of you have been thinking on this subject year after year. You have found out that this world is a poor portion. You want to be Christians. You have come almost into the kingdom of God; but there you stop, forgetful of the fact that to be almost saved is not to be saved at all. Oh, my brother, after having come so near to the door of mercy, if you turn back you will never come at all. After all you have heard of the goodness of God, if you turn away and die, it will not be because you did not have a good offer.

"God's spirit will not always strive
With hardened, self-destroying man;
Ye who persist His love to grieve,
May never hear His voice again."

May God Almighty this hour move upon your soul and bring you back from the husks of the wilderness to the Father's house, and set you at the banquet, and "put a ring on your hand."

THE CAMBRIDGE ATHLETES IN CHINA.

MESSRS. STUDD and Smith, the two young Cambridge students whose portraits appeared in this journal on April 9th, have arrived at their chosen field of labor for Christ. In the course of a letter to the Independent, dated Pekin, May 8th, the Rev. Henry Blodget, D.D., thus refers to the arrival there of the young men and their companions:

"Among the seventy and more missionaries who have recently come to China from England, in connection with the China Inland Mission, are five graduates of Cambridge University, and two young officers who have resigned their commissions in the British Army. One of these Cambridge graduates, Mr. Stanley P. Smith, had the stroke oar in the University boat race in 1882." Another, Mr. C. T. Studd, was a well-known member of the cricket club, which played against the Australian club. These young men now enter, with the other members of that mission—about one hundred and fifty in all—upon the great work of evangelizing the Chinese people. On their arrival in China they assumed the Chinese costume, and had their heads shaved, preparatory to braiding in the Chinese queue, as is customary in that and in some other missions. Thus apparelled, they made their preparations for leaving western civilization on the shores of China, and taking up their abode in the city of Han Chung in the remote province of Shensi, in the north-western part of China, thence to go to Szechuen, or to what other region the necessities of the work might call them.

Before leaving Shanghai these brethren held a series of evangelistic services, at which all English-speaking persons were invited to be present. Large numbers attended, attracted by the report of what these men had been in England, as well as by the fact that two of them were so well known in athletic contests. The audiences listened most attentively to their earnest and powerful addresses, and quite a number were converted. The chaplain at the cathedral in Shanghai acknowledged that now he had come to know the Saviour.

At Shanghai they parted company, some to go by the river route to Han Chung, while Messrs. Smith, Cassel and Hoste came with Mr. Bolles to Tientsin and Peking, to go thence by land to Tai-Yuan-fu and Han Chung. At Tientsin the same blessing followed their labors. Some who had long halted between two opinions were brought to take a decided stand for Christ. At Peking their circular letter, inviting all to attend evangelistic services, brought together many who seldom or never before had been found in such places. Among them were Roman Catholics, a Greek Catholic, and Protestants of various denominations. All listened most attentively while Mr. Stanley P. Smith set forth with great eloquence and power the simple truths of the Gospel. The services lasted for ten successive evenings, while meetings were also held each afternoon in different parts of the city. The simplicity and earnestness of these young missionaries won all hearts, and their preaching was with power.

"These brethren preach and teach the old Gospel in the spirit and power of such men as Finney and Kirk, Moody and Spurgeon. They have no new notions in regard to eschatology. They give themselves wholly to their work. The most remarkable thing in their preaching is their familiarity with and dependence upon the Bible. Their mouths are full of the most apt quotations from the Old Testament and the New, and they use these with great power. Their lives are marked by self-denial and prayer, with fasting. They visited no remarkable places in Peking, saw no sights, wondered at nothing, but made it their one object, while here, to seek for themselves and for Christians the power of God's Spirit according to His promise.

"There are now in Cambridge University forty men or more who are looking toward missionary work in the foreign field; a large number, also, in Oxford. From these old universities fresh streams are issuing forth to gladden the desert wastes. One can but think in this connection of Yale and Harvard. Is this kind of religion dying out in these universities? Have the officers and students in these seats of learning nothing to learn from the parent universities in the mother land?"

Temperance Progress in Canada is Indicated by the vote recently taken in the Canadian House of Commons, on the proposal to exempt beer, ale, and light wines from the operation of the Scott act. The Senate had already voted for such exemption, and the most powerful pressure was brought to bear on the House of Commons by the united liquor interest of the Dominion, which realized that this was probably their last opportunity to destroy the Scott act. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 86 to 78. This victory was won in face of the fact that there were many members who dodged the vote. At the same time several amendments regulating the sale of liquor by druggists were adopted. These allow sales for medicinal purposes, sales of patent medicines and other preparations containing alcohol, and the sale of as much as eight ounces of liquor at one time by apothecaries in localities under the Scott act. Amendments were adopted requiring physicians and druggists to register all sales, and make annual returns to the Government, and imposing penalties for violation of the conditions granting these privileges.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

How Converts are Made.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Barr, a devoted Christian worker, related the following: "The other day I was visiting at a house not far away, and saw that the woman was troubled about something, and I said, 'I think you are anxious about your soul.' 'Yes,' she responded, 'I am very anxious.' Then I preached Christ to her, and after I had done so, she asked, 'Am I to rest my soul upon that?' After speaking to her a little longer, she sweetly entered into the glorious light and liberty of the children of God. The result was that first her husband and then her brother gave themselves to Christ, and now the outcome of it all is that they are having evangelistic meetings in their house every night, and men and women are being led to the Saviour."

The Power of a Little Word.—The Rev. Mr. Riddell remarked: "I heard some time ago of a man in Dundee who was very much concerned about his soul, and had been struggling hard to get into the true light, but he said he could not see the way; it all seemed so dark to him; he did not understand it. One day, however, he visited his minister, and told him that he had found rest and peace in Jesus. 'In what way?' inquired the minister, much interested. 'By one of the smallest words in the Bible,' was the response, and he quoted the verse, 'Come unto Me all ye that labor, and I will give you rest.' And he said, 'It was not the Come that did it, but the little word "Me"; it made me see myself as a helpless, lost sinner, and Jesus was there lovingly and patiently waiting to receive me.'"

Why the Man Whistled.—Mr. McPhail related the following: "Some time ago I was walking through a graveyard, and noticed a young man going on before me whistling cheerfully. Supposing him to be the gravedigger, I accosted him thus: 'You seem to be very happy.' 'And why should I not be?' was the reply. 'I did not think one of your calling could be very happy,' I said, and then he told me the cause of his enjoyment. He said: 'Two years ago I was walking along a street intoxicated, when two ladies came up to me and asked if I would come into a meeting. I went with them and signed the pledge at their earnest request, and before leaving they knelt down and asked the Lord to keep me. They were surprised but very glad to see me back at the meeting the following morning, when I gave myself to the Lord. I went home and told my wife; she also gave her heart to Jesus, and not only my wife, but my children are converted, and who should be happier than I?'"

A Gambler Struck Blind.—James Newby, the colored missionary, related the following strange incident, of which he professed himself an eyewitness: "At one time gambling was the very passion of my life. I devoted myself entirely to it. Week-day and Sunday, it was all alike to me. On one occasion my companions and I prolonged our play to about 4 A.M. on the Lord's Day. A young man, who had lost heavily, connecting his losses with this fact, suddenly exclaimed: 'Well, if I play any more on a Sunday morning may I be a struck blind!' On the following Saturday evening he was again in his place at the card-table. On this occasion he was the winner. A little before midnight he said, 'This is my last game; I am done playing,' referring to what he had said the week before. We, however, did not wish him to stop playing just then, as he had all our money in his hands, so we coaxed him into commencing again. I think I see him yet, when, after having dealt round the cards, he took out his handkerchief and, wiping his eyes, said, 'What is the matter with me?' Just as he spoke the clock on the mantel-shelf began to chime the hour of twelve. Then suddenly, as the last stroke sounded, throwing up his hands, he exclaimed: 'O God, I am blind!' 'What is the matter with you?' we asked. 'I am blind! I am blind!' he replied. As there could be no doubt but that he was really so, it was suggested that he should be taken home as fast as possible. You may be curious to know what became of him. He continues blind to this day, his eyes being covered with white scales. This judgment from God made no change in him."

A Deadly Poison is at Work in our Midst.—said a clergyman. "A man I knew, connected with my own church, formerly an eager listener to the truths of the Gospel, a communicant, living alone, lately to the surprise and horror of all who knew him, not many days ago, for no apparent cause, committed suicide. The secret was discovered when, after death, in his room was found a pile of C. Bradlaugh's infidel literature, including a whole year's series of an infidel serial, illustrated with coarse and blasphemous caricatures of all that is held holy and sacred by a Christian man, pictures that no man, with any fear of God in his heart, would dare to look upon a second time. This poor man's mind was, without doubt, unhinged by the guilty practice he had indulged—the poison had entered his soul, and, alienated from the fear of God, he had yielded to the promptings of the tempter. In these evil days nothing but the close adherence to the Word of God can keep the unlearned and the unstable from the paths of the Destroyer."

A Good Night's Work.—Professor Lindsay said: "A woman used to come to our meetings who for a long time was in great anxiety about her soul. Her husband laughed at her when she spoke to him of her conscious sin and misery, and told her she was talking only a lot of nonsense. An earnest young minister visited the woman three or four times to try and lead her into the light, and one Sunday he was putting Christ's promises before her, when she suddenly exclaimed, 'Ah, I see it all now! Yes, I see it all now! My salvation is complete!' Her husband was sitting by the fireplace, but was not taking any part in the conversation, and the young minister, turning to him, said: 'I have not spoken to you yet. He listened to all he had to say, but was in no way impressed. The minister went away, promising to call again. On his next visit he found the man also rejoicing in Christ. He said, 'I took Christ five minutes after you went away. I listened to all you had to say both to my wife and to myself, but quite unmoved. When you left I rose and went to the door, and stood looking out into the night, and as I stood the whole light of the Gospel came over me like a flood. I saw myself a helpless sinner, but I also saw the finished work of Christ, and when I turned into the house I was a saved man.'"

Fleeing From the Sound of the Church Bells.—A Scotch minister related that "there was a young man in the county of Perth who was a very hardened sinner. Above all things he hated the sound of church bells, and so great a dislike had he to them that every Sunday morning he rose early and walked far out of town to be away from the sound of them. For five years he continued this practice, until one morning he slept rather later than usual, and he hastened to be out of their hearing; but he was too late—the bells began to ring, calling the worshippers of God together. The sound made him stand still, for he had not heard them for five years. He retraced his footsteps, entered the nearest church, and sat down in a back part of the gallery. While the minister was speaking, a verse entered his mind, 'I will be found of them that sought me not.' As he sat there tears fell on the book before him. He did not know where he had heard the verse, for it was not in the church, and before he left the seat he surrendered himself to the Saviour. So overjoyed was he that he could not go to his work on Monday, and made up his mind to go and tell his sister the glad news. When he entered her house, she exclaimed: 'Oh, George, I know what you are come for: it is to tell me that you have given yourself to Jesus. I have prayed for you for ten years, but yesterday morning I prayed for you as I never prayed before. I cried, 'Oh, Lord, he is now running from the sound of the church bells, but Thou hast said, 'I will be found of them that sought Me not.' Oh, take him back, and arrest him just now.' I knew when that prayer was finished it was heard and answered, and I have been looking for you since then.' Brother and sister now rejoice together, because both are on their way to heaven."

THE MIDNIGHT CRY.

From an Address by Mr. Nathaniel Starkey.

Certainly Coming—The Church Put off her Guard—Two Questions Answered—The Coming Cry—I. As to Time—At Midnight—Before the Millennial Reign—II. As to Manner—Four Stages—III. As to Purpose—To Dethrone the Usurper—To Reign with His Saints.

To those who have an ear to hear and a heart to perceive we propose to offer a few suggestions arising out of the words, "At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him" (Matt. 25:6).

That this same Jesus who was taken up into heaven shall so come in like manner as He was seen to go, is clearly told us in Acts 1:11. That He shall come the second time without sin unto salvation is also clearly set forth in Heb. 9:28. But, that the sinner may go on in sin, and the saint may continue his slumber, the enemy confuses the mind of thinking men by spiritualizing away the meaning of these plain statements of Scripture, and, as a very lullaby, borrows the words of our Lord—"Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no not the angels in heaven." But He also said, "Take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with the cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For

AS A SNARE shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." Now, because a period of a thousand years is marked off as lying between the first resurrection and the final judgment (see Rev. 20), called the Millennium, two questions naturally arise, and they have divided the thought of the best and wisest of Bible students for ages. First, Will the second coming of Christ be visible and personal? Second, Will it be pre- or post-millennial?

To answer the two questions in our present design, in order to which we have chosen the words, "At midnight there was a cry made," which we propose to view in three aspects: First, As to time; Second, As to manner; Third, As to purpose.

I. AS TO TIME.

At midnight the cry is made; and then the coming of the bridegroom will be after midnight and toward morning. Not necessarily a solar night or morning, for when it is night in one part of the earth, it is morning elsewhere. But His coming, who made the sun, shall make the morning, that morning without clouds to all to whom He comes: so then night and morning are here figurative, signifying the end of one age and the dawn of another. By whom, then, is the cry at midnight made? Evidently by some watchers who have kept awake till midnight, some who knew their Lord's will and did it better than even the wise virgins who went forth to meet the bridegroom, and while He tarried they slumbered and slept.

But if the day and hour is not to be known until it comes, it should not be difficult to determine whether its coming is before or after the millennial period. In Matt. 13:41 we read, "The Son of Man shall send forth His angels, and shall gather out of His kingdom all scandals, and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: then shall the righteous shine forth in the kingdom of their Father." From this we learn that His coming is to clear away the tares, the children of the wicked one, to bind the father of lies himself, casting him into the bottomless pit, and setting a seal on him, that he should have no liberty for the thousand years that Christ is to reign on the earth with all His saints. And we further learn from Luke 19:12, etc., where our Lord sets forth Himself as a nobleman going into a far country to receive for Himself (the title-deeds of) a kingdom and to return. And then comes the reckoning with the servants left in charge during His absence. From all this it is evident that the adjudication and appointment of the worthy, as well as the sentence pronounced on the unworthy, must precede and preface the establishment of the millennial reign of blessedness foreshadowed and promised in Romans 8:19 to 23.

II. AS TO MANNER.

Here, for lack of discrimination, many become so confused between one passage of Scripture and another, that the subject is too soon given up by the uninitiated in hopeless despair, failing to see that this Second Coming of our Lord consists of three or four stages: First, Into the air secretly; Second, In the clouds visibly; Third, On the earth standing; Fourth, On the throne of David sitting.

First: Into the air secretly, suddenly, and unseen by the world, seen only by those who are caught up to meet Him there. For we read in Matt. 24:40, etc., "Two shall be in the field, one taken and another left; two grinding at the mill, one taken, the other left;" for as a thief He will come. And where Luke records the same, he adds: "two shall be in one bed; one shall be taken and the other left;" "we shall be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thess. 4:17). There his bride shall continue with him for three and a half, or, it may be, seven years when he shall appear in the second stage.

Second: In the clouds visibly, with power and great glory, as we learn from Daniel first, in chap. 7:9, etc.; also Matt. 24:30, "they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory;" also Rev. 1:7, "Behold He cometh in clouds, and every eye shall see Him, they also which pierced Him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him;" also Rev. 6:16, when "the great, the rich, the mighty, both bondmen and free men say to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb;" also Rev. 19:11, etc., when "He is seen as a King of Kings and Lord of Lords, riding forth to universal conquest, the armies of heaven following Him upon white horses clothed in fine linen, white and clean."

Third: On the earth standing; in that same spiritual body which He took up on the morning of His resurrections, bearing the credentials of the crucified One in His hand and His feet; whereof Zachariah had a glimpse, when he was inspired to say, "Then shall the Lord go forth, and His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives."

THE VERY SPOT

from which He went up shall be the spot to which He will return and on which He will alight.

Fourth: On the throne of his father David sitting, for so has it been foreshown and promised, "He must reign till He hath put all His enemies under His feet;" so declared the angel Gabriel: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end." What then to do? See Rev. 21:3, "He that sat upon the throne said, Behold I make all things new." For then new heavens and a new earth shall reveal a new age wherein righteousness and blessing shall abound, as now unrighteousness and the curse abound.

III. AS TO PURPOSE, and this we have somewhat anticipated, but briefly let us add: To dethrone the usurper, whose words were no vain idle boast, when he showed our Lord all the kingdoms of the world in a moment of time, and said: "All this power will I give thee, and the glory of them, that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will give it." (And there is no other way of accounting for the success of cruel emperors, and the prevalence of false faiths hitherto.) But He comes to overthrow the usurper, and be set as rightful heir on His holy hill of Zion. There, on David's throne, to "reign in Mount Zion before His ancients gloriously," for Enoch must be there, Noah, Daniel, and Job, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and Samuel, David, and Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, who saw Him in vision only, but then must see Him, the Son of Man, the Son of God, the Christ of all the Scriptures, for "to Him all the prophets witness." There to rule all nations with a rod of iron (typical of strength, not oppression), until they become willing to bow to His sceptre of love. There and then to one thousand years, as we read in Rev. 2:26, 27; 3:21; 5:10; and 20:4-6. Israel, the lineal descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, restored to divine favor, shall become the regal nation on earth. Jehovah's bride in Jerusalem restored, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, shall Mount Zion be, as the city of the Great King. Then shall the teeming millions of Asia and Africa, as well as of Europe, America, and the isles afar off, abolish their idols for ever, and like mist before the rising of the sun. Then shall the wolf lie down with the lamb, and the leopard with the kid. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

"Hallelujah! Praise ye the Lord," shall then go up in one joyous anthem, transporting to man and well pleasing to God. This is the good time coming, and no other. The burden of Dumah may well become ours. "He calleth to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night." First the night and then the morning.

A REMARKABLE FAITH-CURE.

AMONG the interesting incidents published in the current number of Triumphs of Faith, by Miss Carrie Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., is the following, which we condense:

NERVOUS PROSTRATION.

The Rev. S. S. Binkley writes from Barnesville, O.: "While pastor of Prospect Street Methodist Episcopal Church, in Cleveland, O., by overtaxing my strength, I was suddenly prostrated in the pulpit, on Sabbath evening, April 16th, 1882. My physician seemed to think that a few months' rest would suffice to restore my former vigor. I therefore resigned my church and arranged to lay aside all care and labor for several months, fully expecting to regain my health in a short time. In this hope I was disappointed; instead of improving I grew worse."

I consulted with nine different physicians, tried various remedies, made change of climate, and did all that I could in the use of means, without any decided relief. For some time it was difficult to determine my disease precisely, but after a year and a half the main trouble seemed to be located in the base of the brain and spine, accompanied with very serious stomach derangement. Sleep gave me temporary relief, and for nearly two years I slept from ten to twelve hours in every twenty-four. By rest and change of climate my general strength was somewhat improved.

"After a rest from pastoral charge for eighteen months, I finally took charge of a small church. I commenced by preaching but once on the Sabbath, expecting to be able to preach twice a day in a few months, but it was soon found that one sermon a week made me much worse. I began to cast about in my mind as to some location for a home at the close of the Conference year in October, expecting to retire from the work of the ministry, feeling wholly unable to discharge any of its duties, and wondering how I could possibly hold on until the year should end.

"A short time before this, the physician who seemed best to understand my case, informed me that no medicine could give me permanent relief, that my case would require extreme care and a long period of time for recovery, and at one time told a friend that he thought my days of preaching were over.

"On the evening of June 16th, 1884, I awoke, after having sought relief to my brain in a sleep of about three hours; I felt worse than I ever had before, and my case seemed perfectly helpless and hopeless, so far as human power was concerned. But instantly I was strangely drawn out in earnest and importunate prayer, not only for relief, but for complete restoration. The Spirit of God seemed to take sudden and complete possession of my whole heart, and the Spirit of prayer and faith that filled me seemed to be God-given. I fell upon my knees and began to pray and renew my consecration to God."

"Previous to this time in all of my praying and efforts at believing for healing, I wanted to experience some sensible touch of God's power in my body that would wholly remove disease and impart vigor and strength to my system. I felt that with such an experience, I could gladly proclaim the healing power of God for His own glory, but without this sensible change I had felt unwilling to go forth in the strength of faith only."

"But, now, while upon my knees, I promised God that I would act out my faith, that I would give up the use of human means, would not look at symptoms (either favorable or unfavorable), but would trust in Christ and His promise alone for healing. No sudden or sensible change took place in my body, save that I felt some new physical vigor and experienced the strongest Divine assurance of entire healing."

"My first test was in regard to eating; for several years it was necessary that I should use the greatest care in my diet, and with all the precaution and self-denial I had practised, my stomach caused me great suffering, and this increased my brain trouble."

"After rising from my knees, I went to the tea-table and ate thankfully what was set before me. From that time I did the same, using only the care that a person of sound health ought to use—eating many things that I had not dared to eat for several years. For many months my digestion was so perfect that I scarcely felt that I had a stomach. For this wonderful change I praised God almost constantly, and the reality of it has been confirmed by nearly a year of experience. Upon this point I have had some tests of my faith, but have always had final victory. I felt new vigor and strength in my brain but the immediate change in that particular was not so apparent. The next Sabbath, however, I preached with but little of the excitement that had previously attended mental effort. On the second Sabbath the improvement was still more marked, and in a few weeks I was able to preach twice on Sabbath and to perform an increased amount of pastoral work."

"Thus, in the strength of God, in answer to repeated applications at the throne of grace, I was enabled to complete the year's work, and in October, at the session of Conference, was appointed to my present charge, having a membership in the beginning of the year of more than four hundred. In the strength of God, I have labored six months, passing through a series of revival services, lasting nearly three months, and, with God's blessing, I am better than when I commenced. The work requires me to attend six services regularly every week, besides doing a large amount of pastoral work in a membership of nearly seven hundred."

"It often becomes necessary for me to go to the Great Physician for a renewal of strength, pleading the atonement of Christ and the promises and covenant of God. But this experience has taught me the lesson of "walking by faith," leaning upon the arm of the Omnipotent, covenant-keeping, God, who never fails me."

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Effort on the Part of the New York banks to assist the Government was made last week. This action is significant as a reversal of the usual relations. As a rule heretofore in emergencies, it has been the Government that has come to the assistance of the banks. But just now the Government is in a difficulty, and the banks, from motives of gratitude or interest, are endeavoring to extricate it from an impending crisis. For some time past the stock of gold at the command of the Treasury has been dwindling. It has been compelled to pay out twenty-four million dollars a year in gold for the purchase of silver to make silver dollars, and as it is bound to accept silver on deposit from citizens, the time is necessarily approaching when it will have to pay the interest on the public debt in silver. In order to avoid that step, which would cause serious financial disturbance, the banks have offered to supply the Government with twenty millions or more in gold to carry on until Congress meets in December, when an effort will be made to relieve the Government from the necessity to continue coining the silver dollar. The aid cannot legally be rendered directly, but some means will doubtless be found for doing it indirectly.

Another Stage of the Miserable "Dolphin" business was reached last week. The ship, it would appear, is not to be added to the curious collection of vessels called "the American Navy." Mr. Whitney having informed the Attorney-General that the Dolphin is defective in speed and strength, requested to be informed whether the Government was bound to accept the ship. Mr. Garland's formal opinion was published last week. It was to the effect that the Secretary of the Navy could not legally take the vessel. The Act of Congress under which the ship was built called for a despatch boat having a sea speed of fifteen knots. It was not so specified in the contract, but the contractor is supposed by law to be aware of the character of the act under which his contract is awarded. The stipulation as to strength is less definite, but as the contract called for a vessel strong enough for a specified purpose, and Mr. Whitney affirms that the Dolphin is not strong enough for that purpose, the Attorney-General holds that in that matter also the contractor has failed to fulfil his contract. Besides those two grounds for rejecting the ship Mr. Garland says the contract does not bind the Government because it "contained a clause intended to relieve the contractor of responsibility for the power of the engines, and, as a necessary consequence, for the speed of the ship." This clause, Mr. Garland believes, vitiates the entire contract, because it was inserted contrary to the act. And finally, that Mr. Roach, having received a large portion of the purchase-money of the Dolphin, may be forced to refund it. On Saturday last Mr. Roach made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. It is believed that he is perfectly solvent, but found the step necessary in view of possible litigation and the probability of trouble respecting contracts he holds with the Government for three other ships. As those contracts are like that of the Dolphin, they, too, may prove invalid. The aggregate amount of the four contracts is $2,440,000.

The Long Projected Niagara Park is Now an established fact. On Wednesday, July 15th, Governor Hill, of New York, formally took possession, on behalf of the State, of the reservation. For a long time the neighborhood of the falls has been disfigured by private speculators, and a system of extortion extremely onerous has been practised on visitors. In 1879, however, a commission was appointed under an Act of the New York Legislature to purchase the land abutting on the falls for the State. After vexatious delays the business was carried through, and last year the Legislature voted a million and a half of dollars to complete the purchase. On Wednesday the park was thrown open free of charge, and the Governor, with a distinguished party, inaugurated the new public property with appropriate ceremonies. Several prominent Canadians crossed the border to join in the festivities, and it was predicted that in a short time a similar ceremony would take place in the Dominion, when the Canadian Government would set free its side of the cataract.

A Desperate Fight between the Police and the strikers at Cleveland, Ohio, took place on July 15th. On the previous day symptoms of uneasiness among the men on strike were observed. The attempt of the rolling mill company to start up the plate and wire mills was the cause of the dissatisfaction. A meeting of strikers was held, at which Garsuch, the Socialist, made a speech, calling upon the men to advance to the mills in a body and break through the inclosures and drag the men from their work. He said they should not remain cowards, but fight, and if the police or any other body of men stood in their way to sweep them from their path. Soon nearly a thousand men, followed by their wives, were on their way to the mills. They were met at the gates by a body of police numbering seventy-five. There was a parley, and all might have ended peaceably, but some boys commenced throwing stones, and then the police charged the crowd. No shots were fired, but the clubs of the police did fearful execution. The women continued in the crowd, encouraging the men and carrying off the injured. In the end the rioters were driven off, leaving six of their number seriously wounded on the field. Two policemen were fatally injured.

A Revival of the Anglo-Russian War Rumors was the burden of the cable last week. The point in dispute is the celebrated Zulufkar Pass, which is the key of Afghanistan on the north. Its importance is realized by all parties, and the English diplomatists labored hard to secure it for Afghanistan. It was supposed they had been successful. The English correspondent of the New York Times says that Mr. Gladstone actually relinquished Pendjeh on the explicit understanding that Russia would not demand the pass, and was generally blamed at home and abroad for giving too much for too little. However, that was the price of peace, and he paid it. He paid it freely and fully. There was no talk of qualifying the cession or curtailing its proportions; everything conceivably belonging to Pendjeh went to Russia. When it became the turn of Russia to fulfil her part of the bargain, her payment was delayed beyond reason on one pretext or another, till the English contracting party was suddenly put out of power. The very next morning the Russian regiments started from the Caucasus for Merv, and Russian agents began talking to the effect that Lords Salisbury and Churchill must apologize for their past words before negotiations could be resumed. This was kept up till rumor filtered westward that the Russians were massing heavy forces near Zulufkar, and that the whole Asiatic military machine was in a state of activity. Then Russia announced that England was strangely mistaken about the Zulufkar agreement. Russia never dreamed of conceding the pass; she might consent to let the Afghans occupy the valley east of the pass if the proper inducements were offered, but Russia positively must hold the pass commanding the valley as a guarantee against an Afghan invasion. To give point to this declaration troops are ready to occupy the pass, if, indeed, they have not already done so.

The Revelations of Disgrusting Vice in London are being investigated by a committee composed of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, Cardinal Manning, the Lord Mayor of London, and Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P. Reporters of the Pall Mall Gazette, the journal which made the revelations, have appeared before the committee and have been examined under oath. They detailed their experiences, and the committee, being pledged to secrecy, disclosed the names of the aristocratic debauchees who are preying on English society. One reporter hearing a doubt expressed about the existence of a firm composed of two women, who were alleged to be engaged in supplying victims to the wealthy villains implicated, sent a telegram to the firm, and before the committee had concluded its sitting produced ocular demonstration that the firm was still actively engaged in the loathsome business. The indignation in London and, still more, in country towns increases, and it is hoped that, public opinion being aroused, stringent measures will be adopted to stop the traffic, even if it is impossible to punish past offences.

The Ravages of Cholera in Spain Continue without abatement. The total of deaths in Spain to the close of last week from cholera was over 18,000, and the pest is spreading daily into new Provinces. The European correspondent of the New York Times says that officials are suppressing the news right and left, and the reports of the mortality are far below the truth. Reports from Madrid say that there were 1329 new cases of cholera and 624 deaths from the disease reported on Friday in Spain. In Madrid 9 new cases of cholera and 4 deaths were reported; in the adjacent villages, 9 new cases and 5 deaths; in Aranjuez, no new cases, but 5 deaths; in the city of Murcia, 10 new cases and 4 deaths.

A Bank Failure in Ireland Announced last week is likely to cause much distress in that country. The Munster Bank, having its head office in Cork and having twenty-nine branches in other cities, suspended on July 14th. The collapse appears to have been caused by the methods with which we on this side are unhappily familiar. The directors have been making unauthorized loans on insufficient security to their friends. The effect of the suspension will be most severely felt in the southern provinces, where the farmers who cannot realize their harvest have to repay advances made by the bank. Many failures are expected in Cork, where a large business is done with merchants and traders. Then there is a large body of shareholders among the middle classes who will be ruined. The late President of the bank, Mr. William Shaw, M.P., Mr. Parnell's colleague, owes the bank $700,000, nearly half of which is unsecured.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers in the south with the CHRISTIAN HERALD were received last week to the amount of $11. They were: from Lafayette, R. I., $4; A Friend in California, $5; from Denbig, Ont., Canada, $2. We are continually receiving gratifying assurances from the South of the good resulting from this gratis supply. Many ministers are wholly without religious literature, and are very grateful for the benefit they derive from the suggestive sermons published in this journal.

The Death of Dr. S. Irenæus Prime on Saturday last will cause sincere regret throughout the country. He was stricken with paralysis on Sunday, July 12th, while staying at Manchester, Vt., and never afterward fully regained consciousness, though he lingered through the week, and, it is thought, recognized his wife and brother, who were summoned to his bedside. Dr. Prime was in his seventy-third year and was fifty-two years in the ministry. Probably he was with a few exceptions the best known Presbyterian clergyman in this country, and his genial manner and sound sense made for him friends wherever he went. But it was as an editor that Dr. Prime was most widely known. For nearly forty-five years he was the chief writer on the paper was its attractive feature. Besides his editorial work, he was the author of about forty volumes. Of these the one which attained the widest circulation was "The Power of Prayer," which was published in 1858, translated into several languages, and reprinted in Europe, Asia, and Africa. Of this work more than 175,000 copies are said to have been sold. Dr. Prime also wrote a great number of tracts.

General Grant's Pathetic Acknowledgment of Christian interest in him was recorded last week. A Roman Catholic priest said to him: "We are all praying for you." The General took his pad and wrote: "Yes, I know and I feel very grateful to the Christian people of the land for their prayers in my behalf. There is no sect or religion, as shown in the Old or the New Testament, to which this does not apply. Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, and all the good people of the nation, of all politics as well as religions, and all nationalities, seem to have united in wishing or praying for my improvement. I am a great sufferer all the time, but the facts I have related are compensation for much of it. All that I can do is to pray that the prayers of all those good people may be answered so far as to have us all meet in another and better world."

A Serious Riot Occurred in Ireland on Sunday, July 12th. The citizens of Waterford were according to their habit, celebrating the anniversary of the battle of the Boyne, and there was consequently a large increase in the usual Sunday number of drunken men on the streets. Among them were many of the soldiers belonging to the Welsh regiment doing garrison duty there. A number of citizens got into a row with the soldiers, during which the latter bayoneted to death a man named Peter Grant. During the hottest part of the conflict a soldier attacked Grant, and plunged a bayonet straight through his heart. Grant fell dead on the spot. This tragedy infuriated the people, and they fell with such ferocity upon the troops that the latter retreated in full flight into the barracks. The barracks buildings were besieged all night by the citizens, who, although they were unable to break in, smashed every window in the building. The excitement in the city lasted all night, and every soldier met in the streets was attacked.

The Decision of a Lawyer in California may be commended to the notice of some successful lawyers in other States, which would be happier, better and more prosperous, if the said lawyers had less success. The California lawyer announces that he will not hereafter defend any of the criminal class, and says, "I prefer to aid in sending that class to State Prison, where they more properly belong, rather than keeping them free to prey upon the community, as I have heretofore done to my sorrow."

Residents Who Are Not Citizens Are Causing some trouble to the enumerators in Dakota. It is stated that in a large number of towns the population is placed at a figure far below the actual number. The discrepancy is caused by a great many people refusing to be enrolled as citizens of the towns because they hold claims in the country, often in other counties, and in proving up these it is necessary to establish a legal residence on them. In many cases they have lived in the towns for years, own the houses they live in, are engaged in business, belong to churches, and look and act like residents. But they are afraid that if their names appeared as citizens their title to the land they claim in the country would be invalidated, as that has been granted to them on condition of their residing on their claims. It is possible in the existing uncertainty as to what constitutes legal residence to evade the law by spending a few hours at long intervals on the land. There is reason to fear that many people are acting in the same way about their spiritual interests. They look and act like worldlings, doing business on worldly principles, and seeking their amusements where worldlings do, appearing in their Christian character occasionally on Sundays and times of revival. It is difficult to class them now, but an end will come to all that. Men cannot now, any more than in past times, serve God and mammon (Matt. 6:24).

A Novel Experiment in Photography is Described by the Boston Post. It was an attempt to obtain the portrait of the typical girl of culture. Eleven young ladies forming the senior class in physics at Smith's College were to be consecutively photographed on the same plate. The camera was arranged and the eleven sitters quickly took their places before it, each one only occupying a second or two. The sitters posed that their eyes exactly corresponded with two points marked on the camera, so that each face occupied precisely the same position on the negative. The girl with the most regular features was taken first, and in the end there was developed a photograph, showing the features common to all the sitters, but exactly resembling none of them. The portrait of the mystical lady so obtained is more beautiful than any of the young ladies individually. With high brow, softened by fluffy waves of hair, deep-eyed, with refined features and earnest expression, she is a young woman of dignity and sweetness. The lines of her countenance are noble, and her head is evenly developed. The senior class at Smith's College has named its new sister "Miss Senior P. Smith," the P indicating physics, and will place her photograph in their album among the class photographs of bright and beautiful graduates. The experiment is curious and the result suggestive. Pictures of the character of individual Christians would all show defects, but if a picture could be taken collectively showing only the features common to all, it would be surpassingly beautiful, because the only features common to all are the features of Christ. So the Church, the bride of Christ, will be presented perfect and spotless (1 John 3:2).

A Night in a Cave Infested with Rattlesnakes was spent two weeks ago by a party of Northerners, who were prospecting in Alabama. The party, who arrived at Chulahee, Ala., on July 10th, gave a vivid account of their night of terror. They were looking for minerals near the head of a small ravine, about one mile from the Talapoosa River, when they noticed an opening into a cave, which they entered one by one, the entrance being too small to admit two persons. They found the cave about four hundred feet in length, varying in width from ten to sixty feet, with an average height of fifteen feet, and dimly lighted throughout by small fissures in the rocks, extending from the roof to the ground above. When the explorers were about to leave the cave they were terrified at finding the exit blocked by a writhing mass of big rattlesnakes. The noise made by the party had doubtless roused the snakes from their hiding-places among the rocks, and they had gathered in large numbers near the entrance. Deeming discretion the better part of valor, the party retreated to that part of the cave most remote from the entrance to wait for the snakes to return to their hiding-places. They were compelled to remain in the cave from four o'clock in the afternoon until morning. They were in terror all night, not knowing in the darkness when a snake might glide among them. Daylight came at last, to the great relief of the entire party. Going forward to the entrance of the cave they found that the snakes, with the exception of one or two, had gone back to their hiding-places. Those that remained were quickly dispatched with stones, and the explorers made their exit from the cave in safety. If during the hours of darkness and danger light and safety had been offered to that party they would have eagerly accepted the offer. That is precisely the offer made by Christ to every human being in this dark and perilous world (John 1:9; Luke 10:19, 20).

A Poisoned Man's Race for Life Was Witnessed in Helena, Ark., recently. The Globe-Democrat says that "Mr. F. L. Dover, a farmer residing three miles from Helena, took a dose of morphine, thinking at the time that it was quinine. He did not discover his mistake until the deadly drug began to be absorbed into his system, and his horror was increased when he realized that he would have to ride three miles on a slow mule before medical assistance could be received. It was only a few moments after the discovery had been made that he was on his mule and madly riding toward town, and every minute the terrible drug throwing its meshes around him and numbing his senses. He managed to get to a store kept by a friend, and informed him of his condition. Medical aid was immediately summoned, and the most effective antidote known to the profession was applied. After hovering between life and death for some hours, the poison was overcome, and the farmer recovered. Had he remained at home until a doctor could have been brought to him, he must have died." If sinners only realized their danger as this farmer did, they would neglect everything else to seek the Great Physician without delay (Jer. 51:6).

An Irish Immigrant Girl Piteously Explained to the Superintendent at Castle Garden, New York, on July 17th, her reasons for wishing to return home. The thermometer was registering ninety-nine in the shade, and the streets of the city were giving out the sickening combination of odors for which they are noted, when a blooming girl of nineteen made her way through the crowd of sweltering human beings to the official at the Battery, and laying down a ten-dollar bill, begged him to send her back to Cork. "Can't you get along here?" asked Mr. Jackson. "Yes, sir, I can; but the weather is so hot, and you have no green fields, and I cannot live here." Mr. Jackson added $5 to the girl's $10, and purchased a ticket for her on the City of Chester. As she had no money she was allowed to sleep that night in the hospital. In the night the watchman was startled at hearing a woman's shriek. He awoke Dr. Schultz, who, going to the little ward in which the immigrant girl had been placed, found that she had become a raving maniac. It took the united efforts of three men to force her into the padded cell. One of the register clerks, who is a surgeon, asked permission to visit her the next morning in the cell. He was warned not to, but insisted. He found her tied down in her cot. He led her to speak of green fields and flowers, and then sang some Irish melodies. The girl wept and became quiet, and finally fell asleep. It is thought she will completely recover, and she will then be sent to Ireland. How many suffering Christians weary of the heat and burden of life have so been calmed and soothed by some sympathizing fellow Christian, who talked to them of the happiness of their Father's house, and sang some of the songs of Zion (Rev. 7:14-17).

BEFORE SERMON, AT SERMON, AND AFTER SERMON.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls." But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves."—JAMES 1: 21, 22.

During a Sermon—Receiving—In Meekness—The Grafting Process—III. After Sermon—Positive and Negative Duties—A Scotchman's Answer.

BRETHREN, it is a good thing to be under the sound of the Word of God. Even if the very lowest motive should induce persons to come to hear the Gospel, it is nevertheless a good thing that they should come. We have heard of some who have even come to steal, and yet the Word of God has stolen into their hearts. Master Hugh Latimer, in his quaint manner, when exhorting people to go to church, tells of a woman who could not sleep for many nights, notwithstanding that drugs had been given to her; but she said that if they would take her to her parish church she could sleep there, for she had often enjoyed a quiet and he goes the length of saying that if people even come to the sermon to sleep, it is better than not to come at all; for, he adds, in his fine old Saxon, "they may be caught napping." It is even so. A sick man doeth well to live where there are physicians, for one day he may be healed. If men are in the heat of a battle, they may be wounded; if they come where Gospel arrows are shot they may fall under them. Plants that grow in the open are likely to be watered when the shower falls. We dare not say to any man who wills to enter the house of prayer, "Thou must not come, because thy motive is gross and low." Nay, thou art welcome, anyhow. Who knoweth but that, being in the way, God may meet with thee. Being where His truth is preached, thou mayest hear it; and "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God."

Yet it will strike you at once that though it be well to come to the hearing of the Word in any case, yet it is better to come in a better way. We should endeavor to gather the most we can from the means of grace, and not pluck at them at random.

This morning, I shall handle my text with the earnest design of teaching you how to hear. Oh, that the Spirit of God may graciously help me! First, let us note what to do before sermon: "Lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness." Secondly, let us learn how to behave during sermon: "Receive with meekness the engrafted Word, which is able to save your souls." And thirdly, here is the instruction for after sermon: "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves."

I. Let us consider the fit and proper preparation for listening to the Gospel, or what is to be done

BEFORE HEARING.

It will strike every man who thinks about it, that there should be some preparation of the heart in coming to the worship of God, and to the hearing of the Gospel. Consider who He is in whose name we gather, and surely we cannot rush together without thought. Consider whom we profess to worship, and we shall not hurry into His presence as men run to a fire. Brethren, when I think of our engagements throughout the week, who of us can feel fit to come into the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High? I mean not into these tabernacles made with hands, but into the inner spiritual temple of communion with God. How shall we come unto God until we are washed? After travelling so niry a road as that which runs through this foul world, can we come unto God without shaking the dust from off our feet? Can we be busy with earthly cares all the six days of the week and be ready for the holy Sabbath without a thought? I trow not.

There is a common consent among mankind that there should be some preparedness for worship. I see the visible signs of it here to-day. Before the Sabbath dawned you began to prepare clean linen and brighter garments than those of common days. I fear me this change of clothing full often degenerates into a wish to appear well before your fellow-men, but the underlying meaning should be this: "I am going up this day to the worship of my God. I will not go, therefore, either in uncleanness of body or of apparel, but will put on that I may show respect to my God and to the assemblies of His house." My counsel to you is, cleanse your hearts rather than your garments. Go before God in newness of spirit rather than in newness of clothing. If of old the prophet said, "Render your heart, and not your garments," so may I say to-day, Put on the garments of righteousness and holiness by the grace of Christ Jesus our Lord, far rather than external garments, which do but adorn the flesh. Yet, I say, even in that change of raiment there is an admission that there should be preparatory to worship God.

In making this preparation our text tells us that there are some THINGS TO BE LAID ASIDE.

What saith it? "Wherefore lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness." Some things must be removed ere the Word of God can be received. And what are these things? The text mentions all filthiness. Filth, you know, is a *debas*ing thing, meet only for beggars and thieves; and such is sin. Filth is offensive to all cleanly persons. However poor a man is, he might be clean; and when he is not, he becomes a common nuisance to those who speak with him, or sit near him. If bodily filthiness is horrible to us, what must the filthiness of sin be to the pure and holy God! I cannot attempt to express the abomination of sin to God. He hates it with all His soul. If we are to be acceptable before God, there must be no keeping up of favorite sins, no sparing of darling lusts, no providing for secret iniquities; our service will be filthiness before God if our hearts go after our sins.

Moreover, sin is not only offensive, but it is dangerous. We have learned at last, I hope, though some are still ignorant of the fact, that filthiness means disease. Men begin to see that unless we are clean we cannot be healthy. He who harbors filth is making a hot-bed for the germs of disease, and thus he is the enemy of his family, and of his neighborhood. The filthy man is a public poisoner, a suicide, and a murderer. Sin is the greatest conceivable danger to a man's own soul; it makes a man to be dead while he lives, yea, corrupt before he is dead. Will you bring your infectious diseases into His temple? They must be laid apart. Oh, for grace to do this!

There are three sins at least that are intended here, and one is covetousness. Hence, the desire of unholy gain is called filthy lucre, because it leads men to do dirty deeds which else they would not think of. Now when a man's heart is full of filth, when the desire to get gain, and to get it anyhow, is strong on a man, he is in a very unfit condition to profit by hearing the Gospel. You cannot get the Gospel into him; fastens the door. He is somewhat in the condition of the sea captain I have heard of who went out after whales, and when he landed and heard the Gospel preached, he said to the man of God, "Sir, it was of no use your preaching to me, for all the while I was thinking about where I should find a whale. There is no room for anything else in my mind but whales. I must have whales, and for the time I can think of nothing else but whales." So it must be with the man who is hot for gain: his farm and his merchandise are in his heart crowding out everything else. He who has a stall in Vanity Fair is in an unfit state to buy the truth, since his merchandise is vanity.

A GOLDEN BOLT

Then, with peculiar correctness, lustfulness may be spoken of as filthiness. I need not enlarge. Doth not Nature itself teach us that the indulgence of our animal passions, whatever form that indulgence may take, whether of drunkenness or lewdness, is a condition that unfits man for the reception of the pure Word of God?

But in the connection of my text the filthiness meant is especially anger. Read it, and you will see. "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God; wherefore lay apart all filthiness." Some persons when they are angry will say things that never ought to be repeated, or even said for the first time. It was so no doubt in James's day even more than in our own; then, angry men let fly horrible epithets and abominable insinuations which were indeed a superfluity of naughtiness. Now, the child of God is to subdue his anger, wrath, and malice. How can you accept the Word of peace while you are at enmity with your brother? God help us, then, to lay apart all filthiness, and especially all enmity.

But it is added, "and superfluity of naughtiness." What does that mean? Any kind of naughtiness in a child of God is superfluous; iniquity ought not to be within him. "Superfluity of naughtiness," or the outpouring of evil, is unnecessary; it is an excrescence upon a child of God. The phrase here used differs not in meaning from the first epithet of the text; it gives another view of the same thing. You have seen a rose-tree which, perhaps, was bearing very few roses, and you half-half-wondered why. It was a good rose, and planted in good soil, but its flowers were scanty. You looked around it, and by-and-by you perceived that suckers were growing up from its root. Now, these suckers come from the old, original brier, on which the rose had been grafted, and this rose had a superfluity of strength which it used in these suckers. These took away from the rose the life which it required, so that it could not produce the full amount of flowers which you expected from it. These superfluities of naughtiness that were coming up here and there were to the injury of the tree. Children of God, you cannot serve the Lord if you are giving your strength to any form of wrong; your naughtinesses are springing from the brier stock of your old nature, and the best thing to do is to cut off those suckers and stop them as much as possible, so that all the strength may return into the rose, and the lovely flowers of grace may abound. This is what is to be put away.

The garments spotted with the flesh and infected with disease are to be taken off and laid apart. We are to wear them no more, if we desire to profit by the Word which we hear. We are not to lay up these to put them on again, but lay them apart among the offal of Tophet's fire, with the strong desire never to touch them again. To the fires we condemn these filthy things. Why is this? Why is a man as he comes to hear the Gospel to see to this? I take it because all these evil things preoccupy the mind. Whether it be covetousness, or lewdness, or anger, in addition to the pollution which these bring, they also possess the thoughts, so that they are not likely to be blessed while hearing the Word. These are the rocks which prevent the seed from entering the mind, these the birds which devour that which is sown, these the weeds which choke the upspringing shoots. Wherefore lay these aside.

Moreover, sin prejudices against the Gospel. A man says, "I do not enjoy the sermon." How can you? What have you been enjoying during the week? What flavor did last night leave in your mouth? "I cannot bear that man," says one; and if you could, it would be an evidence that the man was not faithful. Can Ahab love Elijah? I remember seeing one get up and go out in hot indignation at what I had said, which happened to come personally home to him, though the man was a stranger to me. What I had said was the pure truth of God, and I could not be sorry that an ill-living man was indignant at it, since this was the only homage that such as he could pay to purity. Had he but known it, there was therein a manifestation to himself of what his nature was, and in what condition he was. If you are to hear God's Word with pleasure and profit to yourselves, you must "lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness;" for these things will prejudice you against the Word of God, and render you incapable of that lively appreciation of it which is so needful to profiting thereby.

II. Secondly, I will talk a little about

DURING HEARING.

How shall we act while listening to the Word? "Receive with meekness the engrafted Word, which is able to save your souls." The first thing, then, is receive. That word "receive" is a very instructive Gospel word; it is the door through which God's grace enters to us. We are not saved by working, but by receiving; not by what we give to God, but by what God gives to us, and we receive from Him. In the hearing of the Word there should be a receiving of it, not into the ear only, but into the understanding, into the heart, into the conscience, together with a laying-up of this good treasure in the memory and the affections.

Then, it is added, "receive with meekness." Many do not perceive the Gospel because they are not of a meek and teachable spirit; they come up to God's house, but the only seat they will occupy therein is the judgment-seat. One would imagine them to be the god of God by their bold talk. Judge not the Word of God, I charge you. Ye may judge me as you like; small matter shall that be to me; for we are not anxious as to men's judgment, but our judgment is with the living God. If the preacher truly declares the Word of God, woe unto the man who sits in judgment upon it; this same Word shall judge him at the last great day. Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven.

THE GRAFTING PROCESS.

What is this which is to be received? "Receive with meekness the engrafted Word." We are not bidden to receive with meekness men's words, for they are many, and there is little in them; but receive with meekness God's Word, for it is one, and there is power in each word which proceedeth out of His mouth. It is called "the engrafted Word." The Revised Version has "the implanted Word," which is, perhaps, more literal than the Authorized translation; and gives another idea, and yet conveys a like sense. I will keep to our old and well-beloved version, and read it "engrafted Word." Engrafting implies that the heart is wounded and opened, and then the living Word is laid in and received with meekness into the bleeding, wounded soul of the man. There is the gash, and there is the space opened thereby. Here comes the graft; the gardener must establish a union between the tree and the graft. This new life, this new branch, is inserted into the old stem, and they are to be livingly joined together. This new cutting grows into the old, and it begins to suck up the life of the old, and change it so that it makes new fruit. That bough, though it be in the grafted tree, is altogether of another sort. Now we want the Word of God to be brought to us after a similar fashion; our heart must be cut and opened, and then the Word must be laid into the gash till the two adhere, and the heart begins to hold to the Word, to believe in it, to hope in it, to love it, to grow to it, to grow into it, and to bear fruit accordingly. Is not that a wonderful thought? The daily incarnation of Christ in the believer, or, in other words, the new eternal life, living in us, and producing fruit after its own kind, while we live in it, and the fruit is our own. Christ is come in all the newness of His life, and is living in me. Oh, blessed grafting! "Receive with meekness the engrafted Word." This is how to behave at sermon. Oh, what need have we of the Holy Ghost to help us to hear the truth as well as to prepare us before we hear it!

III. Lastly, and very briefly, let us think of

AFTER SERMON.

"Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves." First, the command is positive—"Be ye doers of the Word." Oh, dear sirs, I come to this pulpit oftentimes and speak with you, but as I come hither my heart is more and more burdened with this desire; that mine may not be an unprofitable ministry unto you. I shall be useless to you unless you are doers of the Word as well as hearers. The world is always looking to the Church, not so much to hear her teachings as to see her doings. Few ask, "What is the doctrine taught at such a meeting-house?" The ungodly world cries, "Both the doctrine. What good is done there?" If the people who attend there are mean, false, hypocritical, the world condemns the tree which yields such fruit. The bulk of men do not read the Bible, but they read you; and if they do not come to hear the minister preach the Gospel, yet they say, "These people who hear Him are no better than other people, and why should we trouble to go and listen to him?" The minister gets the blame which should rightly belong to those who are hearers but not doers of the Word. Oh, may the Eternal Spirit work in us all to will and to do of his own good pleasure! There is nothing done by these Sundays, there is nothing done by these pulpits, there is nothing done by these pews, there is nothing done by these vast gatherings, unless our hearers are doers of the Word.

THE DEVIL'S BELL.

Observe that the command is put negatively; the text says, "not hearers only." Those who are hearers only are wasters of the Word. What poor creatures hearers are, for they have long ears and no hands! Ye have heard of him who one day was discoursing eloquently of philosophy to a crowd, who greatly applauded him. He thought he had made many disciples, but suddenly the market-bell rang, and not a single person remained. Gain was to be made, and in their opinion no philosophy could be compared to personal profit. They were hearers till the market-bell rang, and then, as they had been hearers only, they quitted the hearing also. I fear it is so with our preachings; if the devil rings the bell for sin, for pleasure, for worldly amusement, or evil gain, our admirers quit us right speedily. The voice of the world drowns the voice of the Word. Those who are only hearers, are hearers but for a time. Some of those now before me are hearers only. We cannot mark your houses by putting a cross upon your doors, and writing thereon, "Lord, have mercy upon us;" but if I did so, London would seem to be smitten with the plague. Oh that you would cease from this mocking of God.

SELF-DECEIT.

The text closes with this solemn word: "deceiving your own selves." Whereupon, says Bishop Brownrig, "To deceive is bad, to deceive yourselves is worse, to deceive yourselves about your souls is worst of all." Alas! there are many in that sad condition. Hundreds believe that because their minister is unquestionably sound in the faith, therefore they are sound also. As they have the good sense to hear him, surely they are first-rate people, and the Lord will overlook their faults. Oh, sirs, be not such fools! Do not deceive yourselves in that way, for there is no truth in this comforting conclusion. The better that which you hear, the more guilty are you if you do not practise it; and the plainer and more straight the Gospel which is taught you, the more inexcusable are you if you do not receive it. God grant to each one of us that when we go home we may attend to the doing of the sermon. You know the old story;

I am half-ashamed to repeat it again, but it is so pat to the point. When Donald came out of kirk sooner than usual, Sandy said to him, "What, Donald, is the sermon all done?" "No," said Donald, "it is all said, but it is not begun to be done yet." Let my sermon be done in your chambers by prayer, and in your lives by holiness. Let it be done all through the week by our each one seeking to put away all filthiness. Let us cling to the holy Christ, desiring to live His life, and breathe His spirit. God grant it may be so with you all, for Jesus Christ's sake.

NEW BOOKS.

MISS CLEVELAND'S ESSAYS.

published under the title, George Eliot's Poetry and other studies, have taken captive the public on both sides the Atlantic. We understand that five editions have been sold in America, though only a few days have elapsed since publication, and in one day the English edition was exhausted, and another large issue was sold before it was printed. In part, doubtless, this large demand was due to the fact that the author is the mistress of the White House. Exalted personages who enter the world of letters have an advantage over authors less distinguished. Even the "Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands," by Queen Victoria, had, at first, a very large sale, though it was trivial to the verge of silliness with its details about John Brown's legs, and whiskey-drinking at Highland cottage parties. The book is now almost forgotten, but we believe that Miss Cleveland's book will live by its intrinsic excellence. It is a singular contrast to the Queen's book, as Americans will notice with gratification. It seems that Miss Cleveland's publishers have supplied her royal rival in literature with a copy of her essays, sumptuously bound. That was a very proper act of courtesy, and no doubt the Queen will enjoy the book, if some intelligent person is at hand to explain it to her.

The book contains nine essays: George Eliot's Poetry; Reciprocity; Altruistic Faith; History; Old Rome and New France; Charlemagne; The Monastery; Chivalry; Joan of Arc. They display not only a very wide acquaintance with a field of literature which ladies seldom explore, but much original thought. The literary style is Emersonian; clear-cut gems of thought glisten on every page, set in that terse epigrammatic style of which Emerson was a master. Yet there is a grace and refinement of composition peculiarly feminine in all the sentences, and a musical rhythm which makes the reading of it a pleasure, akin to that which we feel in listening to solemn music. The following extracts from its pages will give our readers a better idea of the character of the book than the most lengthened description:

"Reciprocity, constant and equal, among all His creatures, is the plan of the only Maker of plans whose plans never fail in the least jot or tittle. He has reserved to Himself the power to give without receiving. Everywhere, even among rudest nations, has this principle of reciprocity between man and man been recognized, and ideals of governments have been erected on it."

"Whether men admit it or not, faith in ourselves and faith in our brother's and sister's humanity follow from our faith in God, and if that faith be allowed its full growth, will each win its rightful rank. But because our faith in God is so rarely allowed its full growth, these other faiths—faith in ourselves, and faith in each other—do not come into full view and win due recognition."

"I venture to say that if the author of that remarkable book, 'Is Life Worth Living?' had occupied himself in making life worth living to one or more of his fellowmen, not in the general way of well-wishing and money-giving, but in the particular way of discovery to some hopeless man, the special aptitude in him, the painstaking way of recognizing as good for something, and good for something in particular, some individual or individuals who felt themselves good for nothing—I venture to say, that, if he had so occupied himself—so attitudinized his mind—he would have found no time for the pessimistic studies and analyses with which he treats the momentous question."

"We shall find life so worthless that we would not care for its continuance unless we have made, are making, or shall make somebody else's life worth living, which other life, except for us, had not been in the end so worth while."

GOD IN HISTORY.

"Let a man believe in God, and he will find Him in history. I do not say he will find Calvinism there, as did Edwards, or any other ism. That he must first import into it before he can export it from it. To the agnostic, doubtless, history is but one long Walpurgis night of the past, from beginning to end; he sees but a witch-dance round a caldron from which no constant form emerges, but ever and anon, within its boil and bubble, arises to evanescent view a momentary seeming which he christens destiny, or chance, or the unknowable. But let the believer in God the Father gaze herein, and he will see, as in the laboratory of some chemist, that all the past is but the crucible of God; he will perceive the creature God has made in successive transmigrations, passed and repassed in the fire of the ages; and he will discern the divine alchemist, bending over His creation with constant patience, and with perfect plan."

"I would study history in order to make my standing firmer in religious faith. In these days of ebb and quicksand, when agnosticism rears its stone wall in front of faith, and writes upon it in black letters the end-all and be-all of all knowing, the unknowable, we have need to go where God is to confirm our faith in Him. And God is in history; He is there because the human soul is there. 'Take thy shoes from off thy feet, for this is holy ground.' Turn the pages reverently, for, as Carlyle says, 'all history is the Bible.'"

A CONTRAST.

The essay on "the Monastery," shows, perhaps, better than any other, the philosophical character of Miss Cleveland's mind. The best men in all ages have struggled to bring the body into subjection to the soul, and in this essay two forms of that struggle are described and contrasted. The monks of the Middle Ages fought it in solitude and in mortification of the body; the Buddhists fought it in dreamy contemplation and in dwelling on their cardinal doctrine of the annihilation of the individual. In grand contrast to these, the author places Christianity effecting the object vainly sought by the other two, yet not quitting its place and work in the world. These are the concluding words of the essay:

"Behold the Nazarene, the young Carpenter, the Evangelist, the Son, the Brother, the Man of Bethlehem—behold Him entering into all the joys and sorrows of the manhood which He dignified, wearing graciously to its last humiliation the garb of human flesh, to which He has ever joined in honorable wedlock the unassailable human soul—behold Him, from His manger-cradle to His death-bed cross, preeminently the Man of men, fullest of humanity, whose whole burden of mission to us lies epitomized in His own statement: 'I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly!'"

The humanity of each of us is like some Æolian harp, constructed by the master musician, and laid down tenderly by Him upon the sea-shore where winds from every quarter play continuously. Buddhism would sweep into the vast ocean this palpitating lyre, and mix its several elements indistinguishably in the deep waters. Mediaeval monasticism would heap it with sand, and bury its melodies from every human ear. An enlightened Christianity would leave it, free and sensitive, upon the shore—would open it to all the winds that hurry to and fro, that it may give out to heaven and earth its full completed harmony. Behold in Christianity the antipode of Buddhism, the antidote of monachism!" Pp. 101; price, $1.50. Published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls.

A SUNDAY JOURNEY STOPPED.

"ROBERT, you are not going to work to-day, are you?" said a bright little woman who was busily engaged preparing breakfast, when her husband entered the kitchen in his working clothes.

"Yes I am, Mary, and it's no use your making a muss over it. I've got to do it. I don't like working seven days a week any better than you like to have me do it, but I must. So get the breakfast as quick as you can, so as I may be out and away before folks go to church."

"Oh, Robert, don't go. No good will ever come of it. God won't let you prosper if you break His commandments. I'd sooner you left your place than have you do it."

"Oh yes, Mary, it's easy for you to say what you'd sooner have, but if I came home without any money for you and the children you wouldn't like it."

"I'd rather you did that, Robert, than work on Sunday. I'd sooner go for a scrub-woman than you should do it. Please, Robert, don't go. God will take care of me and the children, even if you should be discharged."

"Mary, I'm going, and there's an end of it. I'm not going to have you go out scrubbing, and you might have to do it if I lose my work. I'm going to work to-day, and perhaps it won't occur again."

Neither husband nor wife referred to the real cause of Robert having to go to work at all on that day. Robert was too much ashamed of himself to do it, and Mary, having more sense and delicacy than most wives, refrained from reproaches. The fact was that on Friday and Saturday Robert had been drinking when he ought to have been out with his employer's horse and wagon. He knew that if the goods he had to deliver were not at the appointed place before sunrise on Monday morning his employer would lose a customer and he would lose his place. The foreman had told him that plainly on Saturday night, and Robert concluded he had better desecrate the Lord's day and offend God than offend his employer; so, when the foreman hinted that he might even now avert the consequences of his drunken idleness by doing Saturday's work on Sunday, he jumped at the chance. That was why Robert was in his working clothes and Mary was in tears.

The breakfast was soon ready, and Robert swallowed his share hurriedly and sullenly. Mary could eat nothing, and the children were not there. Neither husband nor wife spoke of them. Tacitly they seemed to agree that, if it was possible, the children had better not know about their father going to work on Sunday, and fortunately they were not awake this morning. By and by Mary would call them and give them breakfast, and send them to Sunday-school.

Robert rose from the table, and with a blushing face slunk off to the barn. He knew he was doing wrong, but it seemed to him the best way out of his difficulty, and he was realizing a fact that all sinners find out, sooner or later, that one sin always brings on the apparent necessity for another sin to set the first right. But he had no time to think just then; he was in a hurry to get away, or he would surely meet some one who knew him. So he walked quickly to the barn, put the horse in, and started with his heavy-laden wagon. He was just reaching the outskirts of the town, and was congratulating himself on not having been seen by any one who knew him, when from a side street emerged Mr. John Green, the superintendent of the Sunday-school to which his children went. Robert knew him very well; he was a wealthy man, whose friendship Robert valued very highly. He had often said to Mary that if any trouble came to them Mr. Green would prove a friend in need. There was no man whom Robert would not rather have met than this Christian man, whose caustic words he knew could cut so deeply when on rare occasions he used them.

Mr. Green's eyes were fixed on the ground when Robert saw him first, and it was just possible that he might not raise them to where Robert was perched; but just as the old gentleman came opposite the cart he suddenly stopped, and lifting up both hands, as if in alarm, he exclaimed, as he gazed under the wheels: "There, there; you are going over it; you have gone right over it."

Robert was frightened, and instantly cried out, "Whoa, whoa!" and brought his horse to a stand. He then looked under the wheels, expecting to see the mangled remains of some poor innocent child, or, at least, some poor dog or cat that had been crushed to death. But after gazing about, and not seeing anything under the wheels, he looked at the superintendent, who had so strangely arrested his attention, and anxiously asked: "What have I gone over, sir?"

"Over the Fourth Commandment, my friend: 'Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy!'" was the slow reply.

Robert's nerves after his drunk were not in a condition to stand that fright. He was shaking and trembling from head to foot, for he was, with all his faults, a humane man, who could not bear to hurt even a dog. It was of no use; he could not go on. He turned the horse's head round and retraced his steps to the barn. Come what would, the journey should not be made. Mary gave him a glad welcome through her tears, and bade him cheer up. God would see them through. And He did. Long before daylight the next morning Robert was again on his way, and a frank confession of his fault on his arrival prevented his negligence being reported and punished.

UNDER FIRE.

A Night of Terror.

THAT first shell was a new experience to many in the city, myself among the number. We were during the next few weeks to grow familiar with them, but we never lost our horror. Rather, as we witnessed the frightful effect of the explosives, we grew to dread them more and more. The great black globes could be seen, as I saw this first one, rising in a graceful curve, clear enough against the blue sky, to a point overhead; then they would fall almost in a perpendicular line somewhere—none could do no more than guess where. Then there would be a moment's silence, possibly broken by a shriek of terror, and then an explosion which shook the city, and the strong iron globe would be burst in pieces, every fragment doing damage to life and limb or property. It was awful!

We had heard that our Emperor's minister said, in announcing the declaration of war to the Legislative Assembly, that he entered upon it "with a light heart." I often thought of that speech during the siege. If M. Ollivier had been in Strasburg during those dreadful days he must have been less than human if he kept that lightness of heart. The poor maimed creatures who were carried to the hospitals, their bodies torn by those jagged pieces of iron, seemed to me more to be pitied than those who were killed outright, and there were enough of both to make the heart of any man heavy almost to bursting. Beautiful children running merrily home from school, lovers full of life and hope, men and women in middle life on whom whole families depended for bread, and old people who were spending their last days in kindly beneficence—all classes furnished representative offerings to this bloodthirsty god of war. Ah! as I look back now at those days and nights of terror, and sorrow, and suffering, and death, and think of the misery inflicted on that one city alone, I shudder at the responsibility of the men who caused it all. Surely it had been better for every one if there had been no war. The Emperor and his ambassador were insulted, we were told; it was proposed that a distant relative of the King of Prussia should be King of Spain, and that of itself was a provocation; but what was either of those causes to us that we should suffer? I think now as I thought then, that kings and emperors will not much longer be endured on the earth. They have wrought misery enough with their personal quarrels, forcing men who have no enmity to each other to stand and fight for them, dragging them from their homes to fly at each other's throats, as I have seen cruel men set two dogs fighting while they looked on. Surely the time cannot be far distant when the peoples will say to their rulers, "We are tired of the reign of Caesar; we have been crushed under your tyranny and your cruelty long enough. Who will lead us to establish the reign of Christ?"

But at the time I am now describing these thoughts had not penetrated my mind. I dreaded the siege, it is true, because of the helpless ones around me; but I knew nothing then of the terrible things that a few days would bring before my eyes. So, when that first shell fell, and the good sergeant said "the music and the dance are both begun," and bade me run with the child to the cathedral, I did not realize, as I did afterward, the frightful import of his words.

I had a great wish to run with him to the place where the bomb had fallen, but there was Elsie to be thought of. I turned toward the cathedral, but as we got near the door the rush of people carried me off my feet, and I was hurried in, whether I would or no. In the dusky light within—for, coming out of the sunshine, my eyes were dazzled—I could see that every part was choked with women and children, among whom were sprinkled a few men.

The priests were going to and fro, trying to comfort and encourage them; but the wailing and sobbing was terrible to hear. There were people lying almost prostrate before the altars, speechless with terror; while others were crying aloud to the saints to fight for them, and save them. On the step which runs along the side wall of the nave sat numbers of little children, some looking grave and quiet, and others playing. In the chapel of St. Catherine the angel-figures seemed to look down, cold and unmoved, upon the throng of panic-stricken creatures below them. Then, amid the terror and the crying, I said in my heart: "Lord, save, or we perish!"

I waited, what appeared to me a very long and dreary time; yet Sergeant Klein did not come; and it was doubtful whether I should see him in the crowd. I wondered how they were bearing the fright at home; and I recollected what anxiety Lisbeth would suffer about Elsie. Sylvie and Louise were at school, and how terrified they would be! There was no one to see after them, but me; so I made my way with difficulty through the mass of people to the north door of the cathedral, and passed out into the street. Elsie pointed to the crowned image of Mary, with the infant Jesus in her arms, looking down upon us as coldly as the angel-forms within. It made me sorrowful to look at it.

The streets were almost deserted, for by this time all who could had fled for shelter, either to their own houses or the churches. Another shell had been thrown into the city, and no one knew how many might fall during the coming night. The sky above was calm and clear, as if nothing could reach to stain its loveliness; and the steep roofs, holding now so many families of poor peasants, stood out sharply against the blue. As yet, there was no sign of damage and destruction among them, and everything now was as quiet and tranquil as the precincts of an English cathedral on a Sunday morning. I stepped out from the sheltering porch, not knowing how I should reach home, with my double burden of Elsie and the basket.

"Max," she whispered in my ear, "mother says the dear Lord Christ is everywhere, as well as in heaven. Is He in Strasburg to-day?"

"Yes, Elsie," I answered.

"Oh, how sorry He must be!" whispered the child again; "how very, very sorry He must be!"

And so the thought rushed into my mind all at once, that the Lord Jesus Christ was not like those angel-figures, looking down, cold and unmoved, from His own glory, upon our agony and terror. If I, Max, was filled with care and trouble, thinking of my poor little Sylvie, and my grandmother, and Gretchen and the rest; what must He feel, when He saw His brethren, and those whom He was ready to make His brethren, dying miserably by one another's hands? What must He feel, when He looked upon these poor trembling women, and helpless children, all exposed to a shocking and violent death, without any fault of theirs? What must He feel, seeing the beautiful earth stained with blood, and spoiled by the sin and cruelty of His brothers, who were defacing everything, except the tranquil sky above them, which was beyond their reach. Thank God! heaven was placed beyond their reach, lest they should carry their wars there.

So my thoughts ran, as I carried Elsie, sobbing, through the deserted streets. We found Lisbeth, half-distracted, in the archway, looking along all the four streets, for some trace of her darling. But as soon as she saw her, she set up a shrill scream, as if I was bringing the child home dead; and she shook so, she could not take her from me.

"Why are you frightened, Lisbeth?" I asked; "Elsie is safe."

But I was compelled to call Gretchen down, to help her upstairs. Gretchen lifted the lid of my basket, as soon as we had got Lisbeth up to her attic, and asked me where the potatoes came from.

"They belong to Lisbeth," I said; "Sergeant Klein went marketing for her to-day, and he gave me the basket to bring home."

I dared not tell Gretchen that I had paid for the potatoes.

"How much were they?" she asked.

"Two sous apiece," I answered.

"Two sous!" she repeated. "Then, indeed, we shall soon come to starvation! Two sous for one potato? Why! they'll be worth their weight in gold before the siege is over."

"Gretchen," I said, "do you think that we shall starve?" For it seemed a dreadful thing to die of famine—a hundred times worse than dying on a battle-field.

"Not if I can help it," answered Gretchen, with a significant nod; "but you must bring no more Louisies home. I can tell you Max."

I went down full of thought, and found my grandmother sitting in her carved oak chair, with a small reading-table before her. It was her custom, morning and evening, to read a portion of the Psalms, and a chapter out of an old "History of France," which always seemed to soothe and please her. But her hands were trembling so that she could not turn over the leaves of her Bible. I looked over her shoulder, and saw that the Psalm she had been reading left off at these words: "I am forgotten, as a dead man out of mind; I am like a broken vessel. For I have heard the slanders of many; fear was on every side." I turned over the page for her, and read: "But I trusted in thee, O God; I said, Thou art my God. My times are in Thy hand. Make Thy face to shine upon Thy servant; save me, for Thy mercies' sake."

"You wanted to see the other side of the page, grandmother," I said, cheerfully.

"God bless thee, Max," she answered; "thou art indeed as good as a son to me."

That made my heart light and glad in the midst of my trouble. So I set off, happy enough, to fetch Sylvie and Louise from school, for Gretchen was afraid to go; and by and by we were all together once more, in our own salon, safe and sound. As there was no more bombarding that night, only two or three shells having been thrown into the city, and no great mischief done, as Sergeant Klein told us when he came in—we went to bed after our fright, in greater peace and quietness of mind and body than you would suppose.

But it was the next day our real danger and terror began. I had been down the street, and round the Cathedral—for my grandmother loved the Cathedral as dearly as her own house, and always wanted to know whether any harm had befallen it—when a shell again passed overhead, and fell in a street not far away. But instead of there being a long pause before another came, they followed closely and swiftly, one after the other; while on every hand you could hear the deafening sound of the explosions. At the same time, our forts opened their fire, and the noise was awful. Streams of people were pouring out of their houses to seek refuge in the churches and public buildings. I was rushing away, myself, to fetch Sylvie and the rest to some safer place than our own house, when I met Sergeant Klein, whom I should have passed without seeing if he had not caught me by the arm.

"Where are your running to so fast?" he asked.

"Home," I gasped, "to take Sylvie somewhere. What can I do with them? Where can I take them?"

He stood still for a minute, considering, and another shell sailed across the sky, and new cries of fear rang through the streets.

"You are too far from the casemates; they will be crowded already," he said. "I think they will be safest at home—unless they go to the Cathedral, and that, too, is crowded. The Prussians will aim at all the other public buildings. No; you have four stories above you to protect you. It is the attics that will be in danger. Take care of Elsie," he shouted after me as I darted off the instant he loosed my arm.

Sylvie had not gone to school; but Louise had persisted in going, because of her school-fellows from Saverne and Pfalzburg. I was a little sorry, and yet almost glad, to miss her sorrowful face, with her black eyes looking as mutely sad as some dumb thing that cannot speak its trouble. Sylvie was cowering up to her grandmother, with her face hidden in her lap, and Gretchen was on her knees in a corner, telling her beads as fast as her tongue could run. My grandmother's voice was so low I could hardly hear what she said.

"Max, we have nobody but you to look to. You must take care of us, and the house."

I did not tell her how little I could do, but I stooped down and kissed her, and kissed Sylvie's shoulder, for her face was quite hidden.

"Sergeant Klein thinks we are as safe here anywhere, except in the Cathedral," I said, in an assured voice; "would you like me to take you all there?"

"No, no," she said; "I will never leave my house. If it is to perish, I will perish with it."

"Perhaps Gretchen would rather go," I continued; "I will take care of your through the streets, Gretchen."

"No," she answered; "I will stay or go with my old mistress."

I liked Gretchen all the better for that; and I could speak more cheerfully now.

"Well, then," I said, "we will all stay together; and Sergeant Klein says there is not much danger, except in the attics. I must fetch Lisbeth and Elsie down stairs."

So I went up to Lisbeth's attic, where there was an uproar as of a fierce tempest of thunder; and where the sloping roof shook and rattled as if it was all coming down, like a house built of cards. Neither Lisbeth nor Elsie were there, and I went to the window to have just one look out, though I knew it must be only for a second, for what right had I to run any risk when down stairs they had nobody to look to but me? The German firing was out of my range of sight, for it was mostly at the north of the city; but by leaning through the casement I could see our own citadel, and one or two of the smaller forts, from which every moment, as it seemed, there came a cloud of white vapor as the cannon were fired, while the roar from them was incessant.

Already two or three roofs were crushed in, and columns of black smoke were rising from them; while long, wailing cries of Help! fire! pierced through all the din and thunder of the batteries. My blood boiled and tingled to be out among the uproar and the tumult; but then there was no one to think for my grandmother and poor little Sylvie, except me.

I could scarcely tear myself away; but just then a ball rattled down the pointed roof above me, and fell into the street below, bounding two or three times like a foot-ball. It startled me, and I drew in my head, and called with all my might, "Lisbeth!" I heard her answer from the landing below, and then I found her, with Elsie clinging to her gown, at the door of the bedridden old man's chamber.

"Come down with me this moment," I cried; "you are not safe here. The roof may be crushed in any minute, and it is safer down stairs."

"I cannot, Max," she said, with a brave and resolute look on her pale face. "I must stay with old Hans. But I would thank you with all my heart to take my Elsie down; she would go with you."

"But we will carry old Hans down, too," I said.

"He is too ill to be disturbed," she answered; "it would be the death of him. And, Max, they who have God's arms about them are safe either in life or death. Not but what I tremble a little when those fearful noises come very near. Yet He is here, and I should be ashamed to be much afraid."

Lisbeth's face was both peaceful and steadfast, though the tears stood in her eyes, as she kissed Elsie, and put her little hand in mine to take her away.

"I give her into your charge, Max," she said.

"Lisbeth," I answered, "I would die rather than let any harm come to the child."

She smiled and nodded, laid her hand for a moment upon mine, and looked once again at Elsie. Then she turned back into old Hans' chamber, and closed the door between us.

Oh! the terror and the horror of that day and night! We got used to it afterward, and did not suffer so much, even when the bombardment was more severe. But then it was all new to us, and a boy like me could never describe it. In one of the old prophets there is a verse that comes nearer to describing, but that does not tell the half of it: "That day is a day of wrath, a day of trouble and distress, a day of wasteness and desolation, a day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness, a day of the trumpet and alarm against the fenced cities, and against the high towers."

But in those times there were no cannon, or batteries, or shells, to add to the horrors of the battle. If the old prophet could only come back again, and if the words had been put into his lips, he might have so told it that people hearing of it, who had never seen the horrors or felt the terrors, would have vowed, with a solemn vow, that there should be no war like that again in a Christian country.

We did not eat; we did not sleep; we scarcely stirred. All we could do was to listen, straining our ears to catch up every dismal sound that filled the night. It was not long dark, for, as you know, it was a summer night; but as long as it was dark a lurid red light shone, whenever a shell passed over us, showing us one another's faces, knotted and drawn with fear. Only Elsie, who lay on a cushion I had placed for her at my grandmother's feet, fell soundly asleep; and her sweet little face wore a smile, as if she saw beautiful things and heard sweet, pleasant sounds.

It was still dark, though the dawn was breaking, when suddenly there came a crash and an explosion, so close upon us that the great house shook to its foundations. Gretchen flung herself upon the floor, and Sylvie clung with all her might to my grandmother. I sprang to my feet and waited. For some minutes there was the sound of beams giving way, and of bricks tumbling into the street below; but as yet no harm had come to us. I ventured out on to the staircase, where it was pitch dark, for the faint light of the daybreak could not reach it, and I groped my way carefully up the stone steps.

ELIJAH MEETING AHAB.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 2, 1 Kings 18:1-18. Golden Text, ver. 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

God's Care of the Individual—Nothing Lost—Elijah Educated in Private—The Horrors of the Drought—A Perilous Mission—How Fear of Man is Lost—Royalty Seeking Water—A Test of Reality—Conduct in Trial—The Commission to Obadiah—Obadiah's Faltering Faith—Reassured by Elijah—A Solemn Oath—Ahab and Elijah Meet.

OUR loving God, in all His purposes for nations and generations of men, never loses sight of the human instruments through whom He works. He utilizes every circumstance in which they are placed, every person with whom they meet, to carry on their education. He who said to the disciples, when He had multiplied the loaves, "Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost" (John 6:12), acts Himself upon the same principle.

NOTHING IS LOST

in the economy of God. When it seems to us that time, talents, money, opportunities are being lost, God is only emptying us of our own poor resources, that He may fill us with His own. While Ahab was learning, in spite of himself, to know that there was a God in Israel, and while the confidence of the people was being shaken in the "vanities of the Gentiles," that could not cause rain (Jer. 14:22). God was exercising in private the faith of Elijah, which was soon to be put to a test which all Israel should see.

Elijah had "prayed to the Lord that it might not rain" (James 5:17). One, two, three years passed, and still the heavens were as brass. Everywhere around he could see the manifest answer to his prayer. Everywhere the God, who had been rejected as the King and Father of His people, was asserting Himself as the God of judgment. The state of the land and people was similar to that which Jeremiah describes, when famine came upon Judah. Their nobles have sent their little ones to the waters; they came to the pits, and found no water; they returned with their vessels empty; they were ashamed and confounded, and covered their heads. Because the ground is chapped, for there was no rain in the earth, the ploughmen were ashamed, and confounded, and covered their heads. Yea, the hind also calved in the field, and forsook it, because there was no grass. And the wild asses did stand in the high places, they snuffed up the wind like dragons; their eyes did fail because there was no grass (Jer. 14:3-6).

It was while the land was in this sore need that "the Word of the Lord came to Elijah in the third year, saying: 'Go, shew thyself unto Ahab, and I will send rain upon the earth.'" Elijah knew well enough Ahab's bitter personal hatred to himself, he knew that a price was set upon his head, that in all human probability to show himself to Ahab was certain death. But Elijah had seen with his own eyes the conquest of death by the power of that God, whose presence he never lost sight of, and without gaining or demurring, "Elijah went to show himself to Ahab." When the widow's son was raised, Elijah had believed in God for another, now it was his own life which was in danger. It is in exact proportion to our practical acquaintance with God, that we LOSE OUR FEAR OF MAN.

Men in all stations appear very small to those who endure "as seeing Him who is invisible" (Heb. 11:27). In measure as the greatness of God dawns upon us, we see the extreme littleness both of ourselves and of others.

Ahab might kick against God as much as he would, but he could not help feeling the weight of the judgment which was upon the land. The question of water supply was not only discussed by royalty; that might occur at any time, but the need was so sore that the king set out in person to find water. He called Obadiah, his house-steward. This man, although no preacher, "feared the Lord greatly," and not in word only. When Jezebel, in her infamous hatred of God and of holiness, "cut off the prophets of the Lord, Obadiah took one hundred of these persecuted men, found them refuge in caves, and maintained them. No easy thing to do in the then circumstances of the land; he made himself liable to the queen's displeasure, which meant a cruel death. Ahab said to him, 'Go into all the land, unto all fountains of water, and unto all brooks; peradventure we may find grass to save the horses and mules alive that we lose not all the beasts.'" Why did not Obadiah tell the king there was power in the living God to send rain? Why did not Ahab humble himself, and turn to the Lord, whose severity he was feeling? Alas! he would rather keep the famine and his sin, than give up his sin and have the curse removed! Anything rather than to have to do with God! They divided the land between them to pass throughout it; Ahab went one way by himself, and Obadiah went another way by himself. If Ahab had really believed in Baal, surely he would have prayed to his false God! If he had had any trust in Baal's prophets he might have sent them to take a survey of all the water-courses.

It is a very good test of the reality of a man's religion to inquire, "What does he do in the time of trial?" If a man's religion can stand the test of trial, and he is lifted completely above that which would crush another man—if he does not attempt to extricate himself, but relies on the Almighty God to do it, and he remains perfectly calm—it is a clear evidence that that man has found out a God on whom he can rely, and his faith is real. But if a man is ever so religious, ever so devotional, and yet when sickness, temporal distress, reproach, or any other trial comes, he is just as much overcome by it as a worldly man, it is very clear that he has found religion only, and has not TAKEN HIS SOUNDINGS IN GOD.

As Obadiah was on his survey, Elijah met him. Had he ever seen that face before? Yes; once when he had stood before Ahab, and declared the drought from which the land was suffering now. Obadiah had more fear of Elijah than oneness of spirit with him. Believers who meet with one who is out and out for the Lord, and who is constantly occupied with Him, are often afraid because the presence of God does not to them outshine man. Obadiah fell on his face, and said: "Art thou that, my lord Elijah?" And he answered him, I am; go tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here." It was a startling commission; the very man whom Ahab was seeking to destroy, thus announcing himself as though he courted destruction! And yet, after all, it was not Elijah's danger which Obadiah felt so much as his own. "What have I sinned," he said, "that thou wouldst deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab to slay me?" Obadiah could neither conceive of Elijah's being willing to die at Ahab's hands, nor yet that he should have faith in God for his preservation. Obadiah could fear God, and serve him, but he had not learned to rely upon Him as Elijah could. So he continued, "As the Lord thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom whither my Lord hath not sent to seek thee; and when they said, He is not there, he took an oath of that nation and kingdom that they found thee not. And now thou sayest, Go and tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here. And it shall come to pass, as soon as I am gone from thee, that the Spirit of the Lord shall carry thee whither I know not; and so when I come and tell Ahab, and he cannot find thee, he shall slay me."

Obadiah gave Elijah no credit for sincerity, for he could not picture himself acting as he did; and he made up his mind that the only way of deliverance for Elijah was to be caught away miraculously before he should see Ahab. Oh, how different are man's thoughts from God's! Obadiah did not inquire of Elijah whether God had commanded him to see Ahab, he was occupied with second causes, and did not see God in the matter at all. Like so many believers, he stood on what he was, and what he had done, and he related his good deeds to Elijah, as though to impress him with the fact that such an earnest good man as he deserved more consideration than to be placed in such a position of danger. And after all, the danger was but imaginary; had he seen God over-ruling all, he would have been as calm as Elijah was.

The prophet reassured him, "As the Lord of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, I will surely show myself unto him to-day."

BEFORE WHOM DO YOU STAND,

dear reader? Before man? Before a difficulty, real and present, or possible and future? Do you stand before family circumstances, before the selfishness of one member of your family, which destroys all the comfort of the rest? Do you stand before a dreaded trial, which you are expecting daily to break upon you? Or do you stand before the living, Almighty God, who is able to put His hand between you and the trial, who knows how to deal with the selfish member of your family, who holds in His own hand the thread of your circumstances? Wherever Elijah looked he saw God, it mattered not what lay beyond.

So Obadiah went to meet Ahab, and told him, and Ahab went to meet Elijah. Ahab the king, acted the subject, and instead of commanding Elijah to come to him, he went to meet Elijah. The first words of the king were terms of reproach, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" Alas! alas! for poor human nature! Ahab could believe in the power of Elijah's prayer and the truth of his declaration concerning the drought, and, perhaps, would have spoken of him as a man with wonderful power in prayer or in preaching. But he did not see that Elijah himself was nothing at all, and that the living God was holding back the rain. Hundreds of thousands speak of prayer as though prayer itself were God, and therefore they do not get at God. Elijah's answer was fearless, and true to the letter, "I have not troubled Israel; but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim." What must have been the astonishment of the weak and faithless Obadiah, when he heard Elijah coolly take the king to task, and when the irate king stood and heard him! What could have brought about such a change in their relationships? God, the presence of God. Nothing is impossible with God. Nothing is difficult to Him. It is our glorious privilege to deal with Him in everything and at all times.

The Late Ex-President GENERAL U. S. GRANT. Died July 23, 1885.

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." The mourning nation to-day may take a grim satisfaction in the Apostolic assurance, as it thinks of the long and heroic struggle which has now ended in the vanquishment of the hero of many a hard-fought battle-field—in the surrender of the greatest soldier of his day. Death is a conqueror now, but, as we see from time to time the bravest and noblest fall before him, we joyfully look forward to the time when Death himself, having survived all other enemies of our race, must meet One mightier than he, and be "put under His feet." For the present, however, sorrow for the dead hero, and sympathy with the bereaved family absorb all other feelings, and they are experienced throughout the land. It is a significant fact that there are no exceptions to this sentiment. The tribute of respect and homage which comes from the South is no less ardent or sincere than that from the North, and comes from political opponents as from political friends.

THE PATIENT SUFFERER.

It is but little more than nine months since General Grant was regarded as a strong and vigorous man, likely to live to a good old age. Nine months ago he walked into the office of a prominent physician to consult him about a soreness of the throat, and there it was discovered that a fatal disease had the distinguished man in its relentless grip. Cancer of the throat and tongue was already clearly developed, and the fatal termination could not be averted. All that medical skill and family affection could do to relieve his sufferings was done, but from the first there was no hope of cure. With the indomitable resolution and fortitude which the General had displayed on the battle-field he bore his sufferings. The physicians say that the agony he endured would have caused the majority of men to spend their days in groaning; but General Grant continued patient and considerate of the comfort of all about him until the last, and with the rare will-power he possessed in so extraordinary a degree, he commenced and carried to a conclusion an autobiography which, as a historical work, will be of priceless value to his countrymen.

When the excessive heat of this summer first appeared, the physicians, dreading its effect on the vitality of the sufferer, counselled his removal from New York. Mr. Joseph Drexel's cottage at Mount McGregor was placed at the disposal of General Grant and his family. Thither on June 16th he was removed, and apparently derived much benefit from the purer air. Early last week, however, gloomy reports were published describing his increasing weakness, which, in his condition, was a most alarming symptom. On Wednesday last it was evident that the end was rapidly approaching, and on the following morning, July 23d, at eight minutes past eight, the greatest citizen of the Republic, surrounded by his sorrowing wife and family, passed peacefully and almost painlessly away from the scene of his triumphs, his joys and his sorrows.

General Grant's family, though American for generations, is of Scotch descent. It was founded by Matthew Grant, who sailed from Great Britain in the good ship Mary and Jane, and landed at Dorchester, Mass., in 1630. From him General Grant was the eighth in line of descent. The sixth in the line, and the grandfather of General Grant was Noah Grant, a lieutenant of militia, who fought at the battle of Lexington in 1776, and served in the Continental army throughout the war. His son, Jesse Root Grant, settled in 1820, at a place called Point Pleasant, in Clermont County, Ohio, about twenty-five miles above Cincinnati, and there, on April 27th, 1822, the future President was born. He was named Hiram Ulysses, but some years afterward he received an appointment to West Point, under the name of Ulysses Simpson Grant, and thenceforward that was the name by which he was known. The change was the result of an accident; the Hon. Thomas L. Hamer who secured the West Point cadetship for the boy was acquainted with Mrs. Grant's maiden name, and not knowing his full name conferred that cognomen upon him temporarily. But the boys in the school noticing the familiar initials "U. S." called him "Uncle Sam," and the name stuck.

A HORSE TRADE

is one of the incidents of his boyhood related by himself in the autobiography which Messrs. Charles L. Webster & Co., of New York, are about to publish. The General says: "There was a Mr. Ralston living within a few miles of the village, who owned a colt which I very much wanted. My father had offered $20 for it, but Ralston wanted $25. I was so anxious to have the colt that after the owner left I begged to be allowed to take him at the price demanded. My father yielded, but said $20 was all the horse was worth, and told me to offer that price; if it was not accepted I was to offer $22.50, and if that would not get him, to give the $25. At once mounted a horse and went for the colt. When I got to Mr. Ralston's house I said to him: 'Papa says I may offer you $20 for the colt, but if you won't take that I am to offer $22.50, and if you won't take that, to give you $25.' It would not require a Connecticut man to guess the price finally agreed upon. This story is nearly true. I certainly showed very plainly that I had come for the colt and meant to have him. I could not have been over eight years old at this time. I kept the horse until he was four years old, when he went blind, and I sold him for $20."

AT WEST POINT.

The beginning of his military life is thus described by the General in the same work:

"My father received a letter from the Hon. Thomas Morris, then United States Senator from Ohio. When he read it he said to me: 'Ulysses, I believe you are going to receive the appointment.' 'What appointment?' I inquired. 'To West Point; I have applied for it.' 'But I won't go,' I said. He said he thought I would, and I thought so, too, if he did. I really had no objection to going to West Point, except that I had a very exalted idea of the requirements necessary to get through. I did not believe I possessed them, and could not bear the idea of failing. During my first year's encampment, General Scott visited West Point and reviewed the cadets. With his commanding figure, his quite colossal size, and showy uniform, I thought him the finest specimen of manhood my eyes had ever beheld, and the most to be envied. I could never resemble him in appearance, but I believe I did have a presentiment for a moment that some day I should occupy his place on review, although I had no intention then of remaining in the army. But my experience in a horse trade ten years before, and the ridicule it caused me, were too fresh in my mind for me to communicate this presentiment to even my most intimate chum.

"The next summer, Martin Van Buren, then President of the United States, visited West Point and reviewed the cadets. But he did not impress me with the awe that Scott inspired. In fact, I regarded General Scott and Captain C. F. Smith, the commandant of cadets, as the two men most to be envied by the nation. I was impatient to get on my uniform and see how it looked, besides probably wanting my old schoolmates, particularly the girls, to see me in it. But the conceit was knocked out of me by two little circumstances that happened soon after the arrival of the clothes, and which gave me a distaste for military uniform that I never recovered from.

"Soon after the arrival of the suit, I donned it and put off for Cincinnati on horseback. While I was riding along a street of that city, imagining that every one was looking at me with a feeling akin to mine when I first saw General Scott, a little urchin, bareheaded, barefooted, with dirty and ragged pants held up by a single galls—what's that? suspenders were called then—and a shirt that had not seen a wash-tub for weeks, turned to me, and cried out: 'Soldier, will you work? No, sir-ee. I'll sell my shirt first.' The horse trade and its dire consequences were recalled to mind."

Grant's West Point record appears to have been creditable though not brilliant. He entered the Institution on July 1st, 1839, and graduated on the 30th of June, 1843. His standing was No. 21, or about the middle of a class of thirty-nine. He was awarded the rank of brevet second-lieutenant of infantry in the United States Army. There was no war, and he was therefore attached as a supernumerary lieutenant to the Fourth Regiment of Regular United States Infantry, then stationed on the Missouri frontier, looking after obstreperous tribes of Indians. In 1845, when the military occupation of Texas took place, the young officer was ordered there with his regiment to join the army of General Taylor. Mexicans and Americans were in dispute over an imaginary boundary line of what is now the State of Texas. Disputes grew to hostilities, and these ripened into the war between the United States and Mexico.

When Corpus Christi was occupied by the Americans as a base of operations, Grant received his commission as full second-lieutenant of infantry. The Mexicans besieged Fort Brown, on the Texas shore of the Rio Grande. General Taylor went to the relief of the place, and this was Lieutenant Grant's

FIRST BATTLE-GROUND.

On the 8th of May, 1846, he participated in the battle of Palo Alto, and on the following day in that of Resaca de la Palma. Lieutenant Grant also took part in the subsequent operations of General Taylor along the Rio Grande, and then advanced into the Mexican Territory, joining in the successful operation against Monterey. War had now been regularly declared. General Scott landed above Vera Cruz, and Lieutenant Grant was transferred to the command of that officer in time to serve in the siege operations, which ended in the surrender of that city on the 29th of March, 1847. The qualities of Lieutenant Grant had by this time begun to attract the attention of his commanding officers; and during the early part of April, when the army was preparing to advance into the interior, he was appointed quartermaster of his regiment—a post both honorable and important in the enemy's country. With this position he went through the entire Mexican campaign, to the occupation, by the United States forces, of the Capital. At Molino del Rey and Chapultepec he distinguished himself by gallant behavior, and after the latter battle received the brevet of Captain of the Regular Army, the nomination being afterward confirmed by Congress during the Session of 1849-50.

Some desultory operations in Oregon followed the close of the Mexican War; but there being little duty to perform, Grant, who had been made a first lieutenant, resigned his commission July 31st, 1854. He rented a small farm near St. Louis, and settled down to hard work. In 1848 he had married Miss Julia T. Dent, of St. Louis, which accounts for his choice of a location. A newspaper correspondent says that while on the farm "Grant was in the habit of cutting the wood, drawing it to Carondelet, and selling it in the market there. Many of his purchasers are now calling to mind that they had a cord of wood delivered in person by the great General Grant. When he came into the wood-market he was usually dressed in an old felt hat, with a blouse coat, and his trousers tucked in the tops of his boots. In truth, he bore the appearance of a sturdy, honest woodman." In 1859, however, the farm had been given up, and

Grant was in Galena, Ill., as the junior member of the firm of "Grant & Son," in the leather trade. He was so engaged at the OUTBREAK OF THE WAR.

A peculiar interest attaches now to the letter in which Grant tendered his services to the Government. The letter itself is lost, though careful search has been made for it, but a copy of it is given by General Grant in his autobiography. It was dated May 24th, 1861, and was addressed to Adjutant-General Thomas, and ran as follows:

"SIR: Having served for fifteen years in the regular army, including four years at West Point, and feeling it the duty of every one who has been educated at the Government expense to offer their services for the support of that Government, I have the honor, very respectfully, to tender my services until the close of the war in such capacity as may be offered. I would say, in view of my present age and length of service, I feel myself competent to command a regiment if the President, in his judgment, should see fit to intrust one to me.

"Since the first call of the President I have been serving on the staff of the Governor of this State, rendering such aid as I could in the organization of our State militia, and am still engaged in that capacity. A letter addressed to me at Springfield, Illinois, will reach me.

"I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, U. S. GRANT."

The letter received no answer, but Grant offered himself to Governor Yates, of Illinois, who made him mustering officer of volunteers. At the end of five weeks the Governor offered him the Twenty-first Regiment of Illinois Infantry. Early in June he took command of his regiment, marched to Missouri, and reported to Brigadier-General Pope, by whom he was stationed at the town of Mexico. In the beginning of August he was commissioned by the President Brigadier-General of Volunteers, to date from May 17th. He had been unanimously recommended for the promotion by the members of Congress from Illinois, at the suggestion of the Hon. Elihu B. Washburne, of Galena.

It is not our intention to repeat here the oft-told tale of General Grant's brilliant military services. The following extract from his book will, however, probably be new to our readers; and coming as it does from the pen of the great General himself, has unusual interest, as showing his feeling at the opening of the great struggle in which he was to play so important a part.

A CONFESSION OF FRIGHT.

"As soon as the enemy saw us they decamped as fast as their horses would carry them. We halted at night on the road, and proceeded the next morning at an early hour. Harris had been encamped in a creek bottom for the sake of being near water. The hills on either side of the creek extend to a considerable height, possibly more than one hundred feet. As we approached the brow of the hill from which it was expected we could see Harris's camp, and possibly find his men ready formed to meet us, my heart kept getting higher and higher, until it felt to me as though it was in my throat. I would have given anything then to have been back in Illinois, but I had not the moral courage to halt and consider what to do; I kept right on. When we reached a point from which the valley below was in full view I halted. The place where Harris had been encamped a few days before was still there, and the marks of a recent encampment were plainly visible, but the troops were gone. My heart resumed its place. It occurred to me at once that Harris had been as much afraid of me as I had been of him. This was a view of the question I had never taken before; but it was one I never forgot afterward. From that event to the close of the war I never experienced trepidation upon confronting an enemy."

THE EVENTS OF THE WAR.

are too fresh in our recollection to need narration here. A brief summary, which we condense from the history of the period published in the New York Evening Post, will suffice to recall the order of those events to the memory of our readers.

With the assignment of Halleck and Buell to the two principal departments of the West, the systematic prosecution of the war may be said to have begun. Halleck saw that the Tennessee River was the line by which to break the Confederate centre, and was glad to make use of Grant's eagerness to make an expedition against Forts Henry and Donaldson, and thus to take the initiative in the campaign from Buell, who was methodically perfecting his arrangements for an advance. The audacity of the movement suited Grant's qualities as a soldier, and was itself in no small measure the cause of its success. Fort Henry's capture was, as to the fighting, a naval engagement; but the surrender of Donelson remains a striking proof of the moral effect of a daring initiative. Grant's confidence seemed to the Confederate generals to indicate an army at his back double what it really was, and they took him at his word when his demand for "unconditional surrender" implied an overwhelming force to execute his threat. This really important victory came at a time (February, 1862) when the fame it gave was multiplied in public estimation by the universal impatience at the delay in opening the campaign on the Potomac, and Grant reaped the full benefit of it in glory and in promotion. "U. S.," the initials of his name, were not now understood to mean Uncle Sam, but "Unconditional Surrender."

The battle of Shiloh followed quickly (April 6th, 7th, 1862), and the result tended to intensify the debate whether military good conduct or the blind favors of fortune were to be thanked for his success. That the two-days' battle had ended in a national victory no one denied; but there was a loud outcry that Grant's own army had been routed when Buell's arrival on the field turned disaster into victory. Halleck himself took the field, and, by announcing Grant as second in command without immediate control of troops, practically retired him.

Grant never forgave this, and would have insisted upon being relieved of service in that department if Sherman, with warm friendliness, had not urged patience and the awaiting of the varying chances of the campaign.

VICKSBURG.

His patient endurance of his half disgrace brought its reward. Halleck would seem to have gained confidence in him and to have had his prejudices removed; for when he became General-in-Chief he gave Grant most earnest support in the Vicksburg campaign, and served loyally under him when the latter became Lieutenant-General. The campaign of Vicksburg at first seemed fated to keep open the question of Grant's capacity, though there was now no question of his fighting qualities. But when crossing the Mississippi at Bruinsburg he divided and beat in detail the enemy's forces, then, turning upon Pemberton, drove him into Vicksburg, and invested him there, resuming his own communications in doing so, the most sceptical were forced to admit his possession of military talents of the highest order. Pemberton's surrender on the 4th of July, 1863, came with the victory at Gettysburg to give assurance that a permanent turn in the tide of war had been reached.

THE CLOSING CONTEST.

"Grant's fame was now secure, and his military pre-eminence was scarcely disputable; but when, in November of that year, he redeemed the disaster of Chickamauga by the dramatic victory of Mission Ridge, his promotion to the Lieutenant-Generalship may be said to have been made by acclamation. If the hard hammering of the Virginia campaign which followed had little of the brilliancy of his former exploits, it perhaps consolidated all the more his reputation for tenacity and for power to infuse his own unconquerable determination into a great army. If we shuddered at the fearful cost of life at which that campaign was carried on, the steadily defensive policy of an army which had made the dashing campaigns Lee had before that time conducted, was sufficient proof of the conviction he felt of Grant's ability to deliver a fatal thrust if the guard should for a moment be lowered. The surrender at Appomattox, on April 9th, 1865, was made more imposing by the unaffected modesty of the victor, and the nation's gratitude was intensified by the perfect subordination to the civil authorities of his country, which removed every fear that the war had raised up any soldiers too proud or too powerful to be peaceful citizens. After the war General Grant fixed his headquarters at Washington, and on July 25th, 1866, he was commissioned General of the United States Army, the rank being created for him.

THE PRESIDENCY.

His conduct during the miserable troubles of the closing months of President Johnson's term increased the esteem with which he was regarded by all sections of the country. No one was surprised, therefore, when the Republican National Convention, on May 21st, 1868, unanimously nominated General Grant, on the first ballot, for President. His Democratic competitor was Horatio Seymour. Grant and Colfax carried twenty-six States, and received two hundred and fourteen electoral votes, against eighty for Seymour and Blair. Grant was inaugurated President March 4th, 1869. As President Grant was in political harmony with the majority in Congress, the reconstruction of the Southern States, which had been delayed by the lack of such harmony during the previous administration, now went on. In 1871 Grant urged the annexation of Santo Domingo as a territory of the United States. A treaty to effect this, and also one by which the peninsula and bay of Samana were ceded to the United States for fifty years at an annual rental of $150,000 in gold, had been signed November 29th, 1869, on behalf of President Grant and President Baez. The Senate, however, withheld its approval of the treaties.

A "joint high commission" of five British and five American members met at Washington, February 27th, 1871, and on May 8th signed a treaty on the subject of the coast fisheries, river navigation, and the Alabama claims. The last-named question was submitted to a court of arbitration which met at Geneva, Switzerland, and on September 14th, 1872, awarded the gross sum of $15,500,000 to be paid by the British Government to the United States for damages to American commerce by Confederate cruisers fitted out in British ports.

At the National Republican Convention at Philadelphia, June 5th, 1872, President Grant was renominated by acclamation, and Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, received the nomination for Vice-President; while Horace Greeley and B. Gratz Brown were the candidates of both the Liberal Republicans and the Democrats. Grant and Wilson received two hundred and sixty-eight votes in the Electoral College against eighty for the other candidates.

We have no heart, under present circumstances, to dwell critically on the events of those two terms. The incident of the horse-trade in his boyhood is recalled by Grant's conduct in the Presidential chair. The honest, frank simplicity of his character fitted him to be the dupe of men without principle; and the men who swarmed into Washington at the close of the war were precisely of that class. Under Grant's splendid reputation they intrigued and schemed for their own advantage, satisfied that the rugged, fearless soldier would "never desert his friends under fire." It was a cruel thing, and the whole country grieved at the sight of the brave general's name being used to shelter a gang of thieves. But Grant always gave his whole confidence to a friend, and never could be persuaded that a man who had once abused his confidence should be cast off. So the whiskey scandals, and others only too well remembered, cast a blight on his administration. Unthinking men associated the President with the subordinates to whose corruption he was blind, but those who knew him best were well aware that his personal character was unsnirched, and that his faults as a President were based on the most estimable qualities of the human mind.

THE TOUR AROUND THE WORLD.

Soon after the expiration of his second term, General Grant left Washington for Philadelphia with the design of making a tour of the world. This he began May 17th, 1877, with his wife and eldest son. From Liverpool he went to London. During his stay in England the General was honored with an invitation to dine with the Queen at Windsor Castle, was presented with the freedom of the city of London in a gold casket, and was treated by the statesmen and the people with all the honor usually reserved for royal personages. The General and party next visited successively Switzerland, the northern part of Italy, Alsace and Lorraine, Brussels, Egypt, the Holy Land, Constantinople, Rome, Paris, Berlin, Copenhagen, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, Vienna, Madrid, Bombay, Calcutta, Burmah, Siam, Hong Kong, Canton and Yokohama, returning to America by San Francisco, having thus completed the circuit of the world. He arrived at San Francisco on September 20th, 1879, having been away two years and four months. During this tour General Grant was received with distinguished honors by Queen Victoria, King Leopold of Belgium, the Khédive of Egypt, the Sultan of Turkey, King Humbert of Italy, Pope Leo XIII., President MacMahon of France, the King of Holland, Emperor William of Germany, Prince Bismarck, King Oscar of Sweden, the Emperor Alexander of Russia, the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria, King Alfonso of Spain, President Grévy of France, M. Gambetta, Lord Lytton, Viceroy of India; King Thebaw of Burmah, Prince Kung of China, the Emperor of Siam, and the Mikado of Japan. During his travels General Grant was the recipient of many valuable presents, most of which go to the Government, in accordance with an arrangement made some time ago with Mr. William H. Vanderbilt.

In 1880 General Grant's political adherents once more endeavored to secure his nomination for President. This was at Chicago. They did not succeed, however, and the nomination was given to General Garfield. This Convention was remarkable for the tenacity with which Grant's friends stuck to him to the last, the "Stalwart 306" subsequently receiving a medal each to commemorate the event. About this time, through the efforts of Mr. Jones, of the New York Times, Mr. George W. Childs, of the Philadelphia Ledger, and other patriotic and benevolent gentlemen, a fund of over a quarter of a million dollars was raised, the interest of which was to be placed at the disposal of General Grant, the fund being invested by trustees in securities believed at the time to be profitable. In 1883, General Grant became silent partner in the firm of Grant & Ward, bankers and brokers, New York City, with whose disastrous failure our readers are already familiar.

It was not until after that financial catastrophe, and when it became known that the whole of General Grant's estate, personal as well as real had been swept away, and that not even the swords and medals presented to him could be called his own, that the long-continued efforts to secure a pension for him succeeded. He had resigned his military office to be President, so that when the failure came he had not even his pension as a soldier at command. To the general satisfaction of the people, however, North and South, Congress passed a bill on March 4th, 1885, providing for his being placed on the retired list, with the full pay of General. The act, tardy as it was, evidently afforded consolation to the distinguished invalid, who was then fully realizing the fatal nature of his disease.

General Grant leaves a widow and three sons (Fred, Jesse, and U. S., Jr.), and one daughter, Mrs. Nellie Sartoris. The father and mother of General Grant are both dead.

HOW HE CAME TO SAY IT.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha.—1 Cor. 16 : 22.

Christ's Personal Appearance—His Lovely Disposition—The Four Pictures of Him—All Lovely—Lovely in Beneficence—In Sacrifice—The Shame of Injustice—A Fair and Square Purchase—Bought with Blood and Tears—The Spiritual Suicide—A Name on the Note—A Mean, Cruel Thing—The Knocking at the Door—Another Refusal—Worlds on a Swivel—Will He Come?—A Solemn Farewell.

The smallest lad in the house knows the meaning of all those words except the last two, Anathema, Maran-atha. Anathema, to cut off. Maran-atha, at His coming. So the whole passage might be read : "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be cut off at His coming." Well, how could the tender-hearted Paul say that? We have seen him with tears discoursing about human want, and flushed with excitement about human sorrow; and now he throws those red-hot words into this letter to the Corinthians. Had he lost his patience? Oh, no. Had he resigned his confidence in the Christian religion? Oh, no. Had the world treated him so badly that he had become its sworn enemy? Oh, no. It needs some explanation, I confess, and I shall proceed to show by what process Paul came to the vehement utterance of my text. Before I close, if God shall give His Spirit, you shall cease to be surprised at the exclamation of the Apostle, and you yourselves will employ the same emphasis, declaring, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha."

If the photographic art had been discovered early enough, we should have the facial proportions of Christ—the front face, the side face, Jesus sitting, Jesus standing—provided. He had submitted to that art; but since the sun did not become a portrait-painter until eighteen centuries after Christ, our idea about the Saviour's PERSONAL APPEARANCE is all guess-work. Still, tradition tells us that He was the most infinitely beautiful being that ever walked our small earth. If His features had been rugged, and His gait had been ungainly, that would not have hindered Him from being attractive. Many men you have known and loved have had few charms of physiognomy. Wilberforce was not attractive in face. Socrates was repulsive. Suwarrow, the great Russian hero, looked almost an imbecile. And some whom you have known, and honored, and loved, have not had very great attractiveness of personal appearance. The shape of the mouth, and the nose, and the eyebrow, did not hinder the soul from shining through the cuticle of the face in all-powerful irradiation.

But to a lovely exterior Christ joined all LOVELINESS OF DISPOSITION. Run through the galleries of heaven, and find out that He is a non-such. The sunshine of His love mingling with the shadows of His sorrows, crossed by the crystalline stream of His tears and the crimson flowing forth of His blood, make a picture worthy of being called the masterpiece of the eternities. Hung on the wall of heaven, the celestial population would be enchanted but for the fact that they have the grand and magnificent original, and they want no picture. But Christ having gone away from earth, we are dependent upon four indistinct pictures. Matthew took one, Mark another, Luke another, and John another. I care not which picture you take, it is lovely. Lovely? He was altogether lovely.

He had a way of taking up a dropsical limb without hurting it, and of removing the cataract from the eye without the knife, and of starting the circulation through the shrunken arteries without the shock of the electric battery, and of putting intelligence into the dull state of lunacy, and of restraining the auditory nerve of the deaf ear, and of striking articulation into the stiff tongue, and of making the stark-naked madman dress himself and exchange tombstone for ottoman, and of unlocking from the skeleton grip of death the daughter of Jairus to embosom her in her glad father's arms. Oh, He was lovely—sitting, standing, kneeling, lying down—always lovely.

LOVELY IN HIS SACRIFICE.

Why, He gave up everything for us. Home, celestial companionship, music of seraphic harps, balmy breath of eternal summer, all joy, all light, all music, and heard the gates slam shut behind Him as He came out to fight for our freedom, and with bare feet plunged on the sharp javelins of human and satanic hate, until His blood spurted into the faces of those who slew Him. You want the soft, low, minor key of sweetest music to describe the pathos; but it needs an orchestra, under swinging of an archangel's baton, reaching from throne to manger, to drum and trumpet the doxologies of His praise. He took everybody's trouble—the leper's sickness, the widow's dead boy, the harlot's shame, the Galilean fisherman's poor luck, the invalidism of Simon's mother-in-law, the stinging of Malchus's amputated ear.

HE TOOK EVERYBODY'S TROUBLE.

Some people cry very easily, and for some it is very difficult to cry. A great many tears on some cheeks do not mean so much as one tear on another cheek. What is it that I see glittering in the mild eye of Jesus? It was all the sorrows of earth, and the woes of hell, from which He had plucked our souls, accreted into one transparent drop, lingering on the lower eyelash until it fell on a cheek red with the slap of human hands—just one salt, bitter, burning tear of Jesus. No wonder the rock, the sky, and the cemetery were in consternation when He died. No wonder the universe was convulsed. It was the Lord God Almighty bursting into tears! Now suppose that, notwithstanding all this, a man cannot have any affection for him. What ought to be done with such hard behavior?

It seems to me that there ought to be some chastisement for a man who will not love such a Christ. Does it not make your bloodingle to think of Jesus coming over the tens of thousands of miles that seem to separate God from us, and then to see a man jostle Him out, and push Him back, and shut the door in His face, and trample upon His entreaties? While you may not be able to rise up to the towering excitement of the Apostle in my text, you can at any rate somewhat understand His feelings when He cried out : "After all this, 'if a man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha.'"

SHAMEFUL INJUSTICE.

Just look at the injustice of not loving Him. Now, there is nothing that excites a man like injustice. You go along the street, and you see your little child buffeted, or a ruffian comes and takes a boy's hat and throws it into the ditch. You say : "What great meanness, what injustice that is." You cannot stand injustice. I remember, in my boyhood days, attending a large meeting in Tripler Hall, New York. Thousands of people were huzzaing, and the same kind of audiences were assembled at the same time in Boston, Edinburgh, and London. Why? Because the Madai family, in Italy, had been robbed of their Bible. "A little thing," you say. Ah, that injustice was enough to arouse the indignation of a world. But while we are so sensitive about injustice as between man and man, how little sensitive we are about injustice between man and God. If there ever was

A FAIR AND SQUARE PURCHASE of anything, then Christ purchased us. He paid for us, not in shekels, not in ancient coins inscribed with effigies of Hercules, or Ægina's tortoise, or lyre of Mitylene, but in two kinds of coin—one red, the other glittering—blood and tears! If anything is purchased and paid for, ought not the goods to be delivered? If you have bought property and given the money, do you not want to come in possession of it? "Yes," you say, "I will have it. I bought and paid for it." And you will go to law for it, and you will denounce the man as a defrauder. Aye, if need be, you will hurl him into jail. You will say: "I am bound to get that property. I bought it. I paid for it."

Now, transpose the case. Suppose Jesus Christ to be the wronged purchaser on the one side, and the impenitent soul on the other, trying to defraud Him of that which He bought at such an exorbitant price, and how do you feel about that injustice? How do you feel towards that spiritual fraud, turpitude and perfidy? A man with an ardent temperament rises and he says that such injustice as between man and man is bad enough, but between man and God it is reprehensible and intolerable, and he brings his fist down on the pew, and he says: "I can stand this injustice no longer. After all this purchase, if any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha."

SPIRITUAL SUICIDE.

I go still further, and show you how suicidal it is for a man not to love Christ. If a man gets in trouble, and he cannot get out, we have only one feeling toward him—sympathy and a desire to help him. If he has failed for a vast amount of money, and cannot pay more than ten cents on a dollar—aye, if he cannot pay anything—though his creditors may come after him like a pack of hounds, we sympathize with him. We go to his store, or house, and we express our condolence. But suppose the day before that man failed William E. Dodge had come into his store and said: "My friend, I hear you are in trouble. I have come to help you. If ten thousand dollars will see you through your perplexity, I have a loan of that amount for you. Here is a cheque for the amount of that loan." Suppose the man said: "With that ten thousand dollars I could get through until next spring, and then everything will be all right; but, Mr. Dodge, I don't want it; I won't take it; I would rather fail than take it; I don't even thank you for offering it." Your sympathy for that man would cease immediately. You would say: "He had a fair offer; he might have got out; he wants to fail; he refuses all help; now let him fail." There is no one in all this house who would have any sympathy for that man.

THE NAME ON THE NOTE.

But do not let us be too hasty. Christ hears of our spiritual embarrassments. He finds that we are on the very verge of eternal defalcation. He finds the law knocking at our door with this dun: "Pay me what thou owest." We do not know which way to turn. Pay? We cannot pay a farthing of all the millions of obligation. Well, Christ comes in and says: "Here is My name; you can use My name. Your name would be worthless, but My red handwriting on the back of this obligation will get you through anywhere." Now suppose the soul says: "I know I am in debt; I can't meet these obligations either in time or eternity; but Oh, Christ, I want not Thy help; I ask not Thy rescue. Go away from me." You would say: "That man, why, he deserves to die. He had the offer of help; he would not take it. He is a free agent; he ought to have what he wants; he chooses death rather than life. Ought you not give him freedom of choice?" Though awhile ago there was only one ardent man who understood the Apostle, now there are hundreds in the house who can say, and do say within themselves: "After all this ingratitude, and rejection, and obstinacy, if any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha."

A MEAN ACT.

I go a step further, and say it is most cruel for a man not to love Jesus. The meanest thing I could do for you would be needlessly to hurt your feelings. Sharp words sometimes cut like a dagger. An unkind look will sometimes rive like the lightning. An unkind deed may overmaster a sensitive spirit, and if you have made up your mind that you have done wrong to any one, it does not take you two minutes to make up your mind to go and apologize. Now, Christ is a bundle of delicacy and sensitiveness. How you have shocked His nerves! How you have broken His heart!

WAITING AT THE DOOR.

Did you, my brother, ever measure the meaning of that one passage: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock"? It never came to me as it did this morning, while I was thinking on this subject. "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." Some January day, the thermometer five degrees below zero, the wind and sleet beating mercilessly against you, you go up the steps of a house where you have a very important errand. You knock with one knuckle. No answer. You are very earnest, and you are freezing. The next time you knock harder. After awhile with your fist you beat against the door. You must get in, but the inmate is careless or stubborn, and he does not want you in. Your errand is a failure. You go away.

The Lord Jesus Christ comes up on the steps of your heart, and with very sore hand he knocks hard at the door of your soul. He is standing in the cold blasts of human suffering. He knocks. He says: "Let Me in. I have come a great way. I have come all the way from Nazareth, from Bethlehem, from Golgotha. Let Me in. I am shivering and blue with the cold. Let Me in. My feet are bare but for their covering of blood. My head is uncovered but for a turban of brambles. By all these wounds of foot, and head, and heart, I beg you to let Me in. Oh, I have been here a great while, and the night is getting darker. I am faint with hunger. I am dying to get in. Oh! lift the latch—shove back the bolt. Won't you let Me in? Won't you?" "Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

ANOTHER DOOR.

But after awhile, my brother, the scene will change. It will be another door, but Christ will be on the other side of it. He will be on the inside, and the rejected sinner will be on the outside, and the sinner will come up and knock at the door and say: "Let me in, let me in. I have come a great way. I came all the way from earth. I am sick and dying. Let me in. The merciless storm beats my unsheltered head. The wolves of a great night are on my track. Let me in. With both fists I beat against this door. Oh, let me in. Oh, Christ, let me in. Oh, Holy Ghost, let me in. Oh, God, let me in. Oh, my glorified kindred, let me in." No answer save the voice of Christ, who shall say: "Sinner, when I stood at your door you would not let Me in, and now you are standing at My door, and I cannot let you in. The day of your grace is past. Officer of the law, seize him." And while the arrest is going on, all the myriads of heaven rise on gallery and throne, and cry with a loud voice, that makes the eternal city quake from cap-stone to foundation, saying: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha."

WORLDS ON A SWIVEL.

Sabbath audience in the Brooklyn Tabernacle, and all to whom these words shall come on both sides the sea, notice here the tremendous alternative; it is not whether you live in Pierrepont Street or Carleton Avenue, walk Trafalgar Square or the "Canongate"; nor whether your dress shall be black or brown; nor whether you shall be robust or an invalid; nor whether you shall live on the banks of the Hudson, the Shannon, the Seine, the Thames, the Tiber; but it is a question whether you will love Christ or suffer banishment; whether you will give yourselves to Him who owns you or fall under the millstone; whether you will rise to glories that have no terminus or plunge to a depth which has no bottom. I do not see how you can take the ten thousandth part of a second to decide it, when there are two worlds fastened at opposite ends of a swivel, and the swivel turns on one point, and that point is now, now. Is it not fair that you love Him? Is it not right that you love Him? Is it not imperative that you love Him? What is it that keeps you from rushing up and throwing the arms of your affection about His neck?

My text pronounces Anathema Maran-atha upon all those who refuse to love Christ. Anathema—cut off. Cut off from light, from hope, from peace, from heaven. Oh, sharp, keen, sword-like words! Cut off! Everlastingly cut off! Behold, therefore, the goodness and severity of God; on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, if thou continue in His goodness; otherwise thou also shalt be cut off. Maran-atha—that is the other word. "When He comes" is the meaning of it.

WILL HE COME?

I see no signs of it. I looked into the sky as I rode down to church. I saw no signs of the coming. No signal of God's appearance. The earth stands solid on its foundation. No cry of welcome or of woe. Will He come? He will. Maran-atha! Hear it, ye mountains, and prepare to fall. Ye cities, and prepare to burn. Ye righteous, and prepare to reign. Ye wicked, and prepare to die. Maran-atha! Maran-atha!

But oh, my brother, I am not so aroused by that coming as I am to a previous coming, and that is the coming of our death-hour, which will fix everything for us. I cannot help now, while preaching, asking myself the question—am I ready for that? If I am ready for the first I will be ready for the next. Are you ready for the emergency? Shall I tell you when your death hour will come? "Oh, no," says some one, "I don't want to know. I would rather not know." Some one says: "I would rather know, if you can tell me." I will tell you. It will be at the most unexpected moment, when you are most busy, and when you think you can be the least spared. I cannot exactly say whether it will be in the noon, or at the sundown when people are coming home, or in the morning when the world is waking up, or while the clock is striking twelve at night. But I tell you what I think, that with some of you it will be before next Saturday night.

UNEXPECTED DEATH.

A minister of the Gospel said to an audience: "Before next Sabbath some of you will be gone." And a man said during the week: "I shall watch now, and if no one dies in our congregation during this week I shall go and tell the minister his falsehood." A man standing next to him said: "Why, it may be yourself." "Oh, no," he replied; "I shall live on to be an old man." That night he breathed his last.

Standing before some who soon shall be launched into the great eternity, what are your equipments? About to jump, where will you land? Oh, the subject is overwhelming to me; and when I say these things to you, I say them to myself. "Lord, is it I? Is it I?" Some of us part to-night never to meet again. If never before, I now here commit my soul into the keeping of the Lord Jesus Christ. I throw my sinful heart upon His infinite mercy. But some of you will not do that. You will go over to the store to-morrow, and your comrades will say: "Where were you yesterday?" You will say: "I heard Talmage preach, and I don't believe what he preaches." And you will go on and die in your sins.

A SOLEMN FAREWELL.

Feeling that you are bound unto death eternal I solemnly take leave of you. Be careful of your health, for when your respiration gives out all your good times will have ended. Be careful in walking near a scaffold, for one falling brick or stone might usher you into the great eternity for which you have no preparation. A few months, or weeks, or days, or hours will pass on, and then you will see the last light, and hear the last music, and have the last pleasant emotion, and a destroyed eternity will rush upon you. Farewell, oh doomed spirit. As you shove off from hope, I wave you this last salutation. Oh, it is hard to part for ever and for ever! I bid you one long, last, bitter, eternal adieu!

THE IMAGE COLOSSUS.

By Professor J. C. Randolph.

(From the Restitution.)

The Image of the Vision—The Four World-Empires—Their Respective Characteristics—The Present Time Indicated—In the Feet—The Ten Toes Forming—The Descent of the Little Stone—Numerous Independent Conformations—Approaching Physical Convulsions—The Loftier Calculus.

IN the second chapter of Daniel we have a view of the four great empires of the world. These are called universal, and they give us a very clear idea of in relation to events of the greatest moment.

The great Image seen in a dream by Nebuchadnezzar, and reproduced to Daniel in Divine vision, exhibited the four great empires that were to precede the time when the saints of the Most High shall possess the kingdom or government of this world, in conjunction with their glorious Head, and reign forever, even forever and ever.

Now, by viewing this Image, and Daniel's exposition and interpretation of its signification, we know very nearly where we stand to-day. He said to King Nebuchadnezzar, These four empires represented by the Image begin with you. "Thou art this head of gold." Then after him a second, denoted by the breast and arms of silver. Then a third kingdom of brass, having rule over all the earth. Finally, the fourth and last, an iron kingdom, subduing all things and breaking to pieces every other kingdom.

THE GOLDEN EMPIRE.

Now, there is no diversity of opinion among Christians about these four empires. It is one of the few things about which all Christendom is agreed. Nebuchadnezzar's empire was the first: "Thou art this head of gold." This was six hundred years before the birth of Christ. This empire stood until Cyrus deflected the current of the Euphrates, marched his army in the bed of the river, passed under the great two-leaved gates of the mighty city of Babylon, surprised the carousing, drunken Belshazzar and his licentious court, slew them all, captured the city, and put an end to the first great empire. This occurred in 535 B.C.

THE SILVER KINGDOM.

From this period dates the rise of the second great empire, the Medo-Persian or silver kingdom. This flourished under nine successive kings: Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius, Xerxes, Artaxerxes, etc., until the time of Artaxerxes III., at which period Alexander the Great hurled his Grecian Phalanx, like the mighty smiting of a thunderbolt, against this second empire, shivered it to atoms, and erected upon its ruins his own colossal empire. This is the third great universal kingdom, and dates from the year 339 before the Christian Era.

THE BRASS AND IRON.

This third empire flourished about two hundred and ten years. Then the hitherto invincible Grecian Phalanx was ground to powder beneath the iron heel of Rome's all-conquering legions. This is the portion of the Image designated by the iron legs and feet, part of iron and part of clay. This is the fourth and last great empire the world will ever see of this description. "The fulness of the Gentiles" will be accomplished under this empire. After the unity is broken it is divided or flattened out, so to speak, like the feet and toes of a human being. We know perfectly well when the Roman Empire lost its unity, or was broken up into what we now see the present nations of Europe to be, since the fall of the old Roman Empire. How exactly the prophet has delineated the character and relations, the one to the other, of the present existing nations of Europe: "Whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken."

The Western Roman Empire ended in A.D. 476, and the Eastern in 1453. We have, therefore, been already living under that period denoted by the feet and toes of the Image not less than four hundred and twenty-five years. But the little stone which was cut out of the mountain without hands was to smite this Image upon his feet.

The great Image is one. It is a unit throughout, though composed of different metals, denoting all phases of worldly, godless, Gentile Empire, and when it is at an end, broken by this little stone, and destroyed, the God of Heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall stand forever. And this shall be done just when Time has carried us to that period denoted by the last extremities of this Image. And even history itself tells us that we are just there now.

THIS ERA INDICATED.

Christ's words in Matthew 24 indicate that we are just there now. The twelve hundred and sixty years during which Jerusalem was given to be trodden down under the feet of the Gentiles proclaims that we are just there now. The twelve hundred and sixty years of the existence of the great Anti-Christian power, now so manifestly waning, groans, like a distant muttering thunder, that we are just there now. The attitude of the "Fourth Beast," as described in the seventh chapter of Daniel, admonishes us that we are just there now. The form of godliness without the power, so strikingly exhibited everywhere throughout the whole of Christendom, proclaims in thunder tones that we are just there now. The certain and unmistakable marks of the "Last Time," given by Peter, by Paul, by Jude, and by John, both in the Apocalypse and in the Epistles, all proclaim to us that we are just there now.

The measurements in the Grand Egyptian Pyramid, if they are rightly understood, seem mathematically to demonstrate that we are just there now—just where this little stone may be certainly expected to smite that great Image, and make it like chaff of the summer threshing-floor, while the little stone itself shall become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth. The manifestly very near close of six thousand years of the world's human history, and the consequent commencement of her seventh thousand, or Sabbatical Millennium, joyfully proclaims in trumpet tones that we are just stepping upon its glorious threshold now.

"The Times of the Gentiles," these seven years of years, or twenty-five hundred and twenty years, "the seven times," the double of the time, times, and half a time, the double of the forty-two months, or of the twelve hundred and sixty years, prominently figuring in Daniel, in the Apocalypse, and elsewhere, all admonish us that we are just upon the very threshold of the most stirring and tremendous events of the people of God and for the whole world.

The wonderful astronomical cycles, so marvelously denoted by Daniel and John, hundreds of years in advance of all the world's astronomers, foreshadow to us the most commotions, and probable convulsions, as they culminate in the most remarkable manner in the very near future. For let us remember that it is the same Great Creator that has given the Times and Seasons and Laws and Periods to all these vast rolling heavenly bodies, who has likewise appointed and adjusted the spiritual dispensations to harmonize, interpenetrate, and "work together" with these physical cycles, which so amaze us, as we are able more and more, though it be little by little, to mount up to grasp these mighty astronomical periods, one rising above and beyond the other, more and more mighty and glorious, until our earthly mathematics break down and succumb, and are all inadequate to frame and embrace the vast equation of this spirituo-physical harmony.

The converging rays of light from this source also forewarn the astronomer of the most stirring physical phenomena in the very near future. They may be of one character or of another—his experience is too limited, his field of vision too narrow, for him with any degree of certainty to say just what may be expected. For it requires the aid of that Higher Mathematics, that Loftier Equation, to embrace the portending events of the near, the mighty, the wonderful future. We know that Daniel and John were not led to strike these marvellous key-notes in astronomy accidentally, and without having events in the direct line of their thought of a spiritual and higher character, corresponding in their magnitude and importance to the lofty region in which they were moving.

Is it possible to overlook the manifest fact that we are now for more than four hundred years living in the period denoted by the feet and toes of Nebuchadnezzar's great four-metalled Image? We must, therefore, be far out toward the toes. But the little stone cut out of the mountain—Messiah's kingdom—will strike this Image on the feet. "In the days of these kings will the God of Heaven set up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed, and the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom and possess the kingdom forever." This kingdom is Christ's glorious millennial reign over all the earth. There is no millennium taught in the Scriptures till Christ comes. This is the grand purpose for which He comes out from "within the veil."

A VALEDICTORY MISSIONARY MEETING.

THE recent visit to this country of the Rev. H. Grattan Guinness and the partnership established here in his missionary work, render the following details especially interesting to American readers: On Tuesday evening, June 30th, a meeting was held at the Missionary Institute, managed by Mr. Guinness, to bid farewell to a number of outgoing missionaries. There was a large attendance of influential friends. The Rev. H. Grattan Guinness, in opening the proceedings, said they were about to bid God-speed to those students who were leaving for various parts of the mission field. The number of students which had been received into the institute during the year had been large. They had sent out during that period fifty missionaries, seventeen of whom had been located in Europe, eight in Asia, eleven in Africa, eleven in the Territories of the United States, one in Canada, and three in the Australian Colonies. They were in correspondence with three hundred and twenty brethren now laboring in various parts of the world who had passed through the Institute.

Mr. Guinness then gave an address on "Today's Duty in the Light of the Second Advent," in which he spoke of the imminent second coming of our Lord, and its practical bearing upon Christian duty. Without going fully into the question as to what the Second Advent is, he said Holy Scripture justified him in believing in its nearness. As to the nearness of the Great Day, there was not a shadow of doubt. The Book of Revelation, he said, should be studied in connection with the Book of Daniel. Daniel, so to speak, is the First John, and John is the Second Daniel—they are so intimately connected.

In the wonderful prophetic programme there is an outline of the course of the Gentile nations, of the Jewish people, and all that relates to them. In the prediction given of the Gentile nations it is foretold that there were to arise four great monarchies, to be followed by a fifth of another kind—the kingdom of God. This is the great prophetic programme as regards the story of the Gentile monarchies in relation to the kingdom of God, and this was given at the commencement of the dispersion of the Jewish people under Gentile power twenty-five hundred years ago. You know that these four monarchies are represented (gold, silver, etc.), and how they are interpreted, and how "the stone cut out of the mountain without hands" breaks them in pieces. There is nothing ing dubious, perplexing, or uncertain here. We are in the presence of divinely-revealed facts.

At an interesting meeting in the grounds, after tea, it was announced that several ladies were going out, and some of these, at the request of Mr. Glennie, stood up, that the company might obtain a glimpse of them. It appears that ten have already gone out, and ten more are about to follow their brave sisters' example. He said several ladies were going to labor in Morocco, Algeria, Sahara, Tripoli, and Barca, and mentioned that in Algeria there were three hundred villages, and in a large number of them no pastors were seen at work, and therefore the need of those who were going out. The chairman then cordially shook hands with the missionaries about to leave for Calabar, Cape Colony, and China.

FAITH-HEALING CONFERENCES.

At a recent International Conference in England, Miss Tuckett said: "Ten years ago, when I was a hopeless cripple, the Lord said, 'I will heal you,' and gave me Mark 11:24. Upon it I lived, laid aside my crutches, arose from my bed, and walked in the name of the Lord."

The Rev. Miles Grant, of Chicago, said: "As a student of prophecy I am convinced that this holiness and healing movement is a preparation for the second coming of our Lord. We are standing on the very borders of glory-land. At a holiness convention in America I put all on the altar, and God has kept me in perfect peace from that hour till now. I was once called to pray with and anoint a lady in the last stage of consumption. I almost shrank from it, but the next morning I met her out walking."

Miss M. W. Gordon testified to the fact that in Nashville, Tenn., where now she preaches a full Gospel salvation for soul and body, multitudes come to hear—ministers of various denominations, Catholics and Jews; and added: "We have not yet come up to the full privilege of sons of God. We have only tasted of the fountain of life. Let us drink more, that more may overflow to others."

Miss E. M. Moorhead told how she had rejected the doctrine of healing until she was shown that James 5:14, 15, was not only a prescription, but a command, in opposition to which she had been living all her life. She was startled at the discovery, felt it was time she obeyed the command, and deliberately gave her body to Christ to care for, as she had done her soul. The next morning the blessing came; first, a spiritual blessing, an earnest hunger for the Bible, which she had not been able to read for four or five years. It has been a new book to her since. Everything has been new. Then came the healing of a fibroid tumor of twenty years' standing, and then restored sight to one of her eyes which had been blind from birth.

Mrs. Staveley, of Liverpool, told how at one time she was always giving, consecrating herself to the Lord, never receiving. She had indeed received pardon, but had stopped in the middle of 1 John 1:9. Some time ago, however, she accepted that the latter half of that verse should be made true to her, and later on she accepted the indwelling of the Holy Ghost (John 20:22) as a Person, Teacher, Guide, Comforter; and from that time her life had been a letting Him do everything.

Miss Davies, of Liverpool, told how for many years she "struggled and wrestled to win" cleansing of soul and healing of the body. At last she was brought to accept both by faith, and was filled with abiding peace and joy.

Miss E. T. Cleaver, of Birmingham, gave a very practical testimony to the power of healing to the chairman—the crutch on which she had depended for twenty years. She was healed in the anointing meeting on Wednesday.

At Edinburgh Miss Johnston, from Belfast, related how, when she was suddenly healed by faith, she felt the heavenly healing power pass gently from the crown of her head, through her whole body to the soles of her feet, driving out all weakness. She had since laid hands on sick persons and in some cases they had marvelously recovered.

At Glasgow Mr. Weir, suffering from shortness and weakness of sight, was led, in dependence upon Christ as the healer, to throw away his spectacles (which had cost a guinea) and to be anointed for recovery. His eyes became at once strong and able to see as well as formerly with spectacles.

Mrs. Baxter at one of the meetings quoted numerous passages from the Scriptures showing how completely Jesus Christ gave Himself up to the Holy Ghost, not striving to do anything for Himself, the Father doing the works and speaking the words through Him. That is what God wants us to do—to yield ourselves up to Him. She quoted numerous passages showing the marked connection between God's healing of the soul and healing of the body, especially Psalm 103:3; Isaiah 33:24; James 5:14, 15; Job 33:14-33. She also referred to Matthew 8:17: "He bore our sicknesses." Why? That He might heal all that were sick; it was His own word. She gave an account of her own cure from bodily infirmity. She had been suffering for years with intense pain in the head, because the blood was too weak to supply the brain. She heard of the Lord's healing, and was very prejudiced against it; she could not understand this redemption of the body. After a conversation with Pastor Stockmayer, who pointed out to her those words in the 8th chapter of Matthew, her captiousness gave way, and she was suddenly and completely cured.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Woman with a Basket.—At a recent meeting an evangelist said: "I noticed a woman who used to attend some of my meetings regularly, and saw that she always slipped out before the after-meeting. She always carried a small basket upon her arm, and I had a very good idea—at least I thought I had—for what purpose she carried the basket. One night she stayed until the after-meeting, and I went and spoke to her. She told me she was not a Christian, but that she wanted to be. I put the Gospel before her, when she most willingly accepted Christ. After she had done so, I said, 'Now you will not have to carry your basket.' No, she responded, 'I will not have to carry it any more, for,' she explained, 'I carried it to prevent the neighbors knowing that I attended a gospel meeting; but now, my own heart is so full of joy that I wish everybody had it as well as I.'"

A Very Common Mistake.—Professor Lindsay said: "When we were conducting meetings in a parish of Dumfriesshire there were two young women who used to attend them regularly, one of whom came to ask, as she called it, a very difficult question. She could not believe that there was anything more needed to ensure her eternal safety than to go to church on Sunday, teach in a Sunday-school, read her Bible regularly, and lead a respectable and quiet life; for she said, 'I thought all these things made a Christian.' I turned to Acts 10:43, and read: 'Whosoever believeth on Him shall receive remission of sins.' Ah, dear friends, this is only too often a very common mistake. People think that by their good deeds they will obtain salvation, but nothing short of having your sins washed away by the precious blood of Christ will do."

Miriam and Her Father.—Mr. Larkin observed: "God afflict people in many different ways for the purpose of bringing them to Himself. I knew a gentleman whom God brought to Himself in a strange way. One time when he was unwell he was lying on the sofa when his little girl of four years of age came running into the room, and going softly up to the sofa, she put her arms round his neck, and kissing him, said: 'I have been praying to the Lord to make you well, and I know He will do it; may I read something to you, papa?' 'Yes, my darling,' answered her father, 'if you wish to.' Opening her Testament she read in Luke 18:17: 'Verily I say unto you, Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child shall in no wise enter therein.' Shutting the Testament, she said: 'Now I hope that will do you good, papa,' and left the room. But he resisted the strivings of God's Holy Spirit for four years, though spoken to him through his own little child. At that time he was standing by the death-bed of little Miriam. God was knocking in another way now at the door of his heart; his darling Miriam was being taken from him. Slowly the short life was ebbing away, when she opened her eyes and said, 'Papa, I am soon going to heaven, and I will tell Jesus that mamma and sisters are coming; and, papa, may I tell Jesus that you are coming?' With these words the little head dropped upon her father's hand. The child-spirit had winged its way to heaven, and as the father looked at the dear head lying on his outstretched hand he seemed to hear her reading the verse she had read four years before. Tears of sorrow rushed from his eyes, and laying the child gently back on the pillow, he knelt down by the bedside and poured out his heart to God, pleading for mercy, and finding forgiveness with the loving and all-sufficient Saviour."

Converted in a Bottle-House. Mr. Newby said: "One Sunday I went into a mission hall, when the preacher spoke from John 3:16, but I was not in the slightest degree impressed by his discourse. I remained to the second meeting, for what reason I do not know. But a hand was leading me, which I knew not, to the point where the arrow could reach my soul. A lad came and sat down by my side and began to talk to me about my soul. 'Have you a mother?' he asked. 'Yes,' I replied. 'If your mother was going to die to-night, would you die to save her?' 'No,' I replied, for I thought if my mother died she would be saved, but I would be lost. I rose and left the hall, and for the first time in my life I became truly afraid. I wandered about in a state of indescribable anxiety, and then went into a bottle-house. The one question burning in my soul was, 'What if you should die to-night.' Thus moved by fear—the lowest of all motives—I was being prepared to receive the salvation of God. 'O Jesus,' I cried in my despair, 'if Thou wilt take me as a sinner, I will serve Thee all the days of my life; and oh! the sense of relief which at that moment passed over my soul.'"

A Burden Lifted Off. Mr. Newby said: "I was one time addressing a meeting where there were over a hundred present, the greater part of whom had already got the blessing of salvation. Among the few who had not done so was a woman. From the platform I could observe that during the speaking she was weeping very bitterly. She was evidently in great distress. I made my way to where she sat, and said: 'What is the matter?' 'Oh, sir,' she said, 'I feel I have a burden here, laying her hand upon her heart. 'What do you think that is?' I asked. 'My sin.' 'Well, how are you to get rid of it?' Her only reply was a fresh burst of tears. I then took my Bible, and turning to Isaiah 53:6, I read: 'All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.' I asked her to look on the Book and see it for herself. As she looked, I pointed out the two alls—the one referring to our state, the other to Christ's work for us. I asked her if she believed the first. 'Yes,' she said. 'I do.' Then, said I, pointing to the second all, 'do you believe that?' To this question she gave no reply. After a little while I said, 'You are just to do with this latter statement as you did with the first; the same faith that receives the one will receive the other.' I saw a change pass over her countenance, and I started the hymn, Oh, happy day, that fixed my choice On Thee, my Saviour and my God! Standing up, she joined me with all her heart, the tears meanwhile running down her cheeks, but they were no longer tears of sorrow."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Death of General Grant on Thursday last dwarfs every other event of the week into insignificance. It was not until Tuesday that the close of the long and painful illness seemed imminent. About noon on that day the General grew alarmingly weak. He had been out for a ride on the previous day, and had returned feeling weary and tired; but the night had been a good one, and on Tuesday morning he seemed as well as usual. Dr. Douglass was summoned when the weakness manifested itself, and tried to induce him to take brandy and a little food; but the General refused both. He wrote that he felt that he was sinking; that the limit of his strength had been reached. It was time for him to go, and there was no use battling longer. A little morphine was given him, and he fell asleep. He rallied a little during the evening, but passed a restless night. On Wednesday morning he seemed brighter, but his fluttering pulse and rapid breathing showed that weakness was increasing. His son Ulysses and Drs. Shady and Sands were sent for, and came on by special train to Mt. McGregor. Once the General roused himself, and that was for a characteristic purpose. Hearing the sound of weeping near his chair, he took his pad and wrote: "I don't want anybody to feel distressed on my account." That has been the tenor of his thought throughout his illness; the chief wish with him was to spare the feelings of his devoted wife and children. It appears now that both to his physicians and to General Badeau he stated that he knew he must soon die. About seven o'clock in the evening of Wednesday he became restless, and indicated a wish to lie down. He was assisted to his cot, from which he never rose again. He remained conscious, but his pulse had quickened, and by midnight his extremities were growing cold. After three o'clock on Thursday morning, when he whispered a request for water, he never spoke. He lay quite still, with his eyes closed, and seemed to be free from pain, and almost unconscious. His wife, his three sons, and his daughter, Mrs. Sartoris, were gathered around the bed, conscious that the last minutes of the General's life were passing. The breath grew fainter and the face more leaden as they watched him, until finally, at eight minutes past eight, the breath ceased, and the illustrious sufferer was dead.

The Arrangements for the Funeral of the President have not been completed at the time of writing. It has, however, been intimated that the illustrious General will be interred in New York. Immediately after receiving intelligence of the death, the Mayor of New York telegraphed to Colonel Fred Grant, offering any of the city parks as a burial-place, and the offer has been accepted. It is expected that General Grant will be buried in Central Park, near the Mall, and that an imposing monument, worthy of his name and fame, will be erected there, at the expense of the city. Efforts have been made to have the remains taken to Washington for sepulture, but General Grant had himself expressed a preference for New York. So far back as June 24th he gave his son a slip of paper on which he had written suggestions of three places—West Point, Galena, Ill., and New York City. Of the last he wrote, with the fine, grateful touch that distinguished him: "New York, because the people of that city befriended me in my need." The one stipulation which he made, which was to decide in any case, was that no burial-place should be accepted in which Mrs. Grant could not be laid beside him. The Soldiers' Home had been suggested, but the General vetoed that on the ground that there might be difficulties in the way of Mrs. Grant being buried there. The President telegraphed his condolence to the family, and ordered the Federal buildings throughout the Union put in mourning. All the public offices, the newspaper offices, and the bulk of the stores are accordingly draped, and it is no unmeaning sign, for in every State, North and South, there is sincere sorrow among all classes, and a sense of national bereavement.

The Prohibitionists Propose to take a Vigorous part in the approaching election in New York. Mr. Alphonse A. Hopkins, who was the candidate of the party for the governorship three years ago, made a statement of the intentions of the party last week in the New York Times. He said that the State Convention would be held at Syracuse on September 8th. Fifty at least of the sixty counties of the State would be represented. About seven hundred delegates are expected. As to the prospects of the campaign, Mr. Hopkins said: "We are not only better organized this year, but we have an ampler financial basis, a far abler literature than formerly, and more platform ability at our command. We have a volunteer lecture bureau, which has agreed to contribute at least one thousand lectures, in which some of the ablest speakers in the cause will address our audiences. They will come from Maine and from the West. The National Prohibition Committee will not co-operate with us financially, though such other assistance as it can afford will be given to us. We ask no favors from either Democrats or Republicans." We notice that Dr. Talmage is spoken of as the candidate for the governorship, but the Convention will probably ascertain his views before making such a nomination. He has too much sense to accept it.

The Investigation of the London Scandals by the distinguished committee appointed by the Pall Mall Gazette continues. It is expected that the report will be ready at the close of this week. In a letter to the New York Sun, Mr. Henry Varley, who is at Niagara, says: "For two years past a goodly number of us who reside in London have been doing our best to drag into the light the facts which are now made public. I sincerely trust we have only begun. I regard this first attack as a preliminary skirmish to a terrific war. I speak that which I know. I have in my possession a list of the names of the royal princes, dukes, nobles, and leading men who have been the principal patrons and supporters of the gilded hells kept by such women as the notorious Mrs. Jeffery, whose name occupied so prominent a position in the recent trials. I have a list of the houses, the streets in which they are, their numbers, and their situation. I am in a position to reveal a large number of the names, and will give them if necessity requires. Should any conspiracy of silence be attempted, and unless the guilt is brought home to its authors, and they are tried and punished, I, for one, promise to disclose the names and facts which are in my possession."

A Royal Marriage Produced a Ripple of Excitement in England last week. On Thursday last the Princess Beatrice, the youngest of the Queen's children, a lady in her twenty-ninth year, was married to Prince Henry of Battenberg. The union does not appear to please the popular taste. The more outspoken English journals complain of having "another German pauper" brought over for the nation to support. Prince Henry does not seem to be exactly a pauper, as he has a military appointment worth $2000 a year, and his father allows him $1250 in addition; but it is probable that an office or two in the British establishment will be expected for him, besides the pension of $30,000 a year which Parliament has voted to his bride. The Prince does not speak English, a fact which does not say much for the intelligence or industry of a young man marrying an English bride. The Prince of Wales and the other members of the royal family disapprove of the marriage, and the Queen had to give the bride away herself. The ceremony was conducted with considerable pomp, and the bride, who is deservedly popular, received many presents besides those given as a matter of routine and duty.

The Administration of Irish Affairs by Earl Spencer, the ex-viceroy, though more unpopular with Irishmen than any of its predecessors, has been indorsed by several prominent statesmen. At a banquet given to Lord Spencer, on July 24th, the Marquis of Hartington, who presided, warmly eulogized him. Earl Spencer, replying, said he had tried to do his duty to his sovereign and his country fearlessly in the sight of the world. He said that the Crimes act was justified when passed, by the presence in Ireland of thirty thousand Fenians, who were aided by members of Parliament from England and Scotland and by funds from America in resisting the laws of the land. About two hundred Liberal members of Parliament were present. Mr. Chamberlain and other Radicals were conspicuous by their absence. The banquet accentuates the difference notoriously existing among Mr. Gladstone's followers.

The March of the Cholera in Spain Continues unchecked. The European correspondent of the New York Times cables that of all the provinces of Spain only fourteen are free from the cholera, which visited eight new provinces during the week. The total of deaths is now over twenty-five thousand. Refugees are swarming over the Pyrenees, dismaying the French, who are doing all that is possible to prevent the invasion by enforcing quarantines and confiscating baggage by the wholesale. The suffering in rural Spain is heart-rending. From Marseilles we have a report that it is the medical belief that numerous places are infected, but there is a grand conspiracy of suppression and silence. The physicians are counting the hours now before the outbreak in the South of France becomes too serious to be concealed.

Serious Labor Troubles in the German Capital are reported. The masons and bricklayers throughout the city struck against a reduction of wages; they have, in the majority of cases, forced the employers to yield. The committee of the workmen asserts that the masons have secured more concessions than were expected. It justifies the strike, but complains bitterly of the interference of the authorities in favor of the employers. Many instances are given of this interference. It is even declared that the Berlin Post Office Department attempted to defeat the strike by intercepting sums of money sent to the assistance of the strikers by sympathizers from different parts of the empire. Despite the virtual ending of the contest, building in Berlin remains practically suspended.

An Excellent Work is being Performed in connection with Holy Trinity Church, New York. A fund has been raised by members of the church, to which one lady has contributed a large proportion, to give a much-needed change of air to poor women and children. A house has been rented in a healthy location on Long Island Sound, at a cost of fifty dollars a month. A party of fourteen children and their mothers are taken there every Saturday for a week of pure sea air, good nourishing food, and the free run of an acre of grass land, and an orchard. The cost of the work for the summer will be only $1800, owing to the excellent economical management of the ladies' committee. We cannot speak too highly of this noble work, which in its spirit is essentially Christ-like. The ladies of Holy Trinity have set an example which we hope will be extensively followed. No one can go through the foul streets of the city without being convinced that a week of pure air would save the lives of some who without it will perish.

The Tenth Congress of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States will be held at New Haven, Conn., commencing Tuesday, October 20th. The sessions will be held in the Opera House, and the devotional services, with the communion, probably at Trinity Church. Rev. John Williams, D.D., LL.D., of Connecticut, will preside. The several topics are as follows: Tuesday, Communion and address; Inaugural and memorial address; "The Christian Doctrine of the Atonement," Wednesday, "Grounds of Church Unity," "Ethics of the Tariff Question," Thursday, "Aestheticism in Worship," "Free Churches," Friday, "Deaconesses and Sisterhoods," "Place and Methods of Bible Study in the Christian Life." The list of writers and speakers embrace some of the most eminent men among the clergy and laity in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

An Accident to Miss Frances E. Willard, the President of the Women's National Christian Temperance Union, we regret to see, is announced by the New York Witness. It states that Miss Willard has broken her arm, and it will be necessary for her to remain in retirement for some time. Miss Willard was enjoying the tricycle exercise, when her tricycle struck a stone and upset. We trust that Miss Willard will soon recover, and be able to resume her valuable labors; and, if we may, venture the suggestion, that she will dispose of her tricycle to some one whose life and limbs are not so valuable as hers to the public interest.

A Banker's Opinion on the Effect of the Prohibition law in Iowa is given in a letter to the Voice. Mr. W. A. McHenry, of Denison, Iowa, believes that it has improved the condition of the poor. He says: "Prohibition has noticeably increased the bank savings of the poor of this place. The law has not caused more home-drinking, nor transferred the trade to drug-stores and street-peddlers. As to shipments from outside States, I have only to say that the extent to which the law is enforced depends upon the temperance people of the several localities. You may depend upon it, it will not enforce itself. The late court rulings declaring a saloon a nuisance has badly staggered the liquor interest, but effectual Prohibition can only be attained through Federal as well as State enactments. The threats of outside liquor men may have influenced the authorities in some localities, but they belong to the class of politicians who would never help temperance under any circumstances. It has always been my idea that temperance should be kept separate from politics. I am a Republican." Other bankers say that the law has had no good effect in their cities. It is evident that the law is enforced in some places more stringently than in others.

A Fortune in an Old Desk was Discovered recently in Raleigh, N. C. The News of that city says that twenty years ago a prominent citizen of Raleigh purchased an old desk. He after a while ceased to use it, and a few days ago broke it up. To his surprise he discovered a secret drawer. Out of this fell piles of money. Some of the bills were moth-eaten and dingy, while others were fresh and clear. There were thousands of dollars of the currency. It was in many cases issued under the authority of Congress, in session at Halifax, N. C. The denominations of the bills were from $2 to $50. In some the value was expressed in pounds, shillings, and pence. It was all what was known as "Continental currency," and must have been placed in the secret repository during or just after the Revolutionary War. This man is not the first who has possessed a treasure without knowing it. It is easy to see that many Christians are in like case. The treasures they possess in Christ are inexhaustible, but they are often wholly undiscovered (Rev. 3: 18).

A Cure for Nervousness was Applied by a noted physician, at Hartford, Conn., with perfect success, as described in the Hartford Times last week. The physician was consulted by an elderly lady, who imagined that her heart, lungs, and liver were all disordered. Yet he found them sound. She had no organic disease, except nervousness, and that was enough. "I can cure you," said the physician; "I understand the case." He gave her six bread pills—not a particle of medicine in them. He said: "Take one to-night, one to-morrow night, half of one each night the next two nights. Then split the others in quarters, and take one fourth of a pill every morning till all are used up—but do not on any account take any more on any day than I have ordered; it will be dangerous. But by following my directions precisely you will be entirely well when all the pills are taken." The woman had faith in him, and she got well, as he had predicted. It was not the dough rolled into pills that cured her; it was her confidence in the skill and wisdom of her physician. So it is with spiritual disease, which is by no means imaginary. The nostrums of philosophy, and the pretended absolution of priests fail, but faith in the Great Physician is always followed by healing (Isa. 53: 5).

A Lady's Diary for Invitations only, is Said, by a fashionable stationer in New York, to be one of the articles now in demand, and he is sending them out to all the watering-places in compliance with orders received by every mail. The book is ruled with a blank space opposite each day, and the headline is "Invitations." Unlike the ordinary diary, it extends from July 1st, 1885, to June 30th, 1886. The book is to contain memoranda of invitations to attend dinners, parties, and other alluring things of the fashionable sphere received months in advance, and which it would be a gross breach of the proprieties to forget. The stationer predicts that the next winter season will be unparalleled in this line of entertainment by the extremely rich. Even now invitations are being sent out thick and fast, and engagements made for events seemingly far enough away in this hot weather. The book will doubtless have a large sale, as it will save people with weak memories from offending their hosts by forgetting to keep their engagements. That is a well-understood risk in society, but people seem not to realize that it exists in matters of the soul. They think it will be time enough to accept God's invitation when they get old or are sick (II Cor. 6: 2).

A General's Magnanimity Toward a Fallen foe touchingly illustrates the wise king's remark about "the coals of fire" (Prov. 25: 21, 22). A few days ago a gentleman who fought in the Union army in the war said to a reporter of the Chicago Herald, who asked a question about his military experience: "I was at the battle of Gettysburg. The last day of the fight I was badly wounded. A ball entered my left leg. I lay on the ground not far from the Cemetery Ridge, and as General Lee ordered his last retreat, he and his officers rode near me. As they came along I recognized him, and, though faint from exposure and loss of blood, I raised up on my hands, looked General Lee in the face, and shouted as loud as I could, 'Hurrah for the Union!'" The General heard me, looked, stopped his horse, dismounted, and came toward me. I confess that I at first thought he meant to kill me. But as he came up he looked down at me with such a sad expression upon his face that all fear left me, and I wondered what he was about. He extended his hand to me, and grasping mine firmly, and looking right into my eyes, said: "My son, I hope you will soon be well." "If I live a thousand years I shall never forget the expression in General Lee's face. There he was, defeated, retiring from a field that had cost him and his cause almost their last hope, and yet he stopped to say words like those to a wounded soldier of the opposition who had taunted him as he passed by. As soon as the General had left me I cried myself to sleep there upon the bloody ground." Probably nothing but the unexpected kindness would have drawn those tears, so strangely constituted is the human heart. It has been seen again and again that the obdurate and reckless sinner, unmoved by the appalling prospect of eternal punishment, has been melted and subdued as he heard that Christ loves him still and yearns for his salvation (Rom. 5: 8).

The Trial of a Sea Captain for Barratry was commenced in Boston, Mass., on July 20th. It attracts much interest, as the offence is punishable, under the United States laws, by death. The charge against the captain, which, in legal language, is barratry, is the wilful wrecking of his ship. It is alleged that he entered into a conspiracy with the owners to lose the ship, which had on board a worthless cargo insured for $24,000. It was set forth that the vessel was freighted with what was practically a dummy cargo of fish, rubber shoes, etc., and on a pleasant afternoon in January the vessel was run upon a reef near the port of Miragoane. The Government alleged that the vessel was deliberately run ashore by the captain's orders, the reef being plainly marked on the chart and clearly visible before the ship struck. Even the wheelman could not help seeing it, and changed the course, but was immediately ordered by the captain to set the vessel back upon the course which took her plump upon the centre of the reef. It is worthy of notice that the Government lays emphasis on the fact that the reef is marked on the charts, with which the captain ought to be acquainted. It is so with the moral and spiritual wrecks around us. Those who study the chart with which God has provided men in the Bible learn where the dangerous reefs are, but too often, as in this case, the vessel of life seems to be steered direct for them. But when men are wrecked the cargo is of priceless value, and there is no insurance (Prov. 2: 1-5).

A Bride Seventy-Nine Years Old was Led to the marriage altar a few days ago at East Greenwich, R. I., by a bridegroom exactly her own age. It was stated at the wedding that the engagement thus culminated was made more than half a century ago. The pair had quarrelled and parted when they were young, and they each married another partner, and resided in different sections of the country. Recently they became widow and widower about the same time, and returning to the State in which their youth was spent, they met, and concluded to renew their old relations. The wedding, which was to have taken place fifty years ago, when they were young, was solemnized when the locks of both were white as snow. It seems strange that a love which a trivial lovers' quarrel could thwart for so long a time should survive a separation of fifty years. If, as seems probable, the romantic marriage conduces to their joint happiness, they will regret that their married life must necessarily be so brief. That is the feeling when a sinner late in life gives his heart to the Saviour. The Church is glad to welcome him, even at the eleventh hour, but regrets that the life of service which he might have rendered if converted in his youth is lost to himself and Christ's cause (Ezek. 16: 59-63).

THE LOOKING-GLASS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"For if you be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: for he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was. But whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed."—JAMES I : 23-25.

The Forgetful Hearer—Difference in Hearers—What they Look into—I. Looking into a Glass—A Trivial Business—The Bible a Mirror—An Unflattering Reflection—Very Like Life—Shows the Smuts and Stains—Should Prompt to Washing—A Ledger Like an Avalanche—II. Looking into the Law—The Prince of Hearers—Blessed in his Deed.

LAST Sabbath-day I tried to show the right way of hearing the Word of God. We spoke of how to behave before sermon, at sermon, and after sermon. May God grant that the word which I then spoke may continue in your minds, and bring forth good fruit! At this time I shall draw a distinction between the true and blessed hearer of the Word, and the person who misses the blessing because he hears to forget. You will forgive my coming back to this subject when I confess that I groan in my own heart with unutterable longings to be a channel of blessing to all who hear or read my discourses. To what purpose do I stand here so often, and pour out my soul before you, if you are not the better for it? I am an unhappy sower, if all the handfuls of seed which I scatter must needs fall upon unbroken soil, to be devoured of birds, and never take root.

Two things are very obvious in the text: the first is the hearer of the Word who does not profit by it, and is represented as looking into a glass; and then, secondly, we see the man who does profit by the Word, for he is represented as looking into the perfect law. May the Holy Spirit help us to see these clearly!

I. First, then, here is LOOKING INTO A GLASS.

Looking into a glass is a trivial business. In all ages men, not to say women, have been fond of seeing themselves. In the earlier days they had no reflecting glasses as we now have, but they used mirrors made of brass and kindred metals, highly polished. These mirrors yielded a sufficiently clear image of the beholder. Albeit, the children of Israel came out of Egypt in a great hurry, yet we find that the women carried their looking-glasses with them into the wilderness. (See Ex. 38 : 8.) It was according to their womanly nature: whatever else they forgot they must have the indispensable looking-glass, for the purpose of their toilet. It is to their praise, however, that in the desert their devotion overcame their vanity; for when the brazen laver was to be made in which the priests should wash, it was made of the looking-glasses of the serving-women who were accustomed to meet at the door of the tabernacle.

Still, the use of the mirror must be ranked among the trifles of life: I see that you are half-smiling at the playfulness which glitters around a glass. Is not this a hint at the light in which many regard the hearing of the Gospel? They crowd to hear a preacher if he has some sort of name; not that they desire to get a blessing thereby, but merely that they may say that they have heard him, or that they may gratify their curiosity by seeing what he is like. Truly the burden of our lives is a pastime to some of you. Sirs, this reminds me of the fable of the frogs. When the boys stoned them, the poor creatures said, "It may be sport to you, but it is death to us." You may hear me this day with the idlest curiosity, and judge my message with the coldest criticism; but if you do not receive the blessings of the Gospel, it strikes a chill at my heart. Your unspiritual hearing is sport to you, but it is death to me. Oh, sir, to hear the Gospel will one day appear to be the most solemn of exercises! Indeed, it is not the trivial matter that many make of it; it is infinitely more than gazing into a mirror. How long will it be ere ye know this?

THE BIBLE A MIRROR.

Upon my first head of looking into a glass let me say that to every hearer the true Word of God is as a mirror. The holy Book does not flatter human nature, neither does the true preacher attempt so base a work; but in plain and downright honesty of truth the witness is given, "They are all gone out of the way, they are together become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no, not one." When conscience is aroused, and the man sees himself as the revelation of God declares him to be, he can hardly think that this can be the same self with which he was upon such excellent terms. If God blesses the sight, he is led to abhor himself, and to seek for cleansing and renewal; but if not, the man has at least seen himself, and has had the opportunity of knowing his true state.

The reflection of self in the Word is VERY LIKE LIFE.

You have, perhaps, seen a dog so astonished at his image in the glass that he has barked fiercely at himself. A parrot will mistake its reflection for a rival. Well may the creature wonder, since every one of its movements is so accurately copied; it thinks itself to be mocked. Under a true preacher men are often so thoroughly unearched and laid bare that even the details of their lives are reported. Not only is the portrait drawn to the life, but it is an actually living portrait which is given in the mirror of the Word. There is little need to point with the finger, and say, "Thou art the man," for the hearer perceives of his own accord that he is spoken of. Many a time the hearer has said, "Somebody has told the preacher." Yes, somebody has told him: that which thou doest in thy bedchamber the Lord hath revealed unto His servant. The Holy Spirit guides our hands wittingly, so that we lay them upon the right heads. I have sometimes said to you that people frequently wish that the preacher knew their experience, in order that he could preach to it; but it is not necessary to tell God's sent servant anything about it, for he will speak to you with all the more power because he does not know.

You may go in to hear the sermon, and be wearing a disguise, but even a blind prophet will find you out, and say: "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam, wherefore feignest thou thyself to be another woman? I have heavy tidings from the Lord for thee." The Chaldean soothsayers said to King Nebuchadnezzar, "Tell thy servants the dream, and we will shew thee the interpretation;" but Daniel knew the dream and the interpretation also, and that marked him out as being sent of God. When the preacher's description of the man's heart is true to the life, and yet no human mouth has whispered it into his ears, then the man cries, "This is the finger of God." A great part of the self-evidencing power of the Gospel lies in the way in which it discovers to our minds that which aforesaid lay within our bosoms, hidden even from ourselves.

A SPIRITUAL REVELATION.

The glass of the Word is not like our ordinary looking-glass, which merely shows us our external features; but, according to the Greek of our text, the man sees in it "the face of his birth"—that is, the face of his nature. He that reads and hears the Word may see not only his actions there, but his motives, his desires, his inward condition. Oftentimes he sees himself so plainly that he grows astonished at what he sees. He cries, like the woman of Samaria, "Come, see a man that told me all things that ever I did." Barbarous people, when they first of all see looking-glasses, are quite taken aback. "How can these things be?" is their first question. Now, have not you, dear hearers, who are unconverted, been often staggered at the home-thrusts of the Word? You have seen yourselves so unmistakably that you have been unable to escape from the truth, but have been filled with wonder at it. But what is the use of this, if it goes no further?

Such observers have been known to praise the excellence of the mirror, and speak well of its faithfulness. You may hear them say, "The man is a true servant of God, and preaches in all honesty and courage." So far, so good. Alas! there are many preachers who will win no such praise. As I have seen glasses which have elongated my face or broadened it, so that it was by no means my true image, so have I known ministers whose description of human nature is flattering and false. But after all, if the face is not to be washed, to what purpose is it that the mirror faithfully shows the smuts and stains which are upon it? Oh, my hearers, I desire to be always faithful to you, but how will my faithfulness benefit you if you are not faithful to yourselves? Why should I show you your blots if you do not seek to the Lord Jesus to have them removed?

Many of our hearers go somewhat further, for they are driven to make solemn resolves after looking at themselves. Yes, they will break off their sins by righteousness; they will repent; they will believe on the Lord Jesus; and yet their fine resolves are blown away like smoke, and come to nothing. The sight of their natural face leads to a natural resolve; but the strength of nature suffices not to carry the resolution into practice. Oh, sir, ye must be born again; and for lack of that new birth your goodness is as a morning cloud and as the early dew; both of these vanish soon, and so do your fine feelings and resolvings.

EFFACED IMPRESSIONS.

But what follows? Observe, "He beheldeth himself, and goeth his way." The sermon was over when it was over. Many a man, having seen himself in the glass of the Word, has no time for any further thought about himself. Tomorrow morning he will be over head and ears in business; the shutters will be down from his shop-windows, but they will be put up to the windows of his soul. His office needs him, and therefore his prayer-closet cannot have him; his ledger falls like an avalanche over his Bible. The man has no time to seek the true riches; passing trifles monopolize his mind. Sirs, ye call earthly things "business," but the salvation or the damnation of your souls is such a trifling matter that any stray hour will suffice for it. Is it not so? Do you not propose to put off the Lord till your last gasp? The Lord deliver you from this madness! Oh, that you would no more allow your earthly business to crush your souls!

Others have no particular business to engross them, but having seen themselves in the glass of the Word with some degree of interest, they go their way to their amusements. Their principal difficulty is how to kill time and spin the weary hours away. What will become of some of you who are going down to perdition with all your time to spare? You will not be able to say that you went your way to your farm, and to your merchandise, for you have neither farm nor merchandise, and do not know what to do with your time; and yet for all that you cannot spare an hour to think upon your souls and upon your God. Oh, that it were not so! May infinite mercy make men wiser than to go their way while their souls are going down to hell!

AN AWFUL THING.

Alas! there are some who go their way to sin. It is not mere pleasure, or business, but it is an overt act of transgression to which they go. It is an awful thing to my mind that men go from hearing the Word of God to speaking the word of the devil; they go from God's house to the house of sin; they go straight away from the holy to the profane, from the pure to the foul. They go from the mercy-seat to the seat of the scorner. I do not wonder that no good comes of such hearing as this.

This coming away is followed by forgetting all they have seen. This forgetfulness of the Word leads to self-satisfaction. Looking in the glass the man felt a little startled that he was such an ugly fellow, but he went his way and mingled with the crowd, and forgot what manner of man he was, and therefore he felt quite easy again. The sweep thinks he is as clean as his neighbors, for he has forgotten the soot upon his face. By the force of sheer ignorance a man can climb to a desperately false assurance of his own excellence. He can cry "Peace, peace," when there is no peace, till at length a blast of trumpets will not alarm him. What can be more fatal than this? One may as well not know, as only learn and straightway forget.

Thus have I sketched the hearer of the Word who is not a doer of it. I do not wish personally to apply this to any one here, but I beg that every person who does not know the Lord will make a personal application of it to his own conscience.

II. May I have your further attention while I speak upon the true and blessed hearer? He does not look into the glass, but he is represented as

LOOKING INTO THE LAW:

"Whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed." Note well that the law of God is worth looking into. I understand by the "law" here not merely the law of ten commandments, but the law as it is condensed, fulfilled, and exhibited in Christ Jesus. The Gospel law, the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, that Gospel which we are called upon to obey, is worthy of deep meditation; I mean that holy law which the Lord has promised to put into our inward parts and write upon our hearts—the law of faith and not of self-righteousness, even the command of grace which bids us believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and obey His commands. A law is always worth considering, for we may break the law unwittingly, and involve ourselves in penalties which we might have avoided.

The true hearer looks into this perfect law of liberty with all his soul, heart, and understanding, till he knows it, and feels the force of it in his own character. He is who delights to know what God's will is, and finds his joy in acting out the same. He sees the law in its height of purity, breadth of comprehensiveness, and depth of spirituality, and the more he sees the more he admires. He cannot have too much of it, but meditates in it both day and night, and hence he cries, "Oh, how I love thy law! it is my meditation all the day." His most frequent prayer is that he may be conformed unto that perfect law in all respects; and in proportion as his prayer is heard he enters into perfect rest. I pause and ask you whether you belong to the blessed company who look into the crystal glass of the law. If you can answer that you are such, then please follow me for a minute or two.

As I stand here I look into the mirror of the Word and see myself. But this is not enough for me: I will look till I see more. I continue looking into the mystic glass until, to my great surprise, I see another form appearing. Evidently some mysterious Personage is reflected in this mirror. How beautiful and majestic is the Stranger's visage! I look till the image of my countenance melts into the reflection of His countenance, and He alone is seen. I only appear in Him. Is He not lovely? Indeed He is the Chief among ten thousand. Now I see the meaning of that word, "We all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

"This is the thankful glass,
That mends the looker's eyes; this is the well
That washes what it shows."

Surely this is the mirror that Mercy, in "The Pilgrim's Progress," longed for. Does not Bunyan say of it, "Now the glass was one of a thousand." It would present a man one way, with his own features exactly; and turning it another way it would show one the very face and similitude of the Prince of Pilgrims Himself. Yea, I have talked with them that can tell, and they have said that they have seen the very crown of thorns upon His head by looking in that glass. They have therein also seen the holes in His hands, in His feet, and His side."

OTHER REFLECTIONS SEEN.

Ay, and he that looks into that perfect law will, by-and-by, see God the Father; for the pure in heart shall see God. Those who love and live the law of God become like unto God; they are "imitators of God as dear children." They that are familiar with God's will, and love it, and study it, gradually receive the likeness of God their Father till they are called the children of God.

Note, carefully that our text says, "he continues,"—"whoso looketh into the perfect law of liberty and continueth." Our translators insert the word "therein;" but it is not in the Greek text. "And continueth"—that is, he continues to meditate in the law, and he continues to own his allegiance to it. The law of the Lord is always law to him. This is the hearer that shall win the blessing: not you who make a profession one day and then disgrace it the next; not you who are all hot for Christ to-day and lukewarm to-morrow. The man who obtains the blessing of the Lord is by God's grace made to continue in it. I have heard of of Poland who did brave deeds in his day, and confessed that he owed his excellent character to a secret habit which he had formed. He was the son of a noble father, and he carried with him a miniature portrait of this father, and often looked upon it. Whenever he went to battle he would look upon the picture of his father and nerve himself to valor. When he sat in the council-chamber he would secretly look upon the image of his father, and behave himself right royally; for he said, "I will do nothing that can dishonor my father's name." Now, this is the grand thing for a Christian to do: to carry about with him the will of God in his heart, and then in every action to consult that will.

It is well to have Christ's portrait hung up in every chamber of your soul; I do not say of your house—that might lead to idolatry; but in every chamber of your mind and heart. I once saw a room so covered with mirrors that when I looked I saw myself some fifteen times, certainly to my taste fourteen times too often. But oh, I would have my whole being to be such that whenever Jesus comes into it He may see Himself everywhere—above, below, to the right, to the left, and on all sides! Oh, to have Him shining even into the innermost closet of our nature, so as to have no part dark! Oh, to become new editions of the life of Christ! We would not only look into the mirror, but we would be ourselves mirrors, reflecting the beauties of the holy Lord Jesus. But remember, this must not be occasional, but continual; for the true heart continues looking into the perfect law of liberty.

THE BLESSING.

To conclude: you notice how it says, "this man shall be blessed in His deed." "Oh," saith one, "I do not see the blessedness of true religion." No, my friend, you are not likely to see it, because you do not do it. This man is blessed "in his deed." In keeping His commandments there is great reward. Much of the blessedness of godliness lies in the practice of godliness. Not in consideration of doctrine, but in obedience to precept the blessing lies. This man shall be blessed in his deed." In the very fact of serving his Lord and Master he shall be blessed; not for it but in it. The doing of the obedient deed is the evidence that God has blessed the doer from before the foundation of the world.

You who do not get a blessing by hearing the Gospel may now see why it is so. You glance into a looking-glass, and that is all. Much good may it do you! If you had gone to the divine law, that heavenly mirror of the will and mind of the Most High, it had been better for you. Then you would have been blessed in your deed. Behold, I set before you this morning, as they did of old upon Ebal and Gerizim, blessing and curse—the curse for those who peep into the looking-glass, but do no more; the blessing for those who attentively look into the perfect law of liberty, and continue so to do till they are transformed into the image of the Lord! Which shall it be? May God the Eternal Spirit decide that question by leading you now solemnly, seriously, earnestly, to close in with Christ and His perfect law of liberty, and to Him be glory for ever and ever! Amen and amen.

NEW BOOKS, ETC.

"ATHEISM AND ARITHMETIC,"

by H. L. Hastings, is the fifteenth volume of the Anti-Infidel Library, which Mr. Hastings is issuing. It contains chapters on Arithmetic in Plants and Planets; Mathematics in Musical Science; Number in Vital Action. There is considerable ingenuity displayed by the author in tracing out the rule of mathematical law in the universe, from which he draws the conclusion that it could not possibly have been the product of chance. It is possible that such books may do good. There is so wide a variety in the constitution of different minds that it would be rash to conclude that there are no minds that might derive benefit from such a book. It must be admitted, however, that the arguments which Mr. Hastings combats are not those used by the opponents of Christianity in our day; and if they were, we are not sure that this would be the best way of meeting them. Young people who may meet with this book must bear in mind that sometimes the best cause has self-appointed champions who make a poor fight. If they are defeated, the inference should not be drawn that the cause itself is weak. Pp. 63; price, in paper covers, 15 cents. Published by H. L. Hastings, Boston, Mass.

A PORTRAIT OF GENERAL GRANT, sixteen inches by twenty-one inches, has been issued by Mr. E. B. Treat, 771 Broadway, New York. It is one of the most life-like portraits we have seen of the grand old hero. Mr. Treat informs us that the portrait was taken from a negative for which the General sat to Mr. C. D. Fredericks, the celebrated photographer of New York. It is the same portrait which Mr. Thomas Le Clear used as the basis for his oil-painting of General Grant, which now hangs in the White House. Mr. Treat is selling copies on extra quality steel plate paper, at $1; and is offering a few artist proofs in Indian tint at $3.

"WEIRD TALES,"

by E. T. W. Hoffmann. A new translation from the German, with a Biographical Memoir, by J. T. Bealby, B.A. A sense of profound sadness crosses the mind as we read these two volumes. There is so much to admire, so many evidences of brilliant genius that we lament that which is lacking. What Hoffmann would have been had he embraced Christianity, and had his heart and life been brought under the power of the God-man, we can but conjecture; but unhappily what he was by nature and education is only too evident here. That his magnificent mental gifts fitted him to achieve far more than he ever did achieve is a conclusion which every thoughtful reader will form after reading these wonderful stories. Like Byron, like our own countryman, Poe, Hoffmann missed that which his nature, more than that of common men, urgently needed. "Godliness is profitable for the life that now is," and in the case of men of genius, it is especially profitable, for it directs the mental powers into the course in which they render the greatest service to the world. We know what became of the man who hid his one talent in the earth; we cannot conceive how the servant who had ten talents would have fared had he, not hidden them, but wasted them. It is not for us to judge a man like Hoffmann. Not one harsh or unkind word would we speak of him, but we pity him most profoundly, mourning that so splendid a genius—a star fitted to shine so brilliantly in the world's firmament should have become a mere meteor flashing brightly in our sight, and passing uselessly away.

Mr. Dealy has selected eleven stories from his works, and has translated them directly from the German, instead of retranslating them from the French, as some of Hoffmann's admirers have done. He has done his work, both of selection and translation excellently, and American readers have now an opportunity of learning the style and character of a writer about whom so little at first hand is known. The variety of the stories is charming in itself, and it is especially valuable because it helps the reader to form a more perfect conception of Hoffmann's literary power. The stories are not all "weird" as the word is generally understood, but some of them are not of the character that would tend to give a child pleasant dreams, or make the minutes passed in the dark before falling asleep very agreeable. Pp. 760; price, $3. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons.

Chief of the I.O.G.T. of Wales.

MR. DANIEL, whose portrait appears on this page, is a marvel of energy, activity, and industry. Besides attending to his own business—that of a manufacturing chemist—he finds time for a variety of public duties in connection with religion, temperance, and politics. The public offices he holds would alone find occupation for any ordinary man; but Mr. Daniel appears to have that methodical habit which Lord Brougham possessed, by which they are enabled to perform an almost incredible quantity of work.

When he accepted the office of Grand Worthy Chief Templar of Wales, he was already a member of the Local Board of Health, a member of the Board of Guardians of the Poor, a member of the School Board, and an Overseer of his parish.

Mr. Daniel is a Welshman, having been born near Carmarthen, December 2d, 1838. He is now engaged in business at Merthyr Tydvil. He is a prosperous man in spite of the old proverb about having many irons in the fire. His business is a good one, and is well conducted, while the duties of his public offices are efficiently discharged. It is worthy of note that he derives no pecuniary advantage from any of the offices; no one has any salary or patronage attached to it. Few men devote so large a share of their time to public duties with no other motive than a desire to promote the public good.

MR. D. Y. SCOTT, D.G.W.C.T.

MR. SCOTT, whose portrait appears on this page, has recently been chosen chief of the Grand Lodge of his district, which is that of the county of Cumberland, England. He is a Scotchman, and is forty-two years old. To Mr. Scott's activity is largely due the immense power in the north of England which the Good Templar Lodges now possess. The first lodge that was established there was formed in 1870, and of that Mr. Scott was a member. The order grew so rapidly that a Grand Lodge has been formed for the county, and Mr. Scott has been selected for its chief.

AN AMERICAN TRAVELLER'S SUNDAY IN ENGLAND.

A CURIOUS picture of village life is given in a letter written by an American traveller during a visit to England. Visiting the birthplace of Shakespeare, as every American traveller feels to be his duty, he found that he had two hours to wait for a train to carry him back to London. It was a hot day in July, a Saturday, too, and our countryman thought, as he wandered through the green fields on the banks of the Avon, how much sweeter the hedgerows were than the walls of the London houses, and quickly formed the resolution not to go back that day, but to stay in the country and see what village life was like in these days of steam and electricity.

Just below him, as if in a nest, lay the prettiest little village he had ever seen. Little white cottages in four rows, with little gardens to front and rear, formed the village, with two large, old-fashioned farm-houses, one on the right and the other on the extreme left of the village. Half way up the hill opposite to the one on which he was standing was a church completely covered with ivy, which had grown over the tower itself. Near to it was an old brick house, with trim gardens and an orchard, evidently the parsonage. And above, on the brow of the hill, on a level with his own eyes as he looked over the roofs of the village to the other side of the nest, was the mansion of some local magnate, probably the owner of all the land he could see, with the farms and cottages.

That was just the spot he wanted to see, and there he resolved to stay till Monday morning. Descending the hill, he looked around for the village ale-house, where alone he would be likely to find accommodation for the two nights of his stay. He found the place a respectable, quiet, clean, and comfortable house, and he engaged quarters there. Conversing with his landlord, the guest easily learned the history of the village.

It was called Darkholme, and with very little questioning the American inquirer acquired information about all its inhabitants, from Lord Willoughby at the Abbey, and the parson at the parsonage, who was the lord's younger brother, to the cottagers who toiled at the plough. Lord Willoughby was away in "furrin parts," and was seldom at his place on the hill. The clergyman was in "Lunnon," and the curate was doing duty, and the landlord said, with a grunt, that he didn't care how long the vicar stayed away, for the curate was the best of the two. "Folks could understand him, and the vicar they couldn't make top nor tail on." As for the cottagers, they were "mostly the usual sort: some could read, and some couldn't; none of the old uns could. Reading hadn't come up much when they were young. The younger men could read generally, except the lazy ones, and all the children could, at least them as was big enough to go to school. The curate looked after them, and saw to 'em goin' regular."

Early on Sunday morning the American guest was up and walking through the village. He made his way to the church, from which came the sound of music. It was an ancient edifice, the cable moulding over the doorway showing that it must be nearly a thousand years old. From a loft that did duty as a gallery came the music. The choir was practising the anthem with the aid of a violoncello, a bassoon, and a key-bugle; and the transatlantic visitor, with his teeth on edge, retreated till it was over and the service proper commenced. He wandered out into the churchyard, reading the inscriptions on the old grave-stones. Looking down the hill as he passed the gate, he saw the first arrivals of the congregation. An old man dressed in the regulation clean "smock-frock," with a bright, eager face, his shoulders bent by a life of toil, came up to the gate, leaning on the arm of a stalwart man in his prime, evidently the old man's son. At a little distance below them a lady followed, leading two children. Once inside the churchyard gate the old man stopped, and loosing his son's arm stood as nearly upright as he could to greet them. "There, Jane," he said, as his daughter-in-law entered the inclosure, "what do you say to that for eighty-three? I can beat some of the young uns yet," and he laid his hand kindly on the head of one of the little children who entered with their mother.

"Oh, grandpa! you couldn't have beaten us if father hadn't helped you. We know about that," and the child kissed the old, brown, wrinkled hand of the octogenarian affectionately.

"I had some talk with this family," writes our friend, "after the simple service was over, and went with them to their cottage home. I found there the most peaceful family nest I ever saw. They all lived together—three generations under one roof. The old man had never been to school, had worked on the farm all his life, as his father and grandfather had done before him. They had lived in this same cottage, and had been born and died there. His son was doing a little better than he had ever done, was a gardener up at my lord's. Neither of the two had ever been twenty miles away from home in their lives. They scarcely ever saw a newspaper, though the son could read, and 'his wife,' the old man said with pride, 'was quite a scholar.' They were poor, but they had enough for their daily need, and were content. It was a sleepy, sluggish kind of life to go on from father to son, but it had probably more happiness in it than some lives more envied. On the table in the best room was a family Bible, which I found was read every evening, after which the grandfather prayed. Little as either father or son knew of the world around them, they knew much of the world beyond the grave. With the Bible and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" they were intimately acquainted, and they were hoping, through the atonement of Christ, for reunion in heaven. They were miserably ignorant, I know, but I thought then, and think now, that a time is coming when many of our philosophers and learned professors will realize that all their own knowledge would be well given for the simple faith of these ignorant people, who had no doubts, but believed God and trusted in His Son. I remembered Pollok's words as I looked at that simple octogenarian:

"The word philosophy he never heard,
Or science; never heard of liberty,
Necessity or laws of gravitation;
And never had an unbelieving doubt.
Beyond his vale he never looked. He lived—
Lived where his father lived, died where he died—
Lived happy, and died happy, and was saved.
Be not surprised. He loved and served his God."

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

The Bombardment.

MY knees trembled as I mounted the stairs. The crash had been terrific, and the house had shaken under it to the very basement, as if there had been an earthquake. I was in an agony of apprehension, and the darkness added to the horror of the scene. In such moments one seems to live for days, and the suspense draws them out interminably. In a minute I felt that I should know what had happened; but as I ascended I was on this side of a knowledge that you wonder at it?"

No, I could not wonder at it; yet it seemed a shocking thing for the old man's soul to pass away in such a manner. I felt grieved for him, stranger as he was; but it was not a time to grieve long.

"I thought our roof had come in," I said. "Just at first I thought so," she answered, "but it cannot be. Dare you go up, Max?"

Dare I? It was what I meant to do. If any fire had broken out, it was needful that some person should see after it; and there was no other man in the house, for Sergeant Klein and his comrades were on duty somewhere. I went on more swiftly, for it was light enough now up there. Lisbeth's attic was all right yet; and I ran eagerly to the window to look out.

It was not our roof, but it was one opposite. A shell had fallen and burst in an attic like the one I was in, carrying down into the street the outer walls of the three upper stories. At first sight it seemed as if they were empty; but still it was a melancholy thing to see all the useful, homely furniture of the poor people who had escaped, all broken and damaged. But as I looked more closely, I discovered the forms of two children crouching in a bed and quaking with fright, though they were yet unhurt. Above them hung a heavy beam, held only by some rotten rafters, which might fall upon them any instant. It is an awful thing to see one's fellow-creatures in danger of death, and have no power to save them. How near I was to them, and yet how far! Then the beam swayed, and would have fallen before I could descend our staircase, cross the street, and get up to them. I shouted with all my might, but the noise of the batteries drowned my voice.

It might have been three minutes, but it seemed like three hours, before I saw a door open at the back of the room, and a small, spare man, might be horrible. I suppose every one can remember some experience like that, but to me then it was quite new. I shrank from going up, lest the mangled corpses of those I loved should meet my view, yet I was eager to know the worst; and between the two impulses I was bewildered and almost stupefied. But I went on mounting the stairs and looking eagerly for a light.

I was very full of fear for Lisbeth, for I thought nothing could shake our house like that except the destruction of the attics. I was afraid of fire into the bargain. At the foot of the first attic staircase I shouted as loudly as I could, and to my indescribable joy Lisbeth's voice replied. Then I went on step after step, and the light up there grew stronger. Lisbeth had thrown open Hans' door, and the dawn shone through it quite brightly. Her face was worn and haggard, but she smiled faintly as her eyes met mine.

"An awful night, Max!" she said; "pray God we may never pass such another!"

Neither of us knew then how many such nights had yet to come.

"How is Hans?" I asked.

"Dead!" she answered; "he died a few minutes ago, in great terror. Do in a workman's blouse and cap, looked in. I held my breath; for I felt as if the least movement would break that beam fall. He saw it, too, and stole forward on tip-toe, calling, I suppose—for I could hear nothing—to the children, who sprang all at once toward him, while he caught them with outstretched arms, and drew them hurriedly back through the open door. Then the beam fell, and a cloud of dust hid them from me, so that I could not tell whether they quite escaped, or were buried under the other portion of the roof, which gave way with the falling of the timber.

By this time the fierceness of the firing had abated a little; and after awhile I offered to go to the baker's for our day's bread; for I did not suppose either that Gretchen would go, or that the baker would come round as usual. So I went slowly along the familiar street, now encumbered with piles of brick and timber. Scores of houses were in ruins. Here and there was one on fire, which had been abandoned by the panic-stricken inhabitants, and left to spread wider ruin, which it would have done if the firemen had not been on the lookout. In some places furniture, as good and costly as that on which my grandmother prided herself, was lying out on the causeway; and I felt thankful that Gretchen was not there to see it.

The baker had no bread in his shop; but he was just going to set about baking, having rolled a long towel round and round his body, to keep him sweating at his work, he said, for he was shaking like an aspen leaf. Several other men had ventured out on the same errand as myself; but no woman had had the courage to leave the shelter of the roofs. Every one had a story of terror, and loss, and pain to tell; and we stayed nearly an hour till the rolls were ready.

"If the Germans do so much mischief outside the walls, what would they do within them? There must be no surrender!" That was the general feeling.

With my rolls wrapped up in a cloth, I went round, on the way home, to the school where Louise had been staying all night. It lay a little nearer the Saverne Gate than our own house, and so far nearer to the point of danger. But the front was untouched, and looked exactly as it had done whenever I had seen it before, with some flowers trained up the attic windows, where the sun shone brightly upon them. Not a pane of glass was broken; and my heart beat fast with gladness, for I had been thinking a good deal of the poor, desolate girl during the night.

The entrance was like our own, at the back of the house, and you had to pass under a long, broad archway to reach it. I went on into the square court beyond, which was very dim and dull from the height of the buildings surrounding it. But there was light enough to show me in a moment that a shell had fallen right in the centre of this nest of houses, and burnt them, carrying destruction and death with it. A classroom in one corner of the court was only a heap of ruins, and the lower parts of the dwellings round had been blown in. How many people might have been hurt by this explosion!

I dared not go any farther. It was a desolate scene—all the windows shattered, doors burst in, chimneys fallen. The classroom had scarcely one brick left on another; it looked like a body torn limb from limb. For some time there was not a creature to be seen; and I concluded that the inhabitants had all fled to the churches. But just as I was turning away, an old woman, pale and panic-stricken, put her head through an inner door of one of the ruined houses, and called to me.

"Is that you, Max Kromer?" she cried.

"Yes," I answered.

"Oh!" she wailed, "Louise is dead—Louise and two other children. They were killed in the classroom last night before the others went away to the church."

She closed the door quickly, and I sat down on the doorstep, so sick at heart to stand for some minutes. Poor Louise! poor, forlorn, lonely girl! I shuddered at the sight of the great heap of ruins in the corner of the court, and wished to go away, yet had not the strength to move. At last the recollection of the dread and anxiety at home aroused me. I found them all faint for want of food and rest; and I let them have their breakfast before I told them that Louise was killed.

In the afternoon of the same day I went again to the school, for I could not bear the idea of the strange, unknown, friendless girl lying unburied. But the relatives of the other children who lived in the city were already seeking for the bodies among the ruins; and three coffins were prepared to receive them. There was no burial-place within the fortifications except the Botanic Gardens, where, but a few weeks before, Sylvie and I had passed many a happy hour. It was the first week of the siege then, and regular graves were dug. Old Hans had one to himself, but the three school-girls, who had died together, were buried together, and a wooden cross, with their names upon it, was put at the head of the grave. Lisbeth went with me to follow the coffin of our poor Louise; and as we stood for a minute or two amidst the trees and flowers, looking down into the open grave, she said in a low voice, as if speaking only to herself,—

"Now, in the place where He was crucified there was a garden; and in the garden a new sepulchre, wherein was never man yet laid."

So in the bright August sunshine, with the trees throwing deep, pleasant shadows across the graves, and the scent of many flowers floating over them, and the hum of bees and the timid chirping of little birds not yet scared away murmuring about them, we left the dead and turned our steps back to the ruined houses, and crowded hospitals, and many sights of anguish which filled our city.

As I went past the dining-room to my own chamber Gretchen came out to speak to me, her eyes red with weeping, and scarcely able to speak.

"Max," she said, "do you think you can forgive me for grudging the little creature her share of the food? It was not so much for myself as for my poor old lady, who must have her natural meals; and who knows how long the siege may last! I wouldn't have done it if I'd known what was going to happen to her: I think my heart grows harder every day."

"It must grow either harder or softer, Gretchen," I said. "I feel sometimes as if I could ask God to let me bear all the misery, and let everybody else go free. But I forgive you with all my heart."

I gave her my hand, and she pressed it between both of hers, crying bitterly. Somehow we had all been sorely shaken by that first terrible night of the bombardment. It was a night never to be forgotten.

Everybody knows that that was only the beginning of the siege, which went fiercely on, day after day, and week after week. Of course the attics were the most exposed to danger; and, as these were crowded with poor people, they suffered most in all ways—by famine, by fire, and by shell. Every roof that was destroyed cast fresh families homeless into the streets. Our own house was soon filled with these fugitives, with the exception of one floor containing four rooms, which we reserved for our own use, and which were crowded with the furniture my grandmother and Gretchen had such pride in.

Rations were served out to these penniless starving people every three days, but they were so scanty that the whole was eaten in two or three meals; and night and day you could hear the plaintive wail of children for food. Lisbeth, whose love for children was wonderful, looked almost heart-broken; yet she had nothing to give. As for me, if I ever asked Gretchen for anything to eat, she insisted upon having it eaten in her presence. She gave to Elsie; but she said it was a good thing for us that her heart was growing hard,

One morning, when I was about to go off on my daily visit to the Cathedral, I was astonished to find that my grandmother had made up her mind to come with me and see for herself how it was standing. I did all I could to dissuade her, but she would go; and, taking her thick gold-headed cane in her hand, and leaning on my arm, we went out into the streets.

But before we had gone far, when she looked down the familiar streets, known to her for more than fifty years, and saw them in ruins; and when she came to houses where all the household goods lay on the pavements before them, broken and destroyed, she turned faint, and could go no farther; and as I led her home again she kept moaning to herself, "O God! O God!" and was not able to speak another word till she was sitting in her own chair, beside the china stove, which, even in summer, she needed to give warmth to her feeble body.

"I will stay here till I die, Max," she said; "we will go together—the old home and I. Only pray God the Cathedral may not be destroyed as well."

It was the same day that the bishop went out with a flag of truce to the German camp, to try to make some terms of peace, so as to save the poor people who were perishing within our walls. But you know he had no success, for they would not listen to our terms, nor we to theirs. General Uhrich had made up his mind to no surrender, and a good portion of the citizens supported him. But others, in those quarters where the havoc was greatest, said to one another, "Ah! his children are safe in Baden." We were all grieving about this thing that evening. My little Sylvie had been drooping ever since the shock that the death of Louise had been to her; she had not smiled since, and her eyes were dim with much crying. I had been hoping that the siege would end, and we could get away from the city; for it seemed to me that I should lose her, if she was not soon taken to some quiet and peaceful place.

At night Lisbeth and Elsie came downstairs; for Lisbeth was going to sit up with Sylvie, Gretchen being quite worn out, and my grandmother being too old to nurse. Elsie was put to sleep on a sofa; and Lisbeth sat by Sylvie's bed, holding her thin, wasted hand, which was hardly ever still. Her poor white, pinched face, with the great, frightened eyes, which would seldom close in sleep, made my heart ache to the core. I wondered how the Lord Jesus Christ Himself would have felt if He had seen a little sister ready to die from fear in such a place as Strasburg when it was besieged.

The cannon had begun their booming again, scarcely ceasing; and now the lurid light of fire filled the room, till I closed the shutters, and drew the thick curtains over the windows. Then it flashed across my mind—why! Sylvie is His sister; and He cares for her ten times more, a hundred times more than I do; and if she should die, He is here to take her hand out of mine, and lead her away to quietness and peace, such as she wants. So I laid my head down on the pillow beside her, and put my hand on her cheek; and Sylvie turned so that her face should be against mine, smiling ever so little a smile.

"You love your brother Max, Sylvie?" I whispered to her.

"Dear!" she said, very faintly.

"And Jesus Christ is your brother, just the same," I said, "just the same. If you went away from me you would go to Him. You love Him, don't you, Sylvie?"

"Would He be like you, Max?" she asked.

"Oh, I wish I had been more like Him!" I cried. "I have teased you sometimes, and been forgetful of you, and pleased myself instead of you. But He would never be like that. He loves you more than I can tell; and He will never forget you or leave you alone."

Just as I was speaking there came a crash and a shaking, as if the house was being blown to atoms. All down the stone staircase rolled a volley of tiles and bricks, with a shock almost like an earthquake; and at the same moment some heavy pile fell into the street, mingling with the explosion of a shell, the fragments of which flew up against the shutters, tearing part of them away. From the stories overhead, which, as I told you, were thickly peopled, there rose shriek after shriek; and as soon as the bricks had ceased to rattle down the stairs there followed a rush of many footsteps, and cries, and groans, and lamentations.

THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 9, 1 Kings 18:19-29. Golden Text, ver. 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Common Mistake—What Prayer is—God's Attitude toward His Children—The Prophet's Composure—An Order to a King—Why Elijah's Authority was Acknowledged—His Sermon—Brief but Effective—The Test—A Six Hours' Prayer—What the People Needed to Know—The Failure—What has God Done?

THERE are strange ideas abroad among Christians regarding prayer. Again and again we hear people say, "I have the greatest faith in prayer;" and again: "I believe in your prayers;" or again: "The prayers of such or such a man must prevail." There is in this more of idolatry, more of likeness to the heathen, who think they shall be heard for their much speaking, than many are aware of.

WHAT IS PRAYER?

Is it a kind of joint stock operation in which the earnestness of man, combined with the power of God, does a certain work? Or is prayer a certain force brought by man to bear upon God, and compelling Him to a line of action to which, of Himself, He would be disinclined? Is prayer, in fact, compulsion of God, and is it, therefore, necessary that all the human power possible in this direction should be brought to bear upon Him? This was the idea of the prophets of Baal regarding their God, this is the heathen idea—"heard for their much speaking." But to maintain such an idea, we must blot out all idea that God is a loving Father, and settle once and for ever that He is a harsh Tyrant, and that it requires hard pressure to make Him do an act of mercy.

But if, on the contrary, our loving God invites us to come to Him in prayer, urges us to trust Him, declares, "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you"—if He tells us "how much more" than any earthly parent will He give good gifts to them that ask Him, then where is the reason for the desperate urgency with which many repeat their requests—where is the reason for fixing the eye on some human being, with the idea that that person will be more likely to obtain the answer than another? The point to be arrived at is this, to the matter? Does prayer worry, and vex, and try Him? Or does He love to hear the cry of His children, and to answer them? If His own Word means anything, surely the latter is the case. His one great condition is faith—"What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them" (Mark 11:24). The contrast between Elijah and Baal's prophets in our history is beautifully illustrative of prayer, true and false.

HOW STANDS GOD

THE PROPHET'S COMPOSURE.

It might seem a strange thing that Elijah should send Obadiah to call Ahab to come to him, as though Elijah were the king and Ahab the subject. There was a dignity in Elijah because he was at work with God. Elijah was simply God's instrument, and he saw it would be unbecoming to act as if he were a servant to a man like Ahab. Elijah was in no hurry; he did not rush away to do God's will; he waited until he met Obadiah, then sent Obadiah to King Ahab, and when he had sent him, stood still until the king came to him. He had a great work to do, such a work as no other prophet of the Lord before or after him; and yet he was as quiet about it as though he had nothing to do at all.

When Elijah met him, Ahab said, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" From man's point of view it looked very much as if was correct. Man would say, "This is a mighty man of prayer, it is his prayers that have shut up heaven." Such an opinion is a lie; it comes of unbelief. It was not Elijah's prayers but God's hand that shut up heaven. Elijah was led by the Holy Ghost to pray that prayer. When God put it in His heart, and He spoke it with His lips, then it was God Himself who answered, and it was God's answer, and God's answer only, that did the work. So when Ahab said, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" Elijah answered, "I have not troubled Israel; but thou, and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim."

How is it that Ahab did not instantly command his soldiers to slay Elijah? Because God restrained him, and Elijah proceeded as though he was perfectly master of the situation. Surely, if Obadiah was present, his eyes must almost have started from their sockets to see the boldness of Elijah in the presence of the king! Obadiah was not accustomed to see the great things of God as was Elijah.

A COMMAND TO A KING.

"Now therefore," said the prophet, "send, and gather to me all Israel unto mount Carmel, and the prophets of Baal four hundred and fifty, and the prophets of the groves four hundred, which eat at Jezebel's table. So Ahab sent unto all the children of Israel, and gathered the prophets together unto mount Carmel." What is this? The king doing the will of the man whose life he sought, the man who had been sought for as a criminal in the kingdoms and nations which surrounded Israel. Here is the King of Israel, under the power and presence of God, obeying Elijah as though he were his manservant. Oh, there is something so glorious in this! Still there was nothing in Elijah; he was just like we are, "a man of like passions." But God was with Elijah, that same God, dear brothers and sisters, who is with us. The difference is, that Elijah acknowledged God, and we do not. We acknowledge our own selves and our own weaknesses. We talk about our goodness or badness, and are busy about ourselves when we ought to be acknowledging God. You don't hear Elijah talking of himself, either as a good man or a bad man, as lost or saved—all that he has to talk about is his God. He does not talk about his experience, but about God. God fills Elijah's horizon, and He would fill yours and mine if we would make room for Him. He wants us to have one subject—that is, God; one desire—that is, God; one past, and that is God; one future, and that is God.

AN EFFECTIVE SERMON.

So Ahab, the king, does as the prophet directs. Then Elijah comes to all the people, and only now he begins to preach. He had lived all these three and a half years without once preaching a sermon. How would he be able to face all these eight hundred and fifty prophets? There is the king present, and all the nobles of Israel! He has a very large congregation, representatives from all the kingdom. Elijah came unto them all, still standing before the Lord and said: "How long halt ye between two opinions? if the Lord be God, follow Him: but if Baal, then follow him," and that was all of the sermon. Very short, but mightily effective. It cut between the dead and the living, the dead god Baal, and the living God.

THE TEST.

And then Elijah said unto the people: "I, even I only, remain a prophet of the Lord; but Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men. Let them therefore give us two bullocks; and let them choose one bullock for themselves, and cut it in pieces, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under; and I will dress the other bullock, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under; and call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord; and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God." And all the people answered and said, "It is well spoken." This was bringing God and Baal into court, and letting the one or the other prove who could answer prayer. Elijah did not ask this question, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" and then begin to help his God by bringing forth strong and Scriptural arguments why they should serve the Lord. What he wanted was not to manifest His great eloquence, but that the living God should be understood by the people of Israel; he wanted the people to come as closely and quickly as possible into contact with God Himself. This accounts for how little Elijah does. It was one of the shortest sermons ever preached, "How long halt ye between two opinions? if the Lord be God follow Him: but if Baal, then follow him." It did not take much time to preach—the words were few; but they brought the king, the prophets, and the people face to face with God.

A SIX HOURS' PRAYER.

Elijah gave the prophets of Baal the first chance. They were six hours praying and working themselves up into a fury and frenzy. If prayer could in itself do anything, those prophets ought to have brought fire from heaven. Six hours' prayer ought to do something, if any power lies in prayer! Certainly they were in earnest, for they stabbed themselves until the blood came. If prayer were to do the work they would have succeeded; but they did not, because they trusted in their earnestness and in what they could do; they knew their God could do nothing for them. But what the people wanted was not to be persuaded of the earnestness of the prophets, they wanted to know who was Almighty, and who had the power to send down fire from heaven. The whole of the country was thirsting for rain; they knew that the God who could send down fire from heaven could send down rain also. You see how quiet Elijah was about it. He did not begin to argue with these prophets, and though at last he gave way to a little irony, by saying, "Cry aloud: for He is a God; either He is talking, or He is pursuing, or He is in a journey, or peradventure He sleepeth, and must be awaked," he let them continue their crying for three hours more. At last his turn came. They had signally failed—all eyes saw it, Ahab saw it, all those prophets saw they were utterly beaten, they could not drive their God to it by all their prayers. Some people think they are going to drive the living God by their earnestness; if they could only pray long enough, or long enough together with others, if they could only get joined with them some one who has great faith, then something will happen, because they are counting upon prayer, and not upon the God who answers prayer. If you could have asked the prophets of Baal what he had done for them in the past, I think their evidence would have needed witnesses. Beloved, what has your God done for you in answer to prayer? Praise His dear name, many of us could say He has done a good many things in answer to prayer. Has He done enough to make you believe that nothing is impossible to Him? When Elijah saw the young child come to life, and had the glorious joy of putting that boy into his mother's arms again, I think there must have welled up from his heart some such thought as this, "With God all things are possible!"

WHO WAS GOD,

OUT AND INTO.

"He brought us OUT that He might bring us IN."
Deut. vi. 23.

Out of the distance and darkness so deep,
Out of the settled and perilous sleep,
Out of the region and shadow of death,
Out of its foul and pestilent breath;
Out of the bondage and wearying chains,
Out of companionship ever with stains—
Into the light and the glory of God,
Into the holiest, made clean by His blood;
Into His arms—the embrace and the kiss,
Into the scene of ineffable bliss;
Into the quiet, the infinite calm,
Into the place of the song and the psalm.
Wonderful love, that has wrought all for me!
Wonderful power, that has thus set me free!
Wonderful ground, upon which I have met
Wonderful tenderness, welcoming home!

Out of disaster and ruin complete,
Out of the struggle and dreary dead;
Out of my sorrow and burden and shame,
Out of the evils too fearful to name;
Out of my guilt, and the criminal a doom,
Out of the dreading, the terror, the gloom—
Into the sense of forgiveness and rest,
Into inheritance with all the best,
Into a righteous and permanent peace,
Into the grandest and fullest release;
Into the comfort without an alloy,
Into a perfect and confident joy.
Wonderful holiness, bringing to light!
Wonderful grace, putting all out of sight!
Wonderful wisdom, devising the way!
Wonderful power, that nothing could stay!

Out of the horror of being alone,
Out, and forever, of being my own;
Out of the hardness of being left to will,
Out of the longings which nothing could fill;
Out of the bitterness, madness, and strife,
Out of myself, and of all I called life;
Into communion with Father and Son,
Into the sharing of all that Christ won,
Into the ecstasies full to the brim,
Into the having with all things with Him;
Into Christ Jesus there ever to dwell,
Into more blessings than words can e'er tell.
Wonderful lowliness, draining my cup!
Wonderful purpose, that ne'er gave me up!
Wonderful patience, that waited so long!
Wonderful glory, to which I belong!

Out of my poverty, into His wealth;
Out of my sickness, into pure health;
Out of the false and into the true,
Out of the old man, into the new;
Out of what measures the full depth of "lost!"
Out of it all, and at infinite cost,
Into what must with that cost correspond,
Into that which there is nothing beyond,
Into the union which nothing can part,
Into what satisfies His, and my heart!
Into the deepest of joys ever to be,
Into the gladness of making God glad!
Wonderful Person, whose face I behold!
Wonderful love, that has brought me to God!
Wonderful all the dread way that He trod!
Wonderful end, He has brought me to God!

REFERENCE has been made from time to time in these columns during the past nine months to the important work in which Mr. Varley is being used by God, in the great cities of the United States. A large number of our readers have had the privilege of listening to his earnest, warm-hearted addresses, and will, we believe, be glad to have in the portrait we give this week (though taken some seven years ago), a memorial of him.

One branch of Mr. Varley's work which he has made very prominent during his tour on this side the Atlantic, as he had done on the other side, for some months previous, is of paramount importance in the present condition of the world, as recent events prove. From the first inception of the movement, Mr. Varley has taken a deep interest in

THE WHITE CROSS

Society, and has labored mightily with tongue and pen to enlarge its membership, and extend its influence. The work is a difficult and a delicate one, and we most earnestly hope that Mr. Varley's plain and earnest words to the young men of America may do something toward checking the vast tide of vicious indulgence which is overwhelming us. In our day we have become so refined, so modest, that even a distant allusion to the sins of sensuality arouses a storm of disapproval. A blush must not be brought to the cheek of our young people, and neither minister nor lecturer must refer, except in language carefully veiled, to the sin against which in direct and explicit words God launched the seventh commandment. Well, the fathers and mothers, and the sleek, self-satisfied members of our churches have had their way, and the pulpit and platform have been silent on these matters. In the mean time our young people, whose blushes we were so anxious to spare, have been secretly initiated by their schoolfellows, by designing men, and by fiends in human shape, who use the mails to disseminate their poison. The Church which has been, ostrich-like, thrusting her head in the sand, and refusing to see the pollution within and around her, may, perhaps, awake to do her duty, now that an English journal has electrified Christendom by exposing the vices of one city. Or possibly it may listen to the counsels of journals, like the New York Herald and World, and keep silence while those journals deprecate the exposure in one column, and in another publish advertisements which prove that the exposure ought to be made.

Mr. Varley has been a valiant soldier in this war, showing true Christian courage, and receiving a manifest blessing from God on his labors. His lectures "to men only" go to the root of the evil, and, as a testimony to their efficacy he has received thanking him for their delivery.* During the past eighteen months one hundred and sixty thousand men in England and America have listened to these lectures, and more than one hundred thousand printed copies have been sold. It is not difficult to understand the success of these lectures. There is no form of vice, whether sensuality, drunkenness, gambling, the opium habit, or any other that once lays hold of a human being, that can be conquered without a fierce struggle, and suffering like the cutting off of a right hand. Alone and unaided the victim never conquers. Mr. Varley has the true secret of victory, and as he points the miserable victims to Jesus who "saves His people from their sins (Matt. i: 21), they feel the chains of Satan fall from their limbs, and they are free. There is no deliverance like that, and this successful evangelist has abundantly proved that in preaching Christ he is taking the surest course to moral as well as spiritual renovation. We hail with gladness his work in our States, and trust that our ministers will see to it that it is not forgotten by their congregations, now that Mr. Varley is leaving our shores.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Henry Varley is a native of Lincolnshire, England, having been born at Tattershall in 1835; and is therefore now fifty years old. His earliest religious impressions were the result of a pious mother's watchful care. His parents were both well educated, but his mother especially so, and for some years she was at the head of a ladies' large boarding-school in Lincoln. She died while he was a boy; but among the most precious memories of his life are the hours when he would sit by her bedside and read her favorite hymns to her, especially Toplady's "Rock of Ages." Her influence over her boy had been so sweet and holy, and his young life was so bound up in hers, that when death called her home, he felt for the time as if life in this world had lost all its attraction for him.

His school-days were spent in Lincoln, under the tuition of an able mathematical scholar, Mr. Boole. He made his mark in the school in two directions: he was sharp at figures, and was a capital elocutionist. Leaving school at about thirteen years of age, he went to London. One Sunday afternoon, when he was out for a walk, he happened to pass through Trafalgar Square, where Mr. Kirton was engaged in distributing tracts in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Kirton, placing a tract in the youth's hand, kindly asking him whether he would accompany him to Mr. Baptist Noel's chapel. He needed no pressing to comply with the invitation, and his acceptance of it was the beginning of his devoting himself to the service of his Redeemer.

CONVERSION.

At John Street Chapel he had the privilege of becoming a member of the class conducted by one John Roberts, to whose labors in the Sunday-school many who were afterward successful Christian workers were indebted. Over Henry Varley his influence can hardly be estimated at too high a value, it was so deep and thorough, so elevating and sanctifying.

It was to the instructions of this friend and teacher that Mr. Varley attributed his conversion, and in 1853 he was baptized by Mr. Baptist Noel, and admitted as a member of the church. His business soon afterward took him to Australia; but he retained his membership with the church where he had received such spiritual profit until he returned in 1857. It was, at his return, his fixed resolve to prepare for the work of the ministry, and to go back to settle in Australia; but the providence of God had ordered otherwise. He was now married, we may say in passing, to one who became his true helpmeet in all godly work, and but for whom, as his friends have often heard him say, he never could have accomplished what he has been enabled to do.

BUSINESS LIFE.

He relinquished all thoughts of leaving England, and set up in business in a western suburb of London. He had not been there more than twelve months before it became evident that, notwithstanding his business success, he had a higher calling, to which he was devoting himself heart and soul. He never regretted being engaged in business, because it gave him a position of unquestionable disinterestedness from which to speak to men of business of the importance of seeking, first of all, "the kingdom of God and His righteousness." Often as he has addressed large gatherings, he has never been more truly at home than when he has been speaking faithful and loving words to the journeymen butchers of London.

FIRST SERVICES.

His first regular preaching efforts began in 1860, when he became superintendent of a Sunday-school. Certain it was that these efforts eventually resulted in the erection of a large place of worship, known as the West London Tabernacle, near Notting Hill. The cost of this building, capable of holding two thousand persons, was met by Mr. Varley and his father-in-law. It should also be understood that he chooses to be known as a "Lay Evangelist," and while engaged in an extensive trade often neglected it to attend to the Lord's business in some neglected field.

His gift in preaching was remarkable from the first, especially in exposition. His own belief, which a long experience has confirmed, is that there is no better way of moving an audience in the right direction, than to get them to understand the Word of God. A passage clearly explained, has a better influence than the best "original" thought and the most brilliant eloquence of the preacher. Of course such methods do not suit ministers and evangelists, who are anxious to attain a great reputation; but those who have no concern about themselves, and are anxious only to save souls, may profit from Mr. Varley's experience, which is, that there is no surer means of obtaining the Holy Spirit's blessing than by an exposition of the Word. Mr. Varley is a fervent believer in

THE SPEEDY COMING OF THE LORD.

No one can be in his company long without feeling that this belief is one of the deepest convictions of his nature, and the effect of it upon him is that it gives a solemn, yet glad, glow of feeling to all his words upon any subject.

In 1875 Mr. Varley paid his FIRST VISIT TO AMERICA.

Turning over the files of the daily newspapers of that year, we find glowing accounts of the results of God's blessing on his preaching. It was, it appears, not at all unusual to see twenty thousand people filling every seat in the Hippodrome on a Sunday evening. In the Association Hall in the same city, Mr. Varley's addresses attracted immense audiences, while drawing-room meetings gathered together, what is called "the upper class of society." The effect of his preaching was to kindle an enthusiasm in the breasts of the Christians of New York generally, which set hundreds of them seeking out their friends and relatives and urging them to come and hear the Gospel. About a hundred ministers met him at the close of the month which he had engaged to spend in the city, and begged him to remain at least another month, while, at the same time, from Boston and Philadelphia the cry came, "Come over and help us."

Immense audiences everywhere attended throughout America at his various addresses, which the Rev. Theodore Cuyler said were delivered "in familiar, John Bunyan-like English, and which held the large congregation as tight as in a vice." It is believed that immense good resulted from his unceasing efforts, especially in New York and in Boston. For seven weeks in New York he held continuous meetings six days of each week, always twice a day, and often three times. Hundreds of people were converted, and it has been to Mr. Varley a cause for deep thankfulness, that during the past few weeks he has received letters from so many, describing their spiritual progress since they were awakened under his ministry in New York ten years ago.

Before returning to England, Mr. Varley accepted an urgent invitation to pay a VISIT TO CANADA.

He was personally a stranger to our friends in the Dominion when he crossed the border, but in a short time they learned to admire and love him with enthusiasm. A Canadian correspondent wrote at the time: "Our brother, Henry Varley, and his dear wife have come to us in the fulness of the Gospel of Jesus, having been greatly blessed at Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, and Belleville to the salvation of many souls. Already this country has beheld what iod can do by a man 'wholly surrendered,' idermen, professors, merchants, drunkards, ount and old, educated, unlearned, are daily stifying of the wondrous love of Jesus. Chris- ans have been led to realize the riches of their heritance, and awake out of the death-like eep growing out of mere formalism and cere- onialism.

* Mr. Varley informs us that these lectures may be purchased in pamphlet form from the Tract Depot of the 33d St. Tabernacle, New York. The price of the two lectures is 20 cents.

Mr. Varley returned to England with renewed onsecration, and with his energy stimulated by ntact with American Christians. The West ondon Tabernacle became more than ever a ntre of wide-reaching practical effort. It now nembraces in addition to the several institutions ually found in connection with a Christian hurch, an "Industrial Home for the Blind," pened in September, 1876, where a consider- ble number of this afflicted class are engaged, id which promises to be a great blessing to any of the poor blind and their children.

An organization for evangelistic work among e large number of butchers, who are to be und in the Smithfield Market was also estab- shed. Every year there is a kind of festival rvice of this mission, for which Mr. Spurgeon nds his tabernacle. Nearly two thousand uthers are to be seen there beside the workers id their friends. This shows that although market men" are not supposed to care very uch about social reunions of such a character, ey do care about Mr. Varley, and accept with easure the annual invitation which he kindly nt them.

MISSION IN AUSTRALIA.

The spiritual condition of the rapidly develop- g colony in Australia, had been a burden on r. Varley's heart ever since he visited that nd in 1856; he therefore eagerly embraced an opportunity for laboring there. He sailed in ay, 1877, and in due course arrived safely in elbourne. At once he commenced religious rvinces, which were so largely attended that it ecame necessary to hire the large Town Hall to commodate the people who gathered to hear e Word. Open-air services were also held, hich were attended by over ten thousand peo- e, while the Town Hall was densely crowded eek after week. The result was most blessed; ndreds came forward to confess Christ. On e occasion alone, one hundred and thirty- ven persons were baptized on a confession of eir faith, in the presence of a large and deeply terested congregation. At the conclusion e Melbourne mission, Mr. Varley visited dney, Adelaide, Launceston, Hobart, Well- ington, Christchurch, Dunedin, and other large laces with joyful results. He then crossed to ew Zealand where the same deep interest was oused.

The work in the Southern Hemisphere occu- ded two years, after which Mr. Varley returned his own country to resume his pastoral and angelistic work. The latter, however, was nually encroaching on the former. Invitations from churches of different denominations pt pouring in, and Mr. Varley, recognizing e fact that the divided state of the Church is heritance of the past, accepted all without in- idious discrimination, laboring ardently to ote the unity of the whole Church of rist. These engagements finally grew to such oportions that it became necessary to resign e pastorate of the Tabernacle, and attend ex- usively to evangelistic work. His resignation ok effect, to the deep sorrow of his church, in 82, and since that time Mr. Varley has devoted self to the arduous labors of evangelization, ying especial attention to the work of pro- ducing social purity, which he thought—and e recent revelations prove that he was right—is a work of paramount importance.

SECOND VISIT TO AMERICA.

In November of last year, Mr. Varley again ossed the Atlantic, and received a hearty wel- come from Christian friends in this country. By eial request, he commenced his labors at St. ouis, Mo., proceeding thence to Kansas City, o., Springfield, Ill., Louisville, Ky., Augusta, a., Baltimore, Md., Philadelphia, and New York. Last winter the severity of the weather interfered materially with evangelistic work, and the political excitement was also an important factor, but neither of these causes operated to diminish the success of Mr. Varley's services. In every place the fame of the preacher had preceded him, and the buildings in which he spoke were crowded to their utmost capacity.

which may serve as a specimen, though the work there was not more successful than in other cities—was deeply moved during the evangelist's stay. A correspondent in that city of a prominent journal, describing the visit, wrote: "Mr. Varley has been here three weeks, and has held two and three services daily. The meetings were from first to last attended by large numbers. Often the splendid hall of the Young Men's Christian Association and the large churches where the meetings were held were crowded to excess. This, at this season of the year, was most remarkable, especially when we consider the dreadful state of spiritual declen- sion prevailing, together with the unostentatious manner in which our brother's progress is made from place to place—the absence of committees, preparing for his coming beforehand—and that he is entirely alone in the work. To the ser- vices have been gathered ministers and people of all denominations.

"The bringing of such multitudes together, and meetings in work and worship of such num- bers of people holding different views in many respects, was very blessed. Best of all was the intense interest awakened in divine things by these services, which showed that the power was not of man, but of God. Listening, day after day, to the clear and simple unfoldings of divine truth, and experiencing the wonderful power of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the meetings, many Christian workers were constrained to go forth to 'rescue the perishing.'

"The afternoon Bible-readings were occasions of great interest. To see hundreds of people turning over the pages of their Bibles, and eagerly drinking in the expositions, was a most unusual sight for this city. Nor were these audiences composed of Christian people only. Many non-churchgoing people attended. At these meetings, the Christian's Standing, the Lord's Second Coming, and the Advocacy and High Priesthood of our Lord, were brought out with great clearness. The testimonies as to the power of the Word as delivered by our brother are neither few nor far between. The name of Henry Varley has become very dear to thou- sands of American Christians, and it is their earnest regret that he feels compelled to leave a land where his labors have been so signally blessed of God."

IN NEW YORK

the scene of his most successful labors ten years ago, Mr. Varley was warmly welcomed. Dr. Talmage invited him to preach in the Brooklyn Tabernacle which, though only a single advertisement was published of the forth- coming service, was packed with an immense congregation to hear him. At the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, Mr. Varley held daily services for upward of three weeks, and Mr. A. B. Simp- son being absent in London, attending the In- ternational Faith-Healing Conference, Mr. Varley occupied his pulpit every Lord's Day. It was strange to turn into that building out of the busy thoroughfare, thronged with the votaries of fashion, pleasure, and frivolity, and see gathered there on the week-day, an earnest, attentive congregation, listening eagerly to Mr. Varley's Bible-reading, while on Sundays, in spite of the excessive heat, the building would not contain the crowds that patiently waited for admission. It has been a period of marvellous blessing, hundreds of souls having been brought to a knowledge of the truth, and Christians stimu- lated to fresh consecration and renewed energy in service. At the concluding service held on Sunday, July 12th, upward of fifty persons were converted.

Mr. Varley expresses himself deeply interested in Mr. Simpson's work in connection with faith- healing, which he has during these services had an opportunity of closely observing. Though he does not commit himself to any pronounced advocacy of the views held by Mr. Simpson and other advocates of the Faith-healing doctrines, which are so largely arresting the attention of believers in these last days, Mr. Varley 'recognizes with joy and gratitude alike the veracity and the reality of the cures which have been effected.'

After a brief period of much-needed rest, which Mr. Varley enjoyed while the guest of Henry Naylor, Esq., at Lenox, Mass., he attended the meetings of the Conference held two weeks ago at Niagara, on the Lord's Second Coming, which brings his services on this side to a close. His American friends bid him good-by with deep regret; but recognizing, nevertheless, how urgently his special work, in view of the present excitement, is needed in England.

IMPRESSIONS OF AMERICA.

Speaking of the impressions his visit here has left on his mind, Mr. Varley says, that the oppor- tunities he has had for observing the state of society in the cities he has visited, have been carefully utilized, but he cannot speak hope- fully of the moral and spiritual condition of any of those cities. He distinctly believes that the world is increasing in wickedness, and that the drift, both in the Old and the New World, is to the condition of abounding iniquity which will prevail when "the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance upon them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel" (11 Thess. 1:7, 8). With great force Mr. Varley points out that the fact of Christ's Coming in flaming fire to take ven- geance, is conclusive proof that the world will not be increasing in spirituality as some expect, but will be, when the Lord comes, in the same condition as in the days of Noah, and the days of Lot—days of fearful and abominable wickedness.

The Class List of Successful Students in One of our universities teaches a silent lesson this year. A contemporary calls attention to the significant fact noticed there, that the men who have carried off the honors in the graduating class at Yale were not the athletes, but the young men who had been prominent in the Young Men's Christian Association of the col- lege.

Distinguished Laymen Occasionally Occupy English pulpits. Some three Sundays ago the Lord Mayor of London preached in the Baptist Chapel, Bow, on the occasion of the centenary celebration. At the same hour Mr. Samuel Smith, member of Parliament for Liverpool, was preaching in the Borough Road Congrega- tional Chapel. Mr. Caine, who was a member of Mr. Gladstone's administration, is a very ac- ceptable preacher, and frequently heard in metropolitan pulpits.

A Marked Increase in Temperance Progress in Georgia is reported. In all quarters of the State the cause is said to be growing in strength. At the recent Temperance Convention held at Atlanta, resolutions were adopted petitioning the Legislature to pass a general local option law, so that in every county in the State there can be an election on Prohibition. Of the one hundred and thirty-eight counties in Georgia, twenty have restricted the sale of liquor and eighty have absolutely prohibited it. It is thought that more than half of the thirty-eight counties where the sale of liquor is now unre- stricted will be carried for Prohibition if the Legislature passes the law asked for. The resolu- tions declare that temperance must not be mixed with politics, and in the election for mem- bers for the State at large of the Executive Com- mittee two Democrats and two Republicans were chosen. There were several negro delegates in the Convention, and resolutions were passed to thoroughly organize the temperance movement among the negroes throughout the State. The Convention was the largest and most representa- tive body of the kind ever held in Georgia.

THE INSIGNIFICANT.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech."—RUTH 2: 3.

Beauty of Female Industry—Madame de Stael's Industry—VI. The Value of Gleaning—The Precious Fragments of Time.

The time that Ruth and Naomi arrive at Bethlehem is harvest time. It was the custom when a sheaf fell from a load in the harvest-field for the reapers to refuse to gather it up; that was to be left for the poor who might happen to come along that way. If there were handfuls of grain scattered across the field after the main harvest had been reaped, instead of raking it, as farmers do now, it was, by the custom of the land, left in its place, so that the poor, coming along that way, might glean it and get their bread. But, you say, "What is the use of all these harvest-fields to Ruth and Naomi? Naomi is too old and feeble to go out and toil in the sun; and can you expect that Ruth, the young and the beautiful, should tan her cheeks and blister her hands in the harvest-field?"

Boaz owns a large farm, and he goes out to see the reapers gather in the grain. Coming there, right behind the swarthy, sun-browned reapers, he beholds a beautiful woman glean— a woman more fit to bend to a harp or sit upon a throne than to stoop among the sheaves. Ah, that was

AN EVENTFUL DAY!

It was love at first sight. Boaz forms an attachment for the womanly gleaner—an attachment full of undying interest to the Church of God in all ages; while Ruth, with an ephah, or nearly a bushel of barley, goes home to Naomi to tell her the successes and adventures of the day. That Ruth, who left her native land of Moab in darkness, and travelled through an undying affection for her mother-in-law, is in the harvest-field of Boaz, is affianced to one of the best families in Judah, and becomes in after time the ancestress of Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory! Out of so dark a night, did there ever dawn so bright a morning?

THE USES OF TROUBLE.

I. I learn, in the first place, from this subject how trouble develops character. It was bereavement, poverty, and exile that developed, illustrated, and announced to all ages the sublimity of Ruth's character. That is a very unfortunate man who has no trouble. It was sorrow that made John Bunyan the better dreamer, and Dr. Young the better poet, and O'Connell the better orator, and Bishop Hall the better preacher, and Havelock the better soldier, and Kitto the better encyclopædist, and Ruth the better daughter-in-law.

I once asked an aged man in regard to his pastor, who was a very brilliant man, "Why is it that your pastor, so very brilliant, seems to have so little heart and tenderness in his sermons?" "Well," he replied, "the reason is, our pastor has never had any trouble. When misfortune comes upon him, his style will be different." After awhile the Lord took a child out of that pastor's house; and though the preacher was just as brilliant as he was before, oh, the warmth, the tenderness of his discourses! The fact is, that trouble is a great educator. You see sometimes a musician sit down at an instrument, and his execution is cold and formal and unfeeling. The reason is that all his life he has been prospered. But let misfortune or bereavement come to that man, and he sits down at the instrument, and you discover the pathos in the first sweep of the keys.

AN EDUCATION.

Misfortune and trials are great educators. A young doctor comes into a sick-room where there is a dying child. Perhaps he is very rough in his prescription, and very rough in his manner, and rough in the feeling of the pulse, and rough in his answer to the mother's anxious question; but years roll on, and there has been one dead in his own house; and now he comes into the sick-room, and with tearful eye he looks at the dying child, and he says, "Oh, how this reminds me of my Charlie!" Trouble, the great educator. Sorrow—I see its touch in the grandest painting; I hear its tremor in the sweetest song; I feel its power in the mightiest argument.

Grecian mythology said that the fountain of Hippocrene was struck out by the foot of the winged horse Pegasus. I have often noticed in life that the brightest and most beautiful fountains of Christian comfort and spiritual life have been struck out by

of disaster and calamity. I see Daniel's courage best by the flash of Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. I see Paul's prowess best when I find him on the foundering ship under the glare of the lightning in the breakers of Melita. God crowns His children amid the howling of wild beasts and the chopping of blood-splashed guillotine and the crackling fires of martyrdom. It took the persecutions of Marcus Aurelius to develop Polycarp and Justin Martyr. It took the Pope's bull and the cardinals' curse and the world's anathema to develop Martin Luther. It took all the hostilities against the Scotch Covenanters and the fury of Lord Claverhouse to develop James Renwick, and Andrew Melville, and Hugh McKail, the glorious martyrs of Scotch history. It took the stormy sea, and the December blast, and the desolate New England coast, and the war-whoop of savages to show forth the prowess of the Pilgrim Fathers—

"When amid the storms they sang,
And the stars heard, and the sea;
And the sounding aisles of the dim wood
Rang to the anthems of the free."

It took all our past national distresses, and it takes all our present national sorrows, to lift up our nation on that high career where it will march long after the foreign aristocracies that have mocked and the tyrannies that have jeered shall be swept down under the omnipotent wrath of God, who hates despotism, and who, by the strength of His own red right arm, will make all men free. And so it is individually, and in the family, and in the Church, and in the world, that through darkness and storm and trouble men, women, churches, nations, are developed.

FAITHFUL FRIENDSHIPS.

II. Again, I see in my text the beauty of unflinching friendship. I suppose there were plenty of friends for Naomi while she was in prosperity; but of all her acquaintances, how many were willing to trudge off with her toward Judah, when she had to make that lonely journey? One—the heroine of my text. One—absolutely one. I suppose when Naomi's husband was living, and they had plenty of money, and all things went well, they had a great many callers; but I suppose that after her husband died, and her property went, and she got old and poor, she was not troubled very much with callers. All the birds that sang in the bower while the sun shone have gone to their nests, now the night has fallen.

Oh, these beautiful sun-flowers that spread out their color in the morning hour; but they are always asleep when the sun is going down! Job had plenty of friends when he was the richest man in Uz; but when his property went and the trials came, then there were none so much that pestered as Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite.

Life often seems to be a mere game, where the successful player pulls down all the other men into his own lap. Let suspicions arise about a man's character, and he becomes like bank in a panic, and all the imputations run on him and break down in a day that character which in due time would have had strength to defend itself. There are reputations that have been half a century in building, which go down under some moral exposure, as a vast temple consumed by the touch of a sulphurous match. A hog can uproot a century plant.

In this world, so full of heartlessness and hypocrisy, how thrilling it is to find some friend faithful in days of adversity as in days of prosperity! David had such a friend in Hushai. The Jews had such a friend in Mordecai, who never forgot their cause. Paul had such a friend in Onesiphorus, who visited him in jail. Christ has such in the Marys, who adhered to Him on the cross. Naomi had such a one in Ruth, who cried out: "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part thee and me."

DARKNESS AND SUNLIGHT.

III. Again I learn from this subject that path which open in hardship and darkness often come out in places of joy. When Ruth started from Moab toward Jerusalem, to go along with her mother-in-law, I suppose the people said "Oh, what a foolish creature to go away from her father's house, to go off with a poor old woman toward the land of Judah! They won't live to get across the desert. They will be drowned in the sea, or the jackals of the wilderness will destroy them." It was a very dark morning when Ruth started off with Naomi, but behold her in my text in the harvest-field of Boaz, to be affianced to one of the lords of the land, and become one of the grandmothers of Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory. And so it often is that a path which often starts very darkly ends very brightly.

When you started out for heaven, oh, how dark was the hour of conviction—how Sin thundered, and devils tormented, and the darkness thickened! All the sins of your life pounced upon you, and it was the darkest hour you ever saw when you first found out your sin. After a while you went into the harvest-field of God's mercy; you began to glean in the field of divine promise, and you had more sheave than you could carry, as the voice of God addressed you, saying: "Blessed is the man whose transgressions are forgiven and whose sins are covered." A very dark starting in conviction, a very bright ending in the pardon and the hope and the triumph of the Gospel.

THE PILGRIMAGE.

So, very often in our worldly business or in our spiritual career, we start off on a very dark path. We must go. The flesh may shrink back, but there is a voice within or a voice from above, saying: "You must go," and we have to drink the gall, and we have to carry the cross, and we have to traverse the desert, and we are pounded and flailed of misrepresentation and abuse, and we have to urge our way through ten thousand obstacles that have been slain by our own right arm. We have to for the river, we have to climb the mountain, we have to storm the castle; but blessed be God the day of rest and reward will come. On the tip-top of the captured battlements we will shout the victory; if not in this world, then in that world where there is no gall to drink, no burdens to carry, no battles to fight. How do you know it? Know it! I know it because God says so. "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

* We republish this remarkable sermon at the request of subscribers, who have written us.

It was very hard for Noah to endure the scolding of the people in his day, while he was trying to build the ark, and was every morning quizzed out of his old boat that would never be of any actual use; but when the deluge came, and the tops of the mountains disappeared like the backs of sea-monsters, and the elements, lashed in fury, clapped their hands over a drowned world, then Noah in the ark rejoiced in his own safety and in the safety of his family, and looked on the wreck of a ruined earth.

THE HOUR OF DARKNESS.

Christ, hounded of persecutors, denied a pillow, worse maltreated than the thieves on either side of the cross, human hate smacking its lips in satisfaction after it had been draining His last drop of blood, the sheeted dead bursting from the sepulchres at His crucifixion. Tell me, O thesane and Golgotha, were there ever rarer times than those? Like the booming of a midnight sea against the rock, the surges of Christ's anguish beat against the gates of eternity, to be echoed back by all the thrones of heaven and all the dungeons of hell. But the reward comes for Christ; all the pomp and dominion of this world are to be hung on its throne, uncrowned heads are to bow before Him on whose head are many crowns, and all celestial worship is to come up at His feet, the humming of the forest, like the rushing of the waters, like the thundering of the seas, fill all heaven, rising on their thrones, beat in glory by their sceptres. "Hallelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth! Hallelujah, ye kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ!"

"That song of love, now low and far,
Erelong shall swell from star to star;
That light, the breaking day which tips
The golden-spined Apocalypse."

IV. Again, I learn from my subject that events which seem to be most insignificant may be most momentous. Can you imagine anything more important than the coming of a poor woman in Moab to Judah? Can you imagine anything more trivial than the fact that this Ruth happened to alight—as they say—just happened to alight on that field of Boaz? Yet all these, all generations, have an interest in the fact that she was to become an ancestor of the Lord Jesus Christ, and all nations and kingdoms must look at that one little incident with a thrill of awe and eternal satisfaction. So it is your history and in mine; events that you ought of no importance at all have been of great moment. That casual conversation, that accidental meeting—you did not think of it again for a long while; but how it changed all!

THE PHASE OF YOUR LIFE!

It seemed to be of no importance that Jubal invented rude instruments of music, calling them harp and organ; but they were the introduction of all the world's minstrelsy; and as you hear the vibration of a stringed instrument, even the fingers have been taken away from it, so music now of lute and drum and cornet are only the long-continued strains of Jubal's harp and Jubal's organ. It seemed to be a matter of very little importance that Tubal Cain learned the uses of copper and iron; but that rude undrilled of ancient days has its echo in the rattle of Birmingham machinery and the roar and clang of factories on the Merimac.

It seemed to be a matter of no importance at all that Luther found a Bible in a monastery; but he opened that Bible, and the brass-bound volume fell back, they jarred everything, from the altar to the furthest convent in Germany, and the rustling of the wormed leaves was the sound of the wings of the angel of the Reformation. It seemed to be a matter of no importance that a woman, whose name has been forgotten, dropped a tract in the way of a very bad man by the name of Richard Baxter. He picked up the tract and read it, and it was the means of his salvation. In after days that man wrote a book called "The Call to the Unconverted," that was the means of bringing to God, among others Philip Doddridge. Philip Doddridge wrote a book called "The Rise and Progress of Religion," which has brought thousands and tens of thousands into the kingdom of God, among others the great Wilberforce. Wilberforce wrote a book called "A Practical View of Christianity," which was the means of bringing a great multitude to Christ, among others Legh Richmond. Legh Richmond wrote a tract called "The Dairyman's Daughter," which has been the means of the salvation of unconverted multitudes. And that tide of influence started from the fact that one Christian woman dropped a Christian tract in the way of Richard Baxter—the tide of influence rolling on through Richard Baxter, through Philip Doddridge, through the great Wilberforce, through Legh Richmond, on, on, on, forever, forever. So the insignificant events of this world seem, after all, to be most momentous. The fact that you came up that street or this street seemed to be of no importance to you, and the fact that you went inside of some church may seem to be a matter of very great insignificance to you, but you will find it the turning-point in your history.

V. Again, I see in my subject an illustration of the beauty of FEMALE INDUSTRY.

Behold Ruth toiling in the harvest-field under the hot sun, or at noon taking plain bread with the reapers, or eating the parched corn which Boaz handed to her. The customs of society, of course, have changed, and without the hardships and exposure to which Ruth was subjected, every intelligent woman will find something to do.

I know there is a sickly sentimentality on this subject. In some families there are persons of no practical service to the household or community; and though there are so many woes all around about them in the world, they spend their time languishing over a new pattern, or bursting into tears at midnight over the story of some lover who shot himself! They would not deign to look at Ruth carrying back the barley on her way home to her mother-in-law, Naomi. All this fastidiousness may seem to do very well while they are under the shelter of their father's house; but when the sharp winter of misfortune comes, what of these butterflies? Persons under indulgent parentage may get upon themselves habits of indolence; but when they come out into practical life, their soul will recoil with disgust and chagrin. They will feel in their hearts what the poet so severely satirized when he said:

"Folks are so awkward, things so impolite, They're elegantly pained from morning until night."

Through that gate of indolence, how many men and women have marched, useless on earth, to a destroyed eternity! Spinola said to Sir Horace Vere: "Of what did your brother die?" "Of having nothing to do," was the answer. "Ah!" said Spinola, "that's enough to kill any general of us." Oh, can it be possible in this world, where there is so much suffering to be alleviated, so much darkness to be enlightened, and so many burdens to be carried that there is any person who cannot find anything to do?

Madame de Staël did a world of work in her time; and one day, while she was seated amid instruments of music, all of which she had mastered, and amid manuscript books, which she had written, some one said to her, "How do you find time to attend to all these things?" "Oh," she replied, "these are not the things I am proud of. My chief boast is in the fact that I have seventeen trades, by any one of which I could make a livelihood if necessary." And if in secular spheres there is so much to be done, in spiritual work how vast the field! How many dying all around about us without one word of comfort! We want more Abigails, more Hannahs, more Rebeccas, more Marys, more Deborahs consecrated—body, mind, soul—to the Lord who bought them.

VI. Once more I learn from my subject

THE VALUE OF GLEANING.

Ruth going into that harvest-field might have said: "There is a straw, and there is a straw, but what is a straw? I can't get any barley for myself or my mother-in-law out of these separate straws." Not so said beautiful Ruth. She gathered two straws, and she put them together, and more straws, until she got enough to make a sheaf. Putting that down, she went and gathered more straws, until she had another sheaf, and another, and another, and another, and then she brought them all together, and she threshed them out, and she had an ephah of barley, nigh a bushel. Oh, that we might all be gleaners!

GOLDEN OPPORTUNITIES.

Elihu Burritt learned many things while toiling in a blacksmith's shop. Abercrombie, the world-renowned philosopher, was a philosopher in Scotland, and he got his philosophy, or the chief part of it, while, as a physician, he was waiting for the door of the sick-room to open. Yet how many there are in this day who say they are so busy they have no time for mental or spiritual improvement; the great duties of life cross the field like strong reapers, and carry off all the hours, and there is only here and there a fragment left, that is not worth gleanings. Ah, my friends, you could go into the busiest day and busiest week of your life and find golden opportunities, which gathered, might at last make a whole sheaf for the Lord's garner. It is the stray opportunities and the stray privileges which, taken up and bound together and beaten out, will at last fill you with much joy.

There are a few moments left worth the gleanings. Now, Ruth, to the field! May each one have a measure full and running over! Oh, you gleaners, to the field! And if there be in your household an aged one or a sick relative that is not strong enough to come forth and toil in the field, then let Ruth take home to feed Naomi this sheaf of gleanings: "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." May the Lord God of Ruth and Naomi be our portion forever!

THE philanthropist whose portrait appears on page 508 is a manufacturer engaged in business at Bradford, Yorkshire, England. He was, at the outset of his commercial career, impressed with the appalling prevalence of intemperate habits among the workmen of the country, and he set himself to fight the evil in his own way. Saturday night is the great night for drinking in England, because the majority of the workmen are paid on Saturday, and they call at the saloon on their way home, and leave there a large portion of their week's earnings. Considering this fact, Mr. Holden determined to compete with the saloons by places where there should be more enjoyment and no temptation. He opened every Saturday evening St. George's Hall, an immense building, capable of holding 4000 people, where he provided high class entertainments at a nominal charge for admission. These have now become a permanent "institution" of the town.

Some time ago Mr. Holden established a number of dining-rooms, where the working classes could be supplied with cheap and wholesome food during the day, and in the evening find a place for rational amusement, where there was no intoxicating drink. He has also organized other original schemes for alluring the people from the places where liquor is sold, and providing them with recreation which does not involve temptation to drink intoxicating beverages. All these efforts have involved a heavy outlay, which Mr. Holden has cheerfully borne, besides contributing largely to temperance societies, especially to the Prohibition movement called the United Kingdom Alliance.

A REMARKABLE FAITH-CURE.

AMONG the interesting incidents published in the current number of Triumphs of Faith, by Miss Carrie Judd, of Buffalo, N. Y., is the following, which we condense:

LUNG TROUBLES.

Mrs. Belle D. Lewis, of San José, Cal., writes that, for many years she had been a sufferer from sickness consequent on the delicate state of her lungs. A slight cold would develop into pneumonia, and she was evidently on the road to consumption. She says:

"One day while studying a Bible lesson, in looking up references, I came to these verses (James 5: 14, 15), 'Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.' These words impressed me very much. I could not get rid of the thought and feeling that they were a command to me. But I reasoned with myself on the subject. I thought there would be no use in thinking of following the instruction given there, for, I thought, no one believes that means now, and every one would think I had lost my mind. I thought of all the people I had known—of all the ministers I knew who had sickness in their families, and I did not know one who had ever followed those instructions. So, I thought the ministers ought to know better than I, and I kept on trying to get rid of the troublesome thought. But I could not. I had become very weak. Often not able to walk from one room to another. I had to be carried about, not able to walk or ride at all. One morning when I was feeling brighter and better than usual, my husband carried me and put me in the buggy at the kitchen-door, and drove round to the front, only a few yards, and helped me out there. I was exhausted and was very much worse after the exertion. Nearly all hope of ever being well again was gone. My life seemed very near the end.

"I felt that the time had come when I must decide one way or the other. I believed that the Lord had commanded me to do this thing, and I felt that if I decided not to do it, I was turning away from Him, and that I need never expect any favor from Him again. Oh, how tender and kind He was, begging and persuading me so gently to come. I put Him off. I did not decide.

"The next day I felt as though I was lost—like a lost soul. My Lord was gone and I had no power to call Him back. I had no power to believe. I had grieved the Holy Spirit away. I was miserable. I felt that if He should ever return I must not again put off my decision.

"That evening I was alone again. I was reading in the New Testament, but found nothing there for me. But I dared not put off my decision again; I kneeled down and called on the Lord for help, and at last I surrendered my will to the Lord's. I told the Lord that I was His, to do with me as He pleased; and I would do whatever He commanded if He would help me. Satan said: 'But what are you going to do about it? you don't believe that the Lord is going to make you well, you know you don't; what are you going to do about it?'

"There was no noise, no sound to my ears, but the conversation seemed as real as any I ever heard. I answered: 'But I must believe, and I will believe; I raised my heart to God for help to believe, and I said, 'I will believe.' When I had said that three or four times, I could say, 'I do believe. Then, immediately, just when I said, 'I do believe,' a strange thrill went all through me with great force, and I knew that the Lord Jesus was already working in me with His healing power. Nearly all night that working continued. In the morning I felt well and strong. I felt as if I could do anything; I hadn't felt that way for years. I felt like a new being. I told my husband of it when he came home at night, and I told him in the morning how well I was and how strong I was. To try my new strength, I got into the buggy with him when he was ready to go, and he took me riding around several blocks. When we got home I got out of the buggy and walked to the house and wasn't tired at all. After that I could walk or ride wherever I wished, if I went in the strength of the Lord; if I tried to do anything in my own strength I found it a failure.

"I have not taken a dose of medicine from that time to this, and do not expect to as long as I live. The Lord is sufficient for me, as I have proved.

"It will perhaps not be out of place to say here that we have also given our children to Him in the same way, and they, as well as myself, trust Him for health and strength, and He never fails us."

DR. SOMERVILLE'S EASTERN TOUR.

THIS venerable evangelist, whose tour in Bible lands has been noticed from time to time in these columns, has now returned home. At a recent noonday prayer-meeting he thus spoke of his journeyings:

"One thing that has distinguished this tour from the others in which I have been engaged was the number of towns and localities visited that are hallowed in our memories by their connection with the Word of God. Somewhere about thirteen I have visited on this occasion are made mention of in the Bible—Athens, Corinth, Smyrna, Philadelphia, Laodicea, Colosse, Ephesus, Achaia, Bithynia, Thessalonica, etc. The visit was paid not in the way of a tourist's holiday, but with the Word of God on the lips, and for the purpose of casting some handfuls of the precious seeds on the hearts of the people.

"I have been four months in a region blighted by the deadening influences of Mohammedanism—in lands where, though the churches are professedly Christian, and hold the doctrines and traditions of early Christianity, yet darkness and superstition and the most degrading idolatries prevail. Woman especially is in a great measure kept in darkness.

"But what shall I say of the Lord's goodness in giving openings for the spread of the Gospel? Were it not that surprise has been almost taken away from me within the past few years, I would have deemed things that came under my own eye to be incredible. The multitudes who came to listen to the Gospel—Greeks, Armenians, and even Jews—filled me with astonishment. In Constantinople I had twenty meetings with the Armenians. Both Athens and Corinth gave me a cordial welcome, although I was interfered with at Corinth ere long by ecclesiastical authority. Still warm gratitude is due to both of these cities for the way in which they received me.

"I preached in a theatre in Constantinople, a thing never heard of before since the Turks took possession of that great city. All the while I spoke my own language. The power of the word even after interpretation is extraordinary. I had altogether, at various times, about twenty-four different interpreters, who spoke for me in different places. Some people think that interpretation must stand very seriously in the way; but I began to think that interpretation gave an added interest, and rather drew auditors instead of driving them away.

"At Constantinople and Smyrna I had delightful opportunities of addressing brethren who spoke our own language. Missionaries and eminent men came from great distances, even taking ship and crossing an arm of the sea to be present at a meeting to be held at half-past nine in the morning. At Larissa, the capital of Thessaly, a meeting was convened in the open air, at a notice of little over an hour and a half, when six hundred people, mostly men, came rushing to hear the Word. Among these were soldiers, doctors, business men, and three priests, one of whom was a professor. After concluding the tour we agreed to go back to Athens, with the idea of having two meetings there before returning home. I had feared that I could not have an interpreter for Greek, but succeeded in getting an excellent young man from Constantinople, who acquitted himself admirably. At a meeting held at the fifteen pillars of Olympian Jupiter, twelve hundred people came and listened very attentively while I am my interpreter stood upon a table and spoke them."

THE EASTERN OR TURKISH QUESTION
By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard City, Kan.

Light from the East—The Enigma of the Eastern Question—Insignificant Size of Palestine—How the Question is Complicated—The Key to the Solution—A Twofold Subject in Prophecy—The Roman World—The Land of Emmanuel—The Boundaries of the Roman World—The Division of the two Legs—Fulfilled at the time of Constantine—Union and Diversity—1820—Fateful Year for Turkey.

IT is quite natural to look to the Eastern sky as the harbinger of a coming day; the bright tinge of light breaking forth in the clouds gives joy and new energy after a dark and weary night of sorrow and trial; yea, it seems interwove with our thoughts that the East is the place to which we are drawn as by magic power. There the Sun of Righteousness arose, and enlightens world lying in sin; and from there is expected the Coming and the appearance of the King of Israel (Acts 1: 11), the hope of glory.

Looking from that standpoint, "The Eastern Question" is an object full of interest and pathos, of observation and scrutiny. A question which occupied the deepest thoughts and consideration of a Bismarck, Disraeli, Gladstone and of every statesman of Europe, and is still the political enigma of the age.

BOUNDARIES.

The area of country connected with the Eastern Question is but small in comparison with other portions of the globe. "The population of Turkey in Europe is estimated at eight millions, and in Asiatic Turkey thirteen millions (Zoepffle's Lexikon, Leipsig, 1882). Its area in Europe is scarcely sixty-four thousand square miles, and combined with that of Asia Minor, is only a little larger than the Republic of Mexico. If Syria is taken as a whole, it is one seventh smaller than the State of Minnesota, and the Holy Land being in length only one hundred and forty-five miles by eighty miles in its greatest breadth, is less in area than the principality of Wales—not so large as the State of Massachusetts.

UNIQUE QUESTION.

The great obstacle in solving the Eastern Question is not the power of Turkey, neither the area of the Turkish dominion, or of the Holy Land; it lies in the natural location of that area—the religious prestige of its people and the supposed loss of the balance of the political power in Europe and in Asia. It is, indeed, a labyrinth of political entanglement and complication, and, therefore, to examine this subject and to study it in the light of prophecy, is the duty of every Christian at the present time.

THE KEY.

The true key to unravel the future is not to speculate or to advance our own ideas; it is to study the Word of the Ruler of nations, who has revealed to His prophets and servants of old "the hidden things which lie in the bosom of the ages to come." He changeth the times and the seasons; He removeth kings and setteth up kings; He giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding. He revealeth the deep and secret things; He knoweth what is in the darkness, and the high dwelleth with Him" (Dan. 2: 21, 22). It is to the law and to the prophets that even kings, rulers and statesmen are directed to get wisdom, and oh, how would the world have been benefited if it had followed the example of Alexander who inquired at Jerusalem what Daniel the prophet had spoken about the future of Greece and Persia; and, indeed, to that we ought to come, we ought to learn, that the times of the nations commenced with Nebuchadnezzar are now in duration, and that they will be in continuance till "He shall come who has a right to reign, and whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey Him."

TWOFOLD DIVISION.

The Eastern or Turkish Question has a two-fold division, and we remark that the so-called "Roman earth or world" has a different character and territory from "the land of Immanuel" (Isa. 8:8). It is the former that is represented by the metallic image and ferocious beasts whose rule is oppression; the latter, by a disconsolate widow, being left, trodden down and suffering (Lam. 1:4). We learn that the first or Roman Empire should flourish exceedingly, but should be put down and perish. That the latter, should sink in oblivion during a period of ages, and bear the rod of the oppressor; but at last should be re-established and should be called "The first dominion" (Micah 4:8), a sure evidence that Israel shall return to their own land, and, being the hub of the political wheel, shall have the power over the nations. "The dominion shall come to them" (Micah 4:7).

THE ROMAN TERRITORY.

We take first, the so-called "Roman earth." To examine this matter, we have to study the map illustrating the geography of the ancient world, and to know the boundaries of the territories of the nation symbolized in the metallic image as the fourth power exercising world-dominion, as they were at the birth of our Lord Jesus Christ (Luke 2:1), and those which did belong to Rome in the first century of our Christian era. From Britannia to the confines of Mesopotamia, from the Baltic Sea to the great Libyan Desert were the limits of the Roman earth.

It cannot be denied that the province of Thrace, with Byzantium (Constantinople) for its capital, did belong to the dominion of Rome, and is with other parts included in the image of the metallic figure of a human being (Dan. 2:3-45).

That part of the image which is now under consideration is the fourth metal—namely, "iron, and also iron and clay mixed." When the dominion (iron) commenced, there was no division in rule, the reign of Julius Cæsar and Augustus had Rome for its centre. The image called for a division of the two legs of iron, and that prophecy had to be fulfilled. The division of the Roman Empire became an established fact at the time of Constantine, the empire was divided in the Eastern and Western, and Constantinople and Rome became the two capitals of one mighty empire. They had the same Roman character and rule, and although often in antagonism, yet always united in many respects, and at this very day the student of history and prophecy can see the connecting lines between all the nations belonging to the so-called prophetic earth. The more we study that prophecy of the metallic figure as a unit, and yet a diversity, the more we have to come to the conclusion that only Jehovah could produce and set before us such an exact figure, answering to every development in the political history of the nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It must be called "Ve plus ultra" of all that is found in the pictorial gallery of the Old Testament prophecies.

We must always keep before our mind that the metallic figure (Dan. 2) and also the four beasts (Dan. 7) cover the whole ground, and represent the whole time between Nebuchadnezzar and the ending of "the times of the Gentiles"; there is no interim or hiatus between the end of the ten toes and the beginning of the kingdom of the Son of Man.

The history of Mohammed and the Mohammedan power is not a real part of the image, it is only an additional occurrence, in which an interloper from Arabia becomes connected with it, whose prowess is that of iron and oppression, but whose end will be destruction and a return to Arabia.

It is a comparatively short period of time that the Turks are possessors of Constantinople. It was in 1453, only forty years before America was discovered, that Constantinople was taken by conquest, and that the Eastern or Greek Empire came to its end.

THE MEMORABLE YEAR.

The year 1820 will always be known as a year of remembrance. The death-knell of the Turkish power was sounded in the naval battle of Navarino, and the deliverance of Greece and the establishment of a Grecian kingdom were the happy results. From that day and year the power of Islam has been waning; the Crescent has fallen in Europe and Algeria, Tunis, and the northern coast of Africa has been virtually lost to "the Sublime Porte," now called "the Sick Man."

The whole area of old Illyricum, Dacia, and Macedonia has been wrested from Turkey, and that Thrace and Masia will become free is only a matter of time. That Constantinople will be conquered is decreed by the Ruler of nations, the whole image of Daniel will be eventually restored. Already the tendency toward a reconstruction of the Roman world is witnessed in the changes resulting from the late Prussian war, and by the conference held in Berlin. Truly the study of geography in connection with prophecy is a field worthy the deepest researches of the greatest minds of the age.

(To be concluded.)

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"Father, Why Don't You Pray?"—At a recent meeting a Christian worker related: "A little boy who had just finished his nightly prayer, which he never allowed to miss, opened his eyes, and looking at his father, said, 'Father, father, why don't you pray?' The inquiry went right to the man's heart; he could not meet the eyes of his child that were so earnestly fixed upon him waiting for a reply. Kneeling by the child's bedside he prayed to the Lord for the first time for many years, and found pardon."

"Going to Heaven Together.—An Evangelist said: 'I was speaking to a man in a meeting who professed to accept Christ as his Saviour. But to prove if he were really in earnest I said, 'When you go home will you have family worship?' Rather unwillingly he promised he would. On the following day I called to see if he had kept true to his promise, and to my inquiry his wife said, 'Yes, he came home last night and told us that he was a changed man, and that from this time forward he was going to have family worship.' His little girl, who had never seen him read the Bible before, said, 'Father, you are going to heaven now, and we will all go together.'"

"An Awakened Culpit.—Mr. Rodgers Related that a young man was put into prison for breaking one of the laws of the country. While he lay in prison waiting his trial his conscience spoke loudly to him. 'I will plead guilty,' he said, 'so for I know I am in the wrong.' On the following day, when he was taken before the judge, and the usual question of guilty or not guilty was put to him, he replied, 'Guilty, my lord.' The judge, looking at him, said: 'Young man, as a man I pity you, as a friend I sympathize with you, but as a judge I condemn you.' Ah! friends, he was condemned because he had no one to take his part; but, thank God, Christ has atoned for all our sins when He was hanging on the cross and cried, 'It is finished.'"

"Disloyal Wife.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: 'A man left this country and went abroad for the purpose of improving his circumstances. His family he left in this country, intending to take them out when he had a comfortable home ready for them. Many kind and affectionate letters did his wife send to him, as he thought, to encourage him in his work. He kept all these letters by him, so dearly did he prize the messages of love from home. At length he sent for his wife and family. He eagerly counted the weeks that would elapse ere he could welcome them to their new home. At length the vessel arrived. The doctor went on board to examine the passengers, and this man stood anxiously waiting his return from the vessel, and when the doctor came ashore he asked him if Mrs. Price were ill. 'I cannot tell you here,' replied the doctor, 'but if you will come home with me I will let you know.' After the doctor had read over the list of passengers, he said, 'There is no such person on board.' 'There must be some mistake, I cannot believe it,' replied the man, and again returned to the vessel's side and watched the passengers as they came on shore. He saw three old friends come on shore, and asked them if they had heard or seen anything of his wife. They tried to evade the question by speaking of other things, but finding he would not be put off they said, 'Your wife has gone away with another man, and your children are all following their mother's example, and are fast going to the bad.' A crushed and broken-hearted man he went home and burned all the letters that he had treasured so highly, and thought no more of his unfaithful wife. Dear friends, in a spiritual sense there are many like this unhappy woman."

"Crying for Mother's Kiss.—Mr. McLaughlan observed: 'Miss McPherson, who has been so greatly blessed and owned of God, on one occasion noticed a ragged and homeless little child in the street. She took it home and washed and dressed it with her own hands. After she had done the little one began to weep. 'What is the matter?' asked Miss McPherson, brushing away the tears. 'Is it through gratitude you are weeping?' 'No,' sobbed the child, 'it is not that. When mother was alive and washed me, she always gave me a kiss, and you have given me none.' Miss McPherson, kindly folding the little one in her arms, said, 'I will give you two kisses.' The child was placed in the Homes, and has grown up to be a bright example of what Christian love can effect, and a striking proof of the transforming power of the grace of God."

"How the Chapel was Filled.—A Baptist minister once complained to Mr. Spurgeon that he had no conversions in his church, and that it was not well attended. 'When you enter the pulpit do you expect conversions?' asked Mr. Spurgeon. 'No,' was the reply. 'I never look for them.' 'Well,' said the great preacher, 'the next time you are going to preach, tell the Lord that your sermon is intended to be the means of converting the people, and look for the result at the close of the service.' On the following Sunday, the minister did as he was advised, and the result was that at the close of the service there were two persons anxious about their souls, waiting to be spoken with in the vestry. The next Sunday there were twelve. Quite a revival took place in his church; and now, not only has his church filled to the doors, but there are souls saved at every service."

"Saved from a Suicide's Doom.—Baillie Ross said: 'At a recent meeting I heard a man give the following testimony. He said: 'Some time ago I was one of the worst drunkards in Glasgow. My life was embittered by my own sinful ways. I thought there was no hope for me, and that I could never be reclaimed. One night I was on my way to the Clyde, with the full intention of drowning myself, and thus putting an end to this miserable life, when I heard a company of people singing a sweet Gospel hymn. I stood and listened until the hymn was ended, when one of the company opened his Bible and read Isaiah 1:18, 'Though your sins be as scarlet,' etc. Ah, I thought, there is something that will save me now. Neither the Good Templars' obligation, nor signing the pledge did me any good. That night I stayed until the end of the meeting, and gave myself to the Lord, and now, though I should see an ocean of drink I have not the least desire to touch it. God has not only saved me through faith in the atoning work of Christ, but He has kept me for seven years.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Funeral of General Grant Will Take place on Saturday next, which day will be observed throughout New York State as a legal holiday. At the request of Mrs. Grant, President Cleveland has named the pall-bearers. They are: General William T. Sherman, Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan, Admiral David D. Porter, Rear-Admiral John L. Worden, General Joseph E. Johnston, of Virginia; General Simon B. Buckner, of Kentucky; Hamilton Fish, George S. Boutwell, George W. Childs, John A. Logan, George Jones, the proprietor of the New York Times, and Oliver Hoyt. The Confederate officers were appointed at the express request of Mrs. Grant and the family. The place of interment has been changed from Central Park to Riverside Park in New York, at the suggestion of the Mayor. Many considerations determined the change, the chief one being that such a monument as it is proposed to rear at his tomb would be out of place among the statues in Central Park, while Riverside Park, being a new park of rare beauty, would have its future dominated by the tomb and monument, and would be wholly dedicated to the memory of the illustrious general. A committee has been formed, with ex-President Arthur as chairman, to collect subscriptions for a national monument. It is intended to spend at least half a million dollars upon it, and arrangements are being made to have every State in the Union participate in the subscription. General Grant's body has been embalmed, and the work is pronounced perfect. The face looks younger by ten years than when he died, the strained look of long suffering having given place to an expression of rest and peace. Large numbers of personal friends have travelled to Mount McGregor to take a farewell look at the familiar features. New York City has the appearance of a city of mourning, the public buildings, offices, and stores being heavily draped more generally as well as more tastefully than when General Garfield died.

Secretary Whitney has Proposed to Mr. Roach's assignees that they shall have an amicable consultation with himself and the Attorney-General, with the view of arranging the difficulty of the contracts on a business basis. The published statements that Mr. Roach's failure is due to the action of the government have no doubt prompted this proposal. So far as the Dolphin is concerned, Mr. Roach had already received $184,000 more than was due him of the purchase-money when Mr. Chandler quitted office, and only $26,270 remained to be paid to complete the account. One of Mr. Roach's friends states that it was the fear of being sued for the amount he had received which led him to make the assignment. It may be presumed that if the conference is held the Secretary will insist on cancelling the clause relieving the contractor from responsibility for steam power and speed. That is the clause which the Attorney-General regards as vitiating the contract for the Dolphin and the unfinished cruisers. The navy to-day is in so deplorable a condition that it is imperative that the ships be completed promptly, either by Mr. Roach or some other contractor.

A Disquieting Statement Comes from the Department of the Interior. The count recently ordered to be made of the Indians at the Fort Reno Agency in the Indian Territory reveals serious irregularities. The rations have been distributed during the past ten years on the basis of the census of 1874, which placed the number at 3995 Cheyennes and 2366 Arapahoes—6271 in all. The new count shows that there are only 3169 Cheyennes and 1390 Arapahoes, or 4469 in all. Whether the 1874 figures were correct, or there has been a rapid decrease since that date, does not appear; but it is evident that rations for 1802 people are being issued unnecessarily. The estimated loss of the government is $92,000. The agent at Fort Reno has resigned, and a count at the other agencies is to be held.

Four American Steamship Companies Joined the Pacific Mail last week in refusing to carry the mails after August 1st. This was an attempt to compel the Postmaster-General to distribute the subsidy of $400,000 authorized by Congress. It is not clear to the public why Mr. Vilas does not find some way of complying with the obvious intention of the act, but that he is acting on principle was proved by his offering the companies three times the amount they have been receiving during the past year. He offered them at the rate of $1.60 per pound, which is a higher rate than that paid for the Atlantic mails, and is sixty-three per cent higher than Great Britain pays. He will in future arrange for the despatch of the mails by foreign steamers. This is a matter for regret, as the country reaps indirect advantage in commerce from the maintenance of the steamship lines. The higher rates paid for mail matter than for ordinary freight is an important consideration to companies engaged in this precarious business. It may be hoped that this unhappy dispute will be adjusted.

The Trial of Riel, the Leader of the Rebellion in Canada, was finished on Saturday last. The jury was absent an hour, and returned with a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy. The foreman cried like a child when he announced the verdict. Riel remained on his knees praying until the verdict was announced, then jumped up, looking pale but calm. After the verdict of guilty was rendered, Riel was asked if he had anything to say why the sentence should not be passed. He spoke two hours, reviewing the half-breed grievances since 1869. The judge said that none of the reasons he offered had any weight, and he advised the prisoner to prepare for the end, and sentenced him to be hanged on the 18th of September next, at Regina.

Sir Moses Montefiore, the Eminent Jewish philanthropist, who celebrated his hundredth birthday in October last, died on Tuesday, July 28th, at his residence in Ramsgate, England. He died calmly, surrounded by relatives and friends, and conscious to the last moment. The Hebrew services were repeated to him, he giving answers correctly. His great anxiety was lest he should die leaving some good work unfinished through inadvertence, and he several times asked his secretary and friend, Dr. Loewe, whether all the work was done, moving his fingers at the same time to show he could still hold his pen to sign cheques. At his funeral on Friday an unprecedented scene was witnessed. The town was crowded with visitors from all quarters, who travelled there to pay respect to his memory. All stores were closed, and the inhabitants thronged the street in which he lived and the place of interment, so that it was difficult to make a passage for the funeral procession. Every one wore some sign of mourning. The procession was a mile in length, owing to the number of deputations which came from public bodies. The coffin was buried beside that of Lady Montefiore, and so placed that the head rested upon a stone brought from Jerusalem. In the coffin had been placed many relics of Lady Montefiore and the Holy Land, together with an account of the good works of the deceased. Over the coffin, as the relatives and friends passed, each scattered a handful of earth from Rachel's grave in the Holy Land.

The Cholera has made its Appearance in Marseilles. Among the deaths reported on Saturday was that of the Portuguese Consul, who was buried immediately. The municipal council of the city was thoroughly alarmed by the mortality of Saturday, and the fifty-seven deaths which occurred on Sunday, and voted the sum of $20,000 for cleansing and disinfecting the worst parts of the city. The reports from the stricken districts of Spain are appalling. The European correspondent of the New York Times, telegraphing at the close of last week, said: "Refugees from Barcelona declare that the plague is spreading daily through the Catalan Provinces, with a high death rate, but no cases have been reported officially. Including those of Thursday, there have been fully 35,000 deaths in Spain. The official figures are 33,937, but it is obvious that these are below the mark. There seems to be a decrease in the ratio of mortality to the total of cases, but the wide spread of the pest more than makes up. The disease seems at last to have got a foothold in Madrid, and the next week is likely to see a great increase there."

A New Impetus to the Agitation Aroused by the disclosures of the Pall Mall Gazette was given last week by the discovery that the boys at Eton, the highest class school in England, are leading vicious lives. A number of depraved women are being supported by the boys in a neighboring city. A large number of the boys have been sent home, and advised not to return. The authorities of the school refrained from publicly expelling them, because boys expelled from Eton are forever ineligible for appointment in the army, the navy, or the church, and have their prospects in life hopelessly wrecked. Many of the boys are connected with the highest English families, and every one of them was supplied with an amount of pocket money equal to an ordinary man's entire income. On Sunday Dr. William Thomson, Archbishop of York, addressed an audience of men, and denounced the conspiracy of silence by which it had been sought to weaken the revelations. He said that this was not a party question, but that it was the duty of the whole nation to stamp out this rampant and horrible vice.

The Failure of the Munster Bank, which has caused widespread distress in Ireland, now appears to have been due to the misconduct of Robert Farquharson, the joint manager. He was present at the meeting of shareholders on July 28th, but on the following day he could not be found. A warrant has been issued for his apprehension, charging him with embezzling $50,000. This sum he entered as having been remitted to the Union Bank of London. The entry was a lie. The first suspicion was when the official examiner on Tuesday found a half-erased pencil entry. While talking about this Farquharson left the room on a plausible pretext, and took a cab to his house in Leeson Park. He hurriedly took a pair of boots and overcoat and drove away. His books, examined since his departure, show defalcations amounting to $350,000.

The First Denomination to Consider the Propriety of substituting the Revised for the Authorized Version is the Reformed Presbyterian. The General Synod of that Church has appointed a committee of leading ministers to examine the Revised Old and New Testaments and report whether it is wise and expedient for that body to recommend the same for use in public worship, or private, or both.

The Rev. E. W. Oakes Returned from a Successful evangelistic tour in Ireland on July 26th. The first services of his mission were held, at the earnest request of the committee, in the rooms of the Y. M. C. A. at Belfast. The crowds attending necessitated the use of the large hall, which was thronged every evening by young men from the business houses of the city. A large number of conversions took place. Lisburn was the next place visited, and there the blessing was continued in a very signal manner. Thence Mr. Oakes went to Portadown, having been invited to hold a week's services in the First Presbyterian Church, and there a large number of people came forward to make a profession of faith, among whom were several of the leaders of society in the city. A series of services in Londonderry and another in Coleraine were also much blessed; some of the conversions which took place at those meetings were a genuine surprise to the public. Mr. Oakes has gained in health by his trip, and is preparing for evangelistic work in this country with renewed energy after his much-needed rest.

A Young People's Christian Convention was held at Ocean Grove, July 17-19th. It was under the supervision of Messrs. Ytman and Geistweit, evangelists, who conducted the daily young people's meeting last year. Much interest was manifested in the proceedings. The convention closed with a powerful address on "Power for Service," by the Hon. Chauncey Shaffer, of New York. The daily meeting is the largest of its kind in the country. Every morning at nine o'clock, continuing for one hour, a young people's temple, with a capacity of seating a thousand persons, is filled, and during the month of August the crowds are so great that persons over forty years of age are requested to remain outside. Even then the audience fills chairs, seats, aisles, windows, and every available space. Last year over two hundred conversions were noted in this meeting.

Dr. Edward Judson is now well on his way to the Congo. In a private letter from him, under date of Queenstown, July 1st, he says: "I shall be off as soon as possible for the Congo Valley, the plan being to sail in the same ship with Mr. Stanley. The first one hundred and ten miles of the Congo are navigable; then comes a portage of one hundred and eighty-five miles around the Livingstone Falls, and then we have one thousand miles of the Congo navigable, and a nice little steamboat at our disposal."

The Rev. Newman Hall, who Recently Visited this country, referred to the remarkable faith cures now being witnessed, in the course of a recent sermon, in England. He said it was admitted, on the highest Christian authority, that miracles were a feature of the Apostolic Church, and that the power of working miracles remained in the Church long after apostolic times. It was claimed by the Waldensians and the Moravians, not to speak of the Catholic Church, that miracles were performed in answer to prayer. If it was the good pleasure of God, why should it not be so? What He had done He could do again. He produced a profound impression by instancing the case of his own mother, who, in answer to his father's prayer, was brought back miraculously from the jaws of death.

Cyclone Cellars are being Constructed in large numbers throughout the Mississippi Valley. The frequent recurrence of terrific wind storms in that locality has led to the necessity of devising some safe refuge for the people. The best yet planned are cellars or dug-outs, separate from the dwelling itself, but near enough to it to be easily accessible upon the sudden alarm of the cyclone. The precaution is a wise one, and has already saved many lives. Not unfrequently a family taking refuge in one of these subterranean strongholds come forth half an hour later to find their home a heap of ruins, or, perhaps, swept away bodily from the face of the country. Every living thing in the track of the tornado, unless provided with a near place of refuge, must succumb to the awful force of nature. If the owner of a house, at great cost to himself, provided his tenants with such a cyclone cellar, and the tenant, being warned of the approach of a cyclone, declined to use the refuge, preferring to "take his chance," he would be regarded as foolish and wicked; yet that is precisely what sinners are doing in neglecting the refuge God has prepared for them in Christ against the storm that is surely coming (Isa. 4: 5, 6).

A Lady's Sight was Strangely Restored in San Francisco recently. The San Francisco Alta says that a lady residing in that city was attacked many years ago by neuralgia, and afterward with congestion of the brain. After her recovery she was unable to open her eyes, and became, as the physicians said, hopelessly blind. Expert surgical attendance failed to effect any relief. Recently the sudden and alarming cry of "fire" rang from the lips of one of her daughters. Realizing her imminent peril, she rose to her feet, and tried to look around. The long unused nerves responded to her will. The alarm proved to be without foundation, but the fright it caused restored her sight. In an interview with a physician, the reporter of the Alta learned that it was probable that during the long time the lady had suffered from neuralgia the optic nerves had become weakened, and a loss of nervous current had ensued which was partially restored by the sudden shock which the fright produced. The lady is now enjoying her recovered vision. Spiritual blindness also sometimes yields when spiritual peril is realized. It is not the highest kind of motive that impels a man to seek Christ to be saved from perdition, but there are some men not to be won by love. Only when they realize that they are in danger of being lost forever are they able to see Christ as their Saviour (Acts 2: 37).

A Remarkable Prediction not Credited when uttered is being fulfilled now. One year after the close of the war, when the sectional feeling was very bitter, the late Admiral Semmes delivered a lecture, in the course of which he astonished his audience by declaring that a time would come when the bitterness of sectional feeling would wear away, and that eventually each section would feel a common property in the men of the other section who had achieved renown. "A time would come," said he, "when we should consider their fame as a property of our common country; when we should cease to regard them as representatives of a section, and recognize them as Americans." A Southern journal recalls the prediction now, and adds that the death of President Garfield opened one spring of sympathy; time has healed some wounds, generous rivalries and mutual interests have drawn the poison from others. The outburst of universal sympathy to-day over the bier of the dead ex-President and General makes us feel that if the prediction—which seemed almost a mockery then—is not already realized, the realization is at hand. It is remarkable that death should be the chief agency that has led to this beneficent result. It is so in God's great work of redemption. The way of reconciliation between Him and the world was opened by the death of His Son (Rom. 5: 6-10).

A Stolen American Boy has been Discovered in Holland. In 1878 a boy, ten years old, named Thomas McCue, was stolen from his home in Cleveland, Ohio. For seven years his parents have sought him diligently, but unsuccessfully. Two weeks ago a cable-message was received from the Rotterdam police, stating that the boy was in that city, and would sail for America immediately. On Friday last he arrived in New York, and was sent on to Cleveland. He said that when he was carried off, seven years ago, he was taken East, and put on board ship. He was taught acrobatic feats and sleight-of-hand tricks by his principal abductor, who proved to be a circus man. Thomas had some talent, and he soon became proficient. His captor joined a circus, and Thomas was obliged to perform in the ring. He did well at the first performance, and the applause of the spectators pleased him. The troupe began a tour of the Dutch Provinces. Thomas's master took good care of him at first, but afterward was cruel to him, starving and beating him. He began to long for his home, but knew not how to reach it, even if he could escape. At last, in Rotterdam, the man beat him publicly, and the spectators interfered. Thomas told his story to the police, who have now restored him to his family. That is the way Satan treats his captives, feeding them with public applause and prosperity at first, but afterward keeping them in misery. Happy are they who are directed how to escape to their Father's house (Luke 15: 13-18)!

How the Captain of a Steamtug Chased a Star is told by the Chicago Inter-Ocean. The captain, who recently returned to Chicago, related the incident himself, knowing well that it was too good a joke against himself to be kept secret. He said that his voyage had been fruitless. He left Chicago soon after midnight to go down the lake to find a tow. Shortly before daylight the captain espied a bright light, which bore due north from the boat. The light was, to his fancy, that of a vessel, and he started his boat in the direction of the light at a furious speed, seeing in it a chance to make an early tow. The tug's speed was not slackened for half an hour, yet the light seemed to be no nearer than when she started. The engineer was ordered to "fire up" so often that the boat was more like a hot furnace than a vessel, still the light was as far distant as ever. Presently daylight broke, and the captain began to look ahead in eager expectancy, for he believed that he would see a vessel. Instead, however, he saw nothing but a wide expanse of blue waters, radiant with the first glow of the morning sun. Then, and not until then, did he realize that he had been chasing a will-o'-the-wisp, and that the supposed vessel's light was the glorious morning star. In the affairs of life mistakes the reverse of this are often made. The eager young searcher after truth, guided by philosophy, steers for an object which he thinks is heavenly, but is disappointed by finding it only an earthly one, after all (Eccles. 8: 16, 17).

A Marriage was Averted by a Young Lady's credulity, according to a statement published last week by the New York Times. That journal says that a young lady was engaged to a wealthy young manufacturer. The day was set for the marriage; the guests were invited. But a few days before the day appointed for the wedding, the prospective bride learned that the firm to which her betrothed belonged was insolvent. She immediately wrote him a letter breaking the engagement and bidding him farewell. It was sent off in the greatest haste, as there was no more time to stop the preparations for the wedding. Two hours after it had been posted she learned that the rumor of the firm's insolvency was false. Accompanied by her parents, she hastened to the Post Office to demand the return of her letter. The postmaster politely declined to give it up. The young lady insisted, but the postmaster remained firm. Appeals, entreaties, tears, wringing of hands, and threats of fainting were all in vain; the polite postmaster had but one answer. The rule admitted of no exception, and the letter was already, in the eyes of the law, the property of the young man. It was sent, and saved him from the great misfortune of marrying a mercenary wife. Evidently the young lady's affection for her lover was not strong enough to bear the test of poverty and possible hardship for his sake. That was a test which Christ expected every one to bear who sought union with Him (Matt. 8: 19, 20).

COMING JUDGMENT OF THE SECRETS OF MEN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my gospel."—ROMANS 2: 16.

Paul's Deliberate Exposure of Filthiness—His Comfort—"My Gospel"—I. A Certain Day of Judgment—Nations Judged—The Great Assize—No Immunity for Nobles—Why it is Delayed—II. God Will Judge the Secrets of Men—Secret Good and Secret Sin—Secrets a Key of Character—III. The Judge—Why Christ Will be Judge—In Vindication of Him—Cavils Prevented—IV. According to the Gospel—Duty of Preaching Christ's Second Coming.

It is impossible for any of us to tell what it cost the Apostle Paul to write the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans. It is a shame even to speak of the things which are done of the vicious in secret places; but Paul felt that it was necessary to break through his shame, and to speak out concerning the hideous vices of the heathen. He has left on record an exposure of the sins of his day which crimson the cheek of the modest when they read it, and makes both the ears of him that heareth it to tingle. Paul knew that this chapter would be read, not in his age alone, but in all ages, and that it would go into the households of the most pure and godly as long as the world should stand; and yet he deliberately wrote it, and wrote it under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. He knew that it must be written to put to shame the abominations of an age which was almost past shame. Monsters that revel in darkness must be dragged into the open, that they may be withered up by the light.

MY GOSPEL.

After Paul had thus written in behalf of himself his chief comfort. While his pen was black with the words he had written in the first chapter, he was driven to write of his great delight. He clings to the Gospel with a greater tenacity than ever. As in the verse before us he needed to mention the Gospel, he did not speak of it as "the Gospel," but as "my Gospel." "God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, according to my Gospel." He felt that he could not live in the midst of so depraved a people without holding the Gospel with both hands, and grasping it as his very own. "My Gospel," saith he. Not that Paul was the author of it, not that Paul had an exclusive monopoly of its blessings, but that he had so received it from Christ Himself, and regarded himself as so responsibly put in trust with it, that he could not disown it even for an instant. So fully had he taken it into himself that he could not do less than call it "my Gospel."

As for myself, looking at the matter afresh, amid all the filthiness which I see in the world at this day, I lay hold upon the pure and blessed Word of God, and call it all the more earnestly, my Gospel—mine in life and mine in death, mine against all comers, mine forever, God helping me; with emphasis—"my Gospel."

Now let us notice what it was that brought up this expression, "My Gospel." What was Paul preaching about? Certainly not upon any of the gentle and tender themes, which we are told nowadays ought to occupy all our time; but he is speaking of the terrors of the law, and in that connection he speaks of "my Gospel."

I. We begin with the solemn truth, that on a certain day

GOD WILL JUDGE

men. A judgment is going on daily. God is continually holding court, and considering the doings of the sons of men. Every evil deed that they do is recorded in the register of doom, and each good action is remembered and laid up in store by God. This session of the heavenly court continues from day to day, like that of our local magistrates; but this does not prevent but rather necessitates the holding of an ultimate great assize. As each man passes into another world, there is an immediate judgment passed upon him; but this is only the foreshadowing of that which will take place in the end of the world.

There is a judgment also passing upon nations, for as nations will not exist as nations in another world, they have to be judged and punished in this present state. The thoughtful reader of history will not fail to observe how sternly this justice has dealt with empire after empire, when they have become corrupt. Colonial dominions have withered to the ground, when sentenced by the King of kings. Go ye and ask to-day, "Where is the empire of Assyria? Where are the mighty cities of Babylon? Where are the glories of the Medes and Persians? What has become of the Macedonian power? Where are the Caesars and their palaces?" These empires were forces established by cruelty, and used for oppression; they fostered luxury and licentiousness, and when they were no longer tolerable, the earth was purged from their polluting existence. Ah me! what horrors of war, bloodshed, and devastation have come upon men as the result of their iniquities!

A WARNING.

We have often laughed among ourselves at the ridiculous idea of the New Zealander sitting on the broken arch of London Bridge amid the ruins of this metropolis. But is it quite so ridiculous as it looks? It is more than possible it will be realized if our iniquities continue to abound. What is there about London that it should be more enduring than Rome? Why should the palaces of our monarchs be eternal if the palaces of Koyunjik have fallen? The almost boundless power of the Pharaohs has passed away, and Egypt has become the meanest of nations; why should not England come under like condemnation? What are we? What is there about our boastful race, whether on this side of the Atlantic or the other, that we should monopolize the favor of God? If we rebel, and sin against Him, He will not hold us guiltless, but will deal out impartial justice to an ungrateful race.

Still, though such judgments proceed every day, yet there is to be a day, a period of time, in which, in a more distinct, formal, public, and final manner, God will judge the sons of men. We might have guessed this by the light of nature and of reason. Even heathen peoples have had a dim notion of a day of doom; but we are not left to guess it, we are solemnly assured of it in Holy Scripture. Accepting this Book as the revelation of God, we know beyond all doubt that a day is appointed in which the Lord will judge the secrets of men.

WHAT AN ASSIZE

will that be! No partiality shall there be seen; there shall be no private conferences to secure immunity for nobles, no hushing up of matters, that great men may escape contempt for their crimes. All men shall stand before the one great judgment-bar; evidence shall be given concerning them all, and a righteous sentence shall go forth from His mouth who knows not how to flatter the great.

This will be so, and it ought to be so; God should judge the world, because He is the universal Ruler and Sovereign. There has been a day for sinning, there ought to be a day for punishing; a long age of rebellion has been endured, and there must be a time when justice shall assert her supremacy. We have seen an age in which reformation has been commanded, in which mercy has been presented, in which expostulation and entreaty have been used, and there ought at last to come a day in which God shall judge both the quick and the dead, and measure out to each the final result of life.

Why doth it not come at once? And when will it come? The precise date we cannot tell. Neither man nor angel knoweth that day, and it is idle to guess at it, since even the Son of Man, as such, knoweth not the time. It is sufficient for us that the Judgment Day will surely come; sufficient also to believe that it is postponed on purpose to give breathing time for mercy, and space for repentance. Moreover, the Lord keeps the scaffold standing till He hath built up the fabric of His Church. Not yet are the elect all called out from among the guilty sons of men; not yet are all the redeemed with blood redeemed with power and brought forth out of the corruption of the age into the holiness in which they walk with God. Therefore the Lord waiteth for a while. But do not deceive yourselves. The great day of His wrath cometh on apace, and your days of reprieve are numbered.

II. Now I call your attention to the fact that "God will judge"

THE SECRETS OF MEN."

This will happen to all men, of every nation, of every age, of every rank, and of every character. The Judge will, of course, judge their outward acts, but these may be said to have gone before them to judgment; their secret acts are specially mentioned, because these will make judgment to be the more searching. By "the secrets of men," the Scripture means those secret crimes which hide themselves away by their own infamy, which are too vile to be spoken of, which cause a shudder to go through a nation if they be but dragged, as they ought to be, into the daylight. Secret offences shall be brought into judgment; the deeds of the night and of the closed room, the acts which require the finger to be laid upon the lip, and a conspiracy of silence to be sworn. Revolting and shameless sins which must never be mentioned lest the man who committed them should be excluded from his fellows as an outcast, abhorred even of other sinners—all these shall be revealed.

Specially our text refers to the hidden motives of every action; for a man may do that which is right from a wrong motive, and so the deed may be evil in the sight of God, though it seem right in the sight of men. Oh, think what it will be to have your motives all brought to light, to have it proven that you were godly for the sake of gain, that you were generous out of ostentation, or zealous for love of praise, that you were careful in public to maintain a religious reputation, but that all the while everything was done for self, and self only! What a strong light will that be which God shall turn upon our lives, when of human desire and motive shall be as manifest as public acts! What a day will it be, when the secrets of men shall be set in the full blaze of noon! We have managed for our own comfort's sake to blind our eyes somewhat, and we take care to avert our gaze from things which it is inconvenient to see; but we shall be compelled to see all these evils in that day, when the Lord shall judge the secrets of men. I do not wonder that when a certain Rabbi read in the book of Ecclesiastes that God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil, he wept. It is enough to make the best man tremble. Were it not for Thee, O Jesus, whose precious blood hath cleansed us from all sin, where should we be!

The secrets of men will be judged because often the greatest of moral acts are done in secret. The brightest deeds that God delights in are those that are done by His servants when they have shut the door and are alone with Him; when they studiously avoid publicity, lest they should be turned aside by the praise of men; when the right hand knoweth not what the left hand doeth, and the loving, generous heart deviseth liberal things, and doeth it behind the screen, so that it should never be discovered how the deed was done. It were a pity that such deeds should be left out at the great audit. Thus, too, secret vices are also of the very blackest kind, and to exempt them were to let the worst of sinners go unpunished. Shall it be that these polluted beings shall escape because they have purchased silence with their wealth? I say solemnly, "God forbid." He does forbid it; what they have done in secret, shall be proclaimed upon the house-tops.

Is it not certainly true that the secret thing is the best evidence of the man's condition? Many a man will not do in public that which would bring him shame; not because he is not black-hearted enough for it, but because he is too much of a coward. That which a man does when he thinks that he is entirely by himself is the best revelation of the man. That which thou wilt not do because it would be told of thee if thou didst ill, is a poor index of

THY REAL CHARACTER.

That which thou wilt do because thou wilt be praised for doing well, is an equally faint test of thy heart. Such virtue is mere self-seeking, or mean-spirited subservience to thy fellow-man; but that which thou doest out of respect to no authority but thine own conscience and thy God; that which thou doest unobserved, without regard to what man will say concerning it—that it is which reveals thee, and discovers thy real soul. Hence God lays a special stress and emphasis here upon the fact that He will in that day judge "the secrets" of men by Jesus Christ. Oh, friends, if it does not make you tremble to think of these things, it ought to do so. I feel the deep responsibility of preaching upon such matters, and I pray God of His infinite mercy to apply these truths to our hearts, that they may be forceful upon our lives.

III. Another solemn revelation of our text lies in this fact, that "God will judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ." He that will sit upon the throne as the Vice-gerent of God, and as a Judge, acting for God, will be Jesus Christ. What a name for a Judge! The Saviour-Anointed—Jesus Christ; He is to be of all mankind. Our Redeemer will be the Umpire of our destiny.

This will be, I doubt not, first for the display of His glory. What a difference there will be then between the babe of Bethlehem's manger, hunted by Herod, carried down by night into Egypt for shelter, and the King of kings and Lord of lords, before whom every knee must bow! What a difference between the weary man and full of woes, and He that shall then be girt with glory, sitting on a throne encircled with a rainbow! Oh, how we ought to bow before Him now as He reveals Himself in His tender sympathy, and in His generous humiliation! Let us kiss the Son lest He be angry; let us yield to His grace, that we may not be crushed by His wrath.

But I have something to say unto you which ought to reach your hearts, even if other thoughts have not done so. I think that God hath chosen Christ, the Man Christ Jesus, to judge the world that there may never be a cavil raised concerning that judgment. Men shall not be able to say—We were judged by a superior being who did not know our weaknesses and temptations, and therefore He judged us harshly, and without a generous consideration of our condition. No; God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ, who was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. It will be the loving Christ, whose tears, and bloody sweat, and gaping wounds, attest His brotherhood with mankind; and it will be clear to all intelligences that however dread His sentences, He could not be unmerciful. God shall judge us by Jesus Christ, that the judgment may be indisputable.

But hearken well—for I speak with a great weight upon my soul—this judgment by Christ Jesus, puts beyond possibility all hope of any after-interposition. If the Saviour condemns, and such a Saviour, who can plead for us? The owner of the vineyard was about to cut down the barren tree, when the dresser of the vineyard pleaded, "Let it alone this year also;" but what can come of that tree when the vine-dresser himself shall say to the master, "It must fall; I myself must cut it down!" If your Saviour shall become your Judge you will be judged indeed.

Does not this also show how certain the sentence will be? for this Christ of God is too much in earnest to play with men. If He says, "Come, ye blessed," He will not fail to bring them to their inheritance. If He be driven to say, "Depart, ye cursed," He will see it done, and into the everlasting punishment they must go. Even when it cost Him His life He did not draw back from doing the will of His Father, nor will He shrink in that day when He shall pronounce the sentence of doom. Oh, how evil must sin be since it constrains the tender Saviour to pronounce sentence of eternal woe!

IV. I have done when you have borne with me a minute or two upon my next point, which is this; and all this is

ACCORDING TO THE GOSPEL.

That is to say, there is nothing in the Gospel contrary to this solemn teaching. Men gather to us, to hear us preach of infinite mercy, and tell of the love that blots out sin; and our task is joyful when we are called to deliver such a message; but oh, sirs, remember that nothing in our message makes light of sin. The Gospel offers you no opportunity of going on in sin, and escaping without punishment. Its own cry is, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Jesus has not come into the world to make sin less terrible.

Nothing in the Gospel excuses sin; nothing in it affords toleration for lust or anger, or dishonesty, or falsehood. The Gospel is as truly a two-edged sword against sin, as ever the law can be. There is grace for the man who quits his sin, but there is tribulation and wrath upon every man that doeth evil.

"IF YE TURN NOT,

He will whet His sword; He hath bent His bow, and made it ready." With deep love to the souls of men, I bear witness to the truth that he who turns not with repentance and faith to Christ, shall go away into punishment as everlasting as the life of the righteous. This is according to our Gospel; indeed, we had not needed such a Gospel, if there had not been such a judgment. The background of the cross is the judgment-seat of Christ.

The judgment is according to our Gospel, and in times of righteous indignation its terrible significance seemeth a very Gospel to the pure in heart. I mean this. I have read this and that concerning oppression, slavery, the treading down of the poor, and the shedding of blood, and I have rejoiced that there is a righteous Judge. I have read of secret wickednesses among the rich men of this city, and I have said within myself, "Thank God, there will be a judgment-day." Thousands of men have been hanged for much less crimes than those which now disgrace gentlemen whose names are on the lips of rank and beauty. Ah, me, how heavy is our heart as we think of it! It has come like a Gospel to us that the Lord will be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. (1 Thess. i. 8.) The cannot go on forever. Even they that love men best, and most desire salvation for them, cannot but cry to God, "How long! How long! Great God, wilt Thou forever endure this?" God hath appointed a day in which He will judge the world, and we sigh and cry until it shall end the reign of wickedness, and give rest to the oppressed. Brethren, we must preach the Coming of the Lord, and preach it somewhat more than we have done; because it is the driving power of the Gospel. Too many have kept back these truths, and thus the bone has been taken out of the arm of the Gospel. Its point has been broken; its edge has been blunted.

The doctrine of judgment to come is the power by which men are to be aroused. There is another life; the Lord will come a second time; judgment will arrive; the wrath of God will be revealed. Where this is not preached, I am bold to say the Gospel is not preached. It is absolutely necessary to the preaching of the Gospel of Christ that men be warned as to what will happen if they continue in sin. Shall we keep men in a fool's paradise? Shall we lull them into soft slumbers from which they will awake in hell? Are we to become helpers of their damnation by our smooth speeches? In the name of God we will not. It becomes every true minister of Christ to cry aloud and spare not, for God hath set a day in which He will "judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ according to my Gospel." As surely as Paul's Gospel was true the judgment will come. Wherefore flee to Jesus this day, oh sinners. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

NEW LIGHT ON MORMONISM.

By Mrs. Ellen E. Dickinson. Many travellers who have visited Utah, especially those who happen to have friends among the Mormons, have returned with favorable views of the people and their so-called religion. They are impressed with the energy and industry which have changed a desert into a garden, and with the absence in Utah of the vice which, under the name of "The Social Evil," flourishes in all our cities. It is not long since a well-known temperance lecturer, recently returned from Utah, gave utterance in New York to some unstinted laudation of Mormons and Mormonism. Possibly some of our readers may have been astonished by hearing such sentiments, and are doubting whether or not Mormonism is as bad as it is represented. They will doubt no longer if they read Mrs. Dickinson's book. Mormonism is a curse to the country, and it is daily desecrating homes here and in Europe to increase the number of its victims. Beside this, it is a fraud. Mrs. Dickinson clearly proves that fact in this volume. Going back to the earliest origin of Mormonism, she shows how Jo Smith obtained the ideas which he afterward embodied in his Book of Mormon. She narrates the complete history of the romance, "The Manuscript Found," and explains how it was procured by Smith, and how he utilized it in his book. The romance was written by a relative of Mrs. Dickinson, and the original manuscript was for some time in the possession of her grandfather. Her assertion of the plagiarism is supported by evidence of the highest class, which leaves no doubt that the fraudulent religion had an origin worthy of its later developments. The author also traces the history of Mormonism from its rise to the present time, and describes in detail the people, their temple, and its form of worship, with their confession of faith and other interesting particulars. Mrs. Dickinson has devoted much time and labor to the elucidation of the subject, and has collected much information at first hand which has never been published before. Her work, though little more than a plain historical statement, is a vigorous indictment of Mormonism. Pp. 272; $1.25. Published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnall.

BEN HUR:

A Tale of the Christ, by Lew Wallace. This story is an attempt to portray social life, Jewish and Roman, contemporary with the Saviour. It is deeply interesting, furnishing as it does on its fictitious stage a picture of simple family life, and suggesting to the reader the state of feeling which it may be supposed was aroused in the minds of the common people by that greatest of all lives. Here and there—almost incidentally it appears—we catch glimpses of Jesus as He went about preaching and teaching, and a vivid description of the crucifixion closes the volume. The characters are not all Jewish. People of almost all races and nationalities are introduced to the reader. Among them are a fair Egyptian, an Arab chief, a Hindoo, a Greek, and a Roman. In this novel-reading age the author has met the popular taste with a story which directly tends to a realization of the circumstances in which the Redeemer lived His life on earth, and enables us to comprehend in some measure the obstacles which had to be overcome by those who left all and followed Him. The reader is unavoidably led to ask himself the question whether, had he been alive in that day, he would have been found among the disciples of the lowly Nazarene. There are many orthodox Christians in our own time whose vigorous denunciations of the Salvation Army and other agencies for good which are not running on the Church lines, and are not popular among the wealthy and influential classes, who would, we think, had they lived in the time of Christ, have asked whether any of the rulers had believed upon Him before committing themselves to a cause which found most of its adherents among the poorest and most ignorant classes. MR. W. T. STEAD,

Mr. Angus Holden, the Bradford Philanthropist. (See page 505.)

Editor of "The Pall Mall Gazette."

The fact that "sin is a reproach to any people" (Prov. 14:34), is just now painfully felt by Christian people in England. The great middle class of society, while suspecting that many nobles and millionaires were leading vicious lives, had, until a few weeks ago, no conception of the extent to which the cancer of iniquity had eaten into the vitals of the aristocracy. They knew that there was a great deal of unchastity, drunkenness, and gambling practised, but they did not know that young girls were being entrapped by regularly organized agencies, and handed over, for a definite money payment, to wealthy villains, for the avowed purposes of debauchery. They were not aware that the vice which brought down God's vengeance upon Sodom was being practised by the upper classes of the country, or that mere children were being subjected to torture, to gratify the morbid lust of probates, whom a life of vice had surfeited of common crimes. That their eyes have now been opened to the rotten condition of society, is due to Mr. W. T. Stead, the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, whose portrait appears on this page.

Mr. Stead is a man of remarkable courage; or he would have quailed before an undertaking such as that of exposing and denouncing the wealthy, the influential, and the men who, by a strange misapplication of words, are called "noblemen." It was not a campaign to enter upon lightly, especially when he reflected that the exposure would render him liable to prosecution, and that he might have to be tried by judges like the late Chief-Justice Cockburn and Justice Williams, men who were themselves guilty of the very crimes he was about to expose. Beside that, he would have to incur a kind of public obloquy. A large number of people, some of whom are Christians, like to shut their eyes to iniquity, and to cry, "Peace, peace, where there is no peace." The newspapers, too, as he must have known, would condemn him. It has been seen that the New York Herald, owned by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, is, as might have been expected, much horrified by the exposure, and ridiculed the investigation, and that paper has not been alone in the work of censure. But Mr. Stead was undaunted; he knew of the existence of these crimes, and he had no mind to keep silence. It was of no use appealing to the government. Two influential members of Mr. Gladstone's cabinet are notorious profligates, a third has just ruined the wife of a member of Parliament, and others are, with too good reason, suspected of odious crimes. Mr. Stead felt that the most effectual course was an appeal to the people, who at present are sound at the core. How long they could remain so in a country where the aristocracy are objects of silly reverence and imitation was a question, but for the present there was hope in them. That hope has not been disappointed; the exposure has aroused a storm of indignation which will not easily be allayed, and henceforth titled miscreants, though they have royal blood in their veins, will carry on their detestable crimes at their peril. The light of day has been let in on their lives; they are now watched by the people, and they are made to feel the disgrace of public scorn. It will go hard with the next "noble" scoundrel who is caught stealing, or paying some one else to steal, a poor man's daughter.

The man to whom the British public owes this enlightenment, and who has dared to sound in trumpet tones the note of warning, is the son of a Nonconformist minister. He is thirty-five years of age, having been born in 1850, at Howden-on-Tyne. He was educated by his father, who, owing to the straitness of circumstances common in the homes of Nonconformist ministers in England, found it difficult to spare money for schooling for his children. It was no misfortune to them, for they could not have had a better teacher. Speaking of that education, Mr. Stead recently said: "Pre-eminent among the means by which my father used to quicken our wits and familiarize us with dialectic was the Sunday morning breakfast. Each of us—and in those days they were six, besides father and mother, making eight in all—had to commit to memory one verse of Scripture. At breakfast the youngest began by repeating his verse. Every member of the family had to give his or her interpretation of the text. Since those old days I have had some little experience of discussions with all sorts and conditions of men. I have had to discuss face to face with the foremost men of our time the most pressing questions of our day. But never in my recent experience have I ever had such consciousness of intense mental activity.

But the most valuable training afforded to the future editor was that of his father's sermons. He says: "My father inculcated the most useful habit of remembering the leading points of what we heard. Many a painful moment have I had when I forgot the heads of a sermon. Afterward, when we grew older, we were set to take notes. My brother Herbert taught himself shorthand in this fashion. I, less fortunate, was confined to longhand; but the habit of taking a condensed report of a speech or sermon stood me in good stead in after life. To this hour, if I want a condensed report of a speech, I would rather have my longhand summary than the cut-down report of the most efficient reporter. I have frequently, without taking a single note, been able to dictate or write out three columns of close print report of an interview, to the accuracy of which the person interviewed has given his most emphatic testimony."

As a finish to his education, the future editor was sent for two years to a school at Silcoates. He was then, at the age of fourteen, able to earn his own livelihood. He obtained a situation as clerk in the Russian Consulate, at Newcastle-on-Tyne. Some years later he entered journalism, and his aptitude for the work was soon proved. In 1871, when only twenty-one years old, he became editor of the most influential daily journal in Newcastle. There he made the acquaintance of Mr. John Morley, one of the ablest members of the advanced Liberal party, who quickly recognized his splendid journalistic talents. Mr. Morley subsequently became the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, when Mr. James Greenwood's erratic course in that paper had disgusted the Liberal party. Mr. Morley invited his young Newcastle friend to become his sub-editor, and Mr. Stead accepted. Practically, Mr. Stead was the editor from the time of his arrival in London, for Mr. Morley was busy in other literary work, and was too much in request in the councils of his political party to be often at the office, and sometimes for weeks together he did not know what would appear in its columns, until, with the rest of the public, he opened the paper in the evening. At length Mr. Morley entered Parliament, and then he resigned the editorial chair, and Mr. Stead succeeded him. Under Mr. Stead the paper has grown in power and influence, and will probably continue to grow, in spite of the fact that the Prince of Wales and a few other leaders of society are so much shocked by the recent disclosures that they have stopped their subscriptions. Mr. Stead's reliance is probably on the general public; if he had been writing for the Prince and his friends, he would probably have thought it unnecessary to make the revelation he has done, or, at any rate, to call it "a revelation."

MUTUAL INSTRUMENTALITY.

(See Illustration.)

A PROFLIGATE captain, who commanded a vessel trading between New York and Liverpool, just as he was leaving port took on board a man as a common sailor to serve during the voyage. The new-comer was found to be of a most quarrelsome disposition, and a furious blasphemer. He was wholly ignorant of nautical affairs, or at least counterfeited ignorance in order to escape duty. At length a violent storm arose; all hands were ordered on deck; but all it was feared, would prove too few to save the ship. When the men were busy on deck, the sturdy blasphemer was missing, and the captain went below to seek for him. Great was his surprise to find him on his knees, repeating the Lord's Prayer, with wonderful rapidity, over and over again, as if he had bound himself to countless repetitions. Vexed at what the captain deemed hypocrisy or cowardice, he shook him roughly by the collar, exclaiming, "Say your prayers in fair weather." The man rose, observing, in a low voice, "God grant that I may ever live to see fair weather in which to say them!"

In a few hours the storm heppily abated; a week more brought them to harbor, and an incident so trivial passed quickly away from the memory of the captain, the more easily as the man in question was paid off the day after landing, and went his way.

Four years more had elapsed, during which, though the captain had been often in peril, he continued to pursue a life of profligacy and contempt of God. At the end of this period he was one day walking from the dock, where he had just arrived, to his usual hotel. It was a Sunday morning, and the streets were filled with people on their way to church. As he walked leisurely along he met a friend who had often been his companion in revelry, but who, unknown to the captain, had recently been converted. The captain was bent on hospitality, and insisted that his friend should accompany him to his hotel.

"Well, I'll make a bargain with you," said the friend. "You come with me to church, and I'll go and dine with you."

The captain was ashamed to refuse, so the two friends entered the place of worship together. Already the seats were occupied, and a crowd filled the aisles; they succeeded, however, in reaching a position in front of the pulpit, at about five yards distance.

The preacher riveted the attention of the congregation, including the captain himself, to whom his features and voice seemed not wholly unknown, particularly when he spoke with animation. At length the preacher's eye fell on the spot where the two friends stood. He suddenly paused, still gazing upon the captain, as if to make sure that he labored under no optical delusion, and after a silence of a minute, said, with a loud voice, "Say your prayers in fair weather!" The audience were lost in amazement; nor was it until some moments had elapsed that the preacher recovered self-possession to relate the incident here told.

With deep emotion he told them that the words which his captain uttered in the storm had clung to him by day and by night after his landing, as if an angel had been charged with the duty of repeating them in his ears; he had become convinced of the sin and folly of neglecting to seek God in the time of peace and safety, and throwing himself at the feet of Jesus, implored pardon for the past and grace for the future. Having felt a great desire to devote the remainder of his life to the service of his Divine Redeemer, he had entered the ministry, and was now, though grace, such as they saw and heard. At the conclusion of this address, he called on the audience to join with him in earnest supplication that the same words might be blessed to the conversion of some then present.

A gracious answer was given. The captain was deeply affected, and God's spirit wrought effectually upon him. After the congregation had retired, he was conducted by his friend to the house of the preacher, where he was taught the way of salvation.

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

A Separation.

SYLVIE clung convulsively to me when that dreadful noise alarmed us. What had happened we knew not, but the horrible crash and the succeeding shrieks suggested to us since our recent terrible experience what was probable. I held Sylvie tightly to my breast, not knowing but that in another minute we might both be hurried into eternity. We remained in that attitude, making no attempt to fly, for perhaps a minute or two. In our state of suspense it seemed much longer; and then as the noise decreased I gently disengaged myself from Sylvie's embrace, and said softly to her:

"Sylvie will spare Max for a little while?"

"Yes, go, Max," she murmured; "my other Brother will take care of me."

I kissed her with a strange feeling of delight at her words. Then I went out. It was barely possible to make my way upstairs, for the people were hurrying down in a panic.

"The roof is gone, and the chimneys are falling!" they cried; "it is all on fire; you must not go on."

But I was determined to go on; and Sergeant Klein's voice behind me crying, "Bravo, Max!" encouraged me. He and his men were on duty that night, which was a good thing; for when we reached the attics we found it all true. The top attic and Lisbeth's were quite gone, and the beams of old Hans' room were beginning to blaze. But the buckets were at hand, and in half an hour all danger was over, except of another shell falling in the same place.

"After one or two more of these visitors," said Sergeant Klein, "we must retreat to the cellars." It was sad news I had to take to Lisbeth. Everything she possessed in the world was gone, except the clothes she and Elsie wore, and the bag which held the little vest Elsie was knitting, and which the child would never part with. Lisbeth sat all the rest of the night wrapped up in thought; and early in the morning she took me aside to talk with me a little.

"Max," she said, "I'm afraid I thought too much of my poor things; but they were all I had, and I was afraid to leave them. Now I see I ought to have gone and given my services to nurse the sick and wounded. I am young and strong, and I know I can bear it, though it will be hard enough to see so much suffering."

"Lisbeth," I answered, "stay and nurse Sylvie."

"No, no," she said; "I see that Gretchen is growing more anxious every day, and is afraid to keep any extra mouths. I fancy she has a secret store somewhere; but still she is very careful, and she looks troubled. I would go at once, only there is my Elsie."

"You would trust her with us," I said; yet doubting whether Lisbeth could part with her little child in such a time as this.

"Yes," she answered, her voice trembling, and her eyes filling fast with tears; "yes, Max, I would trust her with you anywhere. Only promise me to let her sit by you at table, and sleep in your room at night, if it is not asking too much of you."

"All right, Lisbeth," I said; "I'll be like a brother to Elsie."

That word "brother" had a new meaning for me now.

"There is not much glory in losing my poor home, Max," she said, trying hard to smile.

"I've given that up," I answered; "it is not any glory. The angels were right when they sang, 'Glorio to God, and peace on earth.' But why does not God make peace on earth?"

"It would be only an outside peace," she said, sighing; "like a father making his children be still by threats and punishments. They must learn from Him that they are brothers before there is true peace."

So Lisbeth went away, taking leave of Elsie as if she was never to see her again. After she had gone the child sat in a little chair beside Sylvie's bed, knitting away slowly with her tiny hands at the white vest she was making to give to the Lord Jesus Christ.

The next day a great load was taken off my mind. I had gone out as usual to look around the Cathedral for my grandmother, so I went on my own account to see the ruins of the Protestant Lyceum, which I liked better than most boys like their school. I was looking at the crumbling walls sadly enough—for it is a strange thing to see familiar places knocked to pieces in such a manner—when I heard a voice calling, "Hallo, young Kromer!"

It was Kleber, one of our oldest students. He wore a uniform, and had an air about him as if he had worn it somewhere else than at home, for he looked years older and more thoughtful than when I had seen him last.

"I thought you had gone, Kromer," he said; "whatever keeps you in Strasburg?"

Then I told him pretty nearly all I have told you—especially about Sylvie, who was weighing the most heavily on my mind just then; and Kleber listened in the friendliest manner.

"You know she has no mother," I said, as I came to the end—and my voice grew thick as I thought of how my mother had left Sylvie to me—and our father is away in Central Africa. I do not know what to do."

Kleber stood silent for a minute or two, thinking; his face was certainly very much changed since he was a student in the Lyceum.

"Kromer," he said at last, "if you could make up your mind to part with your sister, I know a way of getting her out of the city. Our colonel's wife has got a pass from the Governor to leave with her children. She is a German, and has a cousin, an officer in the enemy's camp, so she will be sure to get through. I will beg of her to take Sylvie with her."

"But will she be allowed?" I asked.

"A little girl of hers died last night," he said, "and is to be buried to-day, or they would have been off this morning. Sylvie could take the dead child's place."

It was like that everywhere. You heard of a death from every one who spoke to you. Late in the evening Kleber came to say that Sylvie must be ready at nine o'clock the next morning, when a carriage would stop at the door for her; and that she must take no luggage, beyond a small bundle, such as she could carry in her hand. Gretchen packed up a few things, and my grandmother gave me a purse containing fifty Napoleons, as much as she could spare from her own funds, to give to the lady who was going to take charge of Sylvie.

I could not sleep that night, but sat in Sylvie's room, watching her when she fell asleep a little, and talking to her when she lay awake. I did not know that I should ever see her again; and it was impossible that I should hear of her, after she had left me, until the siege was ended; and who could tell when that would be? She was going away from me, her brother, with a stranger, to a strange place, where she might die, as Louise had died, a lonely, desolate, heart-broken child. No boy that has not gone through it knows what it is to part with his sister like that.

I could hardly take her down-stairs and leave her with a stranger, when the last moment was come, and the carriage stood in the street waiting for her. Gretchen followed us, crying, and my grandmother watched us from the balcony. Two children who were in the carriage were looking out, curious to see their new companion; but the lady sat back in a corner, with a thick veil over her face, and her handkerchief to her eyes.

"Madame," I said, holding Sylvie close to me, "my sister is a little girl, whose mother is dead. She is ill, and full of trouble at leaving us. I beg of you to be very kind to her."

Then the stranger held out her arms, and took Sylvie into them, and gave her a place next to her in the carriage. And the time being up, the door was shut, and the driver set off as rapidly as he could along the encumbered streets.

I ran after the carriage, not expecting to see Sylvie again, but to watch as long as I could what would become of it. It took the road to the south-east gate, the Porte Blanche, through which the Germans entered Strasburg at the end of the siege; and after it had passed through, Sergeant Klein, who had run with me, took me up into a watch-tower on the walls, from which we could trace it for some distance. At last we could see it no longer, and I turned homeward, very downcast for some things, and very glad for others. However, when Sergeant Klein brought us word that the carriage had been allowed to pass through the German camp, and that Sylvie was out of all danger now, I grew so light-hearted and content that I made my grandmother, and even Gretchen, laugh heartily over our supper.

For you must not suppose that all this time we never laughed or had any pleasantness. Gretchen used to be as pleased and proud as possible when she could give us some surprise at dinner. It was very difficult, for there was neither milk, nor eggs, nor fresh meat, nor fresh vegetables to be bought. We were eating the horses and donkeys by this time; only Gretchen cooked them beautifully, and gave them fine names, which amused us.

She certainly had a secret store; for long after potatoes were worth their weight in silver, if not in gold, as she had prophesied, she still provided us with some, roasted so secretly that we knew nothing of them till the moment came for eating them. We never left a morsel, even of the peel; and you might have searched Strasburg with candles for fragments of food thrown away or wasted, and not found any—at least in our part of the city, though they say there was waste still in some of the kitchens of the rich people; but I cannot tell how far that is true. It was a sin and a shame, when there were hundreds, almost, if not quite, dying of famine.

As for Elsie, Gretchen reckoned her in the place of Sylvie, or else she might have grumbled dreadfully about her little extra mouth to feed. She seemed to have forgotten Louise quite, or else her heart was growing very much harder every day. She grieved more over the house and the furniture than over the death and misery of her fellow-creatures. Yet she was a good, faithful servant to us.

I had one grand contest with her, and then I gave in. I was going out one day to our baker's—for poor Gretchen really dared not go—when a tribe of about half a dozen lads pushed past me, looking as hungry as starved rats, with sunken cheeks, and eyes gleaming with famine. That is a look I could never describe to you in any words. One of them, the foremost, had a half-rotten turnip in his hands, held fast between both of them; for the others were following and dodging him about, as birds will do in a hard frost, when one of them gets a good crumb of bread in his beak. He was a little fellow, almost breathless, and with no strength to speak of; and so were all the rest, except one, who was about as big as me, and who had known how to pilfer and pick up for himself better than the others.

Just as I came up he had pinned the little lad in a corner, and was hitting him on both sides of the head to make him drop the turnip. My blood rose at that, and I rushed upon him, giving him a blow which knocked him over like a ninepin; for he, too, was weak and feeble with hunger. Then I placed myself before the little fellow, with my face toward the rest, and said to him over my shoulder, "Eat away; I will take care of you."

But as I stood looking into the face of the lad I had knocked down—a savage, desperate face, made old, very old, before its time—a great rush of pity came over me all at once. What had I done? Would the Lord Jesus Christ have done such a thing as this? It was right for me to protect the helpless; but could it not have been in some other way? This one was my brother also. If I might stretch out my right hand to the Lord, and call Him my brother, He would expect me to stretch out my left hand to this poor, savage, desperate fellow, and call him my brother, too. That is how it seemed to me as I stood looking at him. That is the real, true, universal brotherhood. I think he knew I was growing sorry for him, for he was just going to sink away.

"Stop!" I cried; "are you very hungry?"

"Famished!" he muttered, looking less wolfish, but quite as miserable as before.

"You follow me," I said; and the lad kept close to me all the way to the baker's. It was a long time before I could get my turn; but he never took his expecting eyes off me. When I got my little loaves, I gave one of them to him, and he snatched it from me with a wild, half-mad shout, and darted away at a full run, partly dreading I should change my mind. But I would not have changed it, no, not for all Strasburg.

However, when I reached home with one loaf short, you should have heard Gretchen! I thought her head was turned. It was of no use telling her I meant to go without it myself; that did not pacify her a bit.

"A boy like you will satisfy himself with something," she said; "if it isn't bread, it will be soup, or rice, or potatoes, or something. Don't talk to me. If you mean to provide for all the famishing beggars in Strasburg, I will give up the keys to you at once; and then we shall see! It is as much as I can do now to keep life in you all; and who knows when the end is to come? No succor reaches us; and General Uhrich will see all perish rather than surrender. I've given in about Louise, and I've given in about Elsie; but I'm firm now.

No, no, Max. Make me your faithful promise, here and now, that you will not give away a bit or a drop, without I say 'Yes' to it."

It was a hard thing to do, but I was compelled to do it. Perhaps Gretchen was right; at any rate, she loved my grandmother and me.

Lisbeth was kept hard at work among the wounded; by whom I do not mean only those soldiers who fell under the fire of the besiegers, on the ramparts and in the trenches. There were a good number of those; but besides them there were hundreds of the citizens, who were maimed and mutilated by the bursting of shells and the fall of buildings. Many of them were children, who could not flee quickly enough from any sudden peril. There was a good deal of sickness as well, caused by the famine among the poor people, thousands of whom were homeless, or living in mere sheds built among the ruins. So Lisbeth had as much to do as she could possibly get through; and I thought I saw her face growing paler and sadder, in spite of its quiet smile, every time I saw her.

You remember that all the upper part of our house had fallen a little before Sylvie left us. Yet there was scarcely a house left, in our part of the city, in as good a condition as our own. Still, nothing and nobody could prevail upon my grandmother to quit it; though every day some portion of the roofless walls fell, either inside or outside the building. For though no second shell struck it, it was so shaken by the firing, that it seemed all breaking up, and near its end, like an old man full of troubles and ailments.

At length there was nothing for it but to take refuge in the cellars, and make them as habitable as possible. Sergeant Klein and I went down to look what we could do with them, and Gretchen followed us with evident anxiety. There were three of them, one within the other; the first having a window just below the level of the street. But not a ray of daylight could we have, for a heap of earth was needful over this opening, to protect us from the fragments of any shell which might explode in the street. It would be the safest place we could have; but what with the damp, and the darkness, and the chill, it was a dismal refuge for my old grandmother, who had been used all her life to handsome rooms, and brilliant light, and comfortable warmth.

THE PROPHET OF THE LORD.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 16, 1 Kings 18: 30-46. Golden Text, ver. 36. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Prophet's Attitude—Standing before the Lord—Preaching Little—Doing Little—Counting upon God—The Secret of Elijah's Intrepidity—The Failure of the Test—Elijah's Precautions—His Grand Prayer—His Chief Desire—That the People might Know—At Rest in God—The Prayer for Rain.

How wonderfully at rest Elijah was in the great work accomplished through him! Who was the most powerful preacher in the times of the kings of Israel and Judah? Surely Elijah; and yet, of all the prophets in the times of the kings Elijah preached the least. He did the least, and yet through him God did the most. How did this happen? Because he was so given up to God, and so continually counted upon God. We do not hear much about the man. The first clue we have of him is given in 1 Kings 17: 1: "And Elijah . . . said unto Ahab, As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand." This expression, "Before whom I stand," denotes the servant of some great personage.

The Queen of Sheba said to Solomon regarding his retainers, "Happy are these thy men, happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee" (1 Kings 10: 8). They were the men who were at the service of Solomon. He stood before the Lord, meant a man unreservedly at the service of God, and always in His presence.

If Elijah had taken the responsibility of his mission upon himself, he would have said,

"Now I have got Ahab's ear, I must follow this up, I must see that the impression is deepened, and that something more is done with him." But what did the Lord say? "Get thee hence, and turn thee eastward, and HIDE THYSELF."

That was all he was to do. He had broken the ice. He had spoken to the king, who had been obliged to listen. He had been telling the king the result of his prayers without mentioning his prayers at all; he only said what God told him to say, and then had nothing to do but to hide away out of sight, and that for three and a half years. Was God doing anything all that time? Thank God, He was doing much. We see the result of God's work in the nineteenth chapter, when He told Elijah there were seven thousand in Israel who had not bowed the knee to, or worshipped Baal. Elijah was not the means of a great revival, and yet no doubt he and God had many a talk about it; God did the work; Elijah did nothing but count upon Him.

Elijah was quietly trusting in his God. While Obadiah imagined that God would play him a trick, and catch Elijah away by His Spirit, and that then he would lose his head.

Poor ridiculous man! fearing what might not, and did not happen, like numbers who fear the Lord and treat Him with the greatest suspicion. Oh, how many there are who can deny themselves, can give a large portion of their income to His cause, can work at evangelistic meetings two or three times a day; who can go round and speak to the anxious about their souls, whom God blesses very much—and who yet cannot reckon upon Him in a time of need! They don't think God is always to be counted upon; they think sometimes He may fail them.

Do you think that Elijah's heart beat quicker as the time approached when he was to see Ahab? I do not believe it. I believe he was perfectly at home, perfectly quiet, and at rest. He knew that the Lord God, before whom he stood, was standing exactly between him and Ahab. He knew that if Ahab came with a powerful bodyguard, and directed all his servants to spear Elijah's body, that the living God was equal to the emergency; he had seen God conquer death, how, then, could he be afraid for his life when he had been having such experiences of God in secret? One can understand the fearlessness of Elijah about his life, when one thinks of his stretching himself upon the dead child of that poor widow woman, and praying, "O Lord my God, let this child's soul come into him again," asking a thing that never was known to have been done in the whole history of the world up to that time! One sees Elijah's consciousness that it was possible to match God's strength against death, and that that which had never been reversed in all the ages of the world was possible to God, who was the world's Creator!

Elijah continued counting upon God, while the senseless, deluded prophets of Baal continued crying aloud and stabbing themselves. But all the assembled multitude were witness that "there was no voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded." Total failure was written on all their earnestness, all their efforts, all their prayers. Baal

HAD NOT ANSWERED BY FIRE.

"And Elijah called the people near to him;" there was no mystery, nothing to hide in his relations with the Lord. All he had to do was open and above-board. He repaired the altar of the Lord which was broken down, and by taking twelve stones to represent the twelve tribes of Israel, Elijah claimed them all for God, and made no allowance for Baal. All which he did, he did by faith, and "in the name of the Lord." Elijah knew that he was running no risk in depending upon God, and so, instead of looking out for the dryest wood he could obtain, and which would easily ignite from the smallest spark, he made a trench round the altar, and, after slaying the bullock and laying it upon the wood, he ordered barrel after barrel of water to be poured over, until the sacrifice and the wood were saturated, and there could be no possible way, according to natural law, for fire to be produced under such circumstances.

Thus prepared, Elijah was ready to bring his God to the test. He was sure of his case. He knew God was at work, and that nothing depended upon him. Therefore he was not thinking, "Now, do I feel earnest enough? Have I faith enough for this tremendous venture? God was very good to me about that child, but I wonder whether my faith is up to the mark just now?" No; Elijah was not thinking about himself, his faith, or his prayers; he was thinking about his God. And so he said, "Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at Thy Word" (the prayer and all). When he prayed that it might not rain, it was in obedience to God; he wanted the people to see that he was acting in everything under orders of God. "Hear me, O Lord, hear me that this people may know." Know what? Know what a great prophet, father? No! "That this people may know that Thou art the Lord God." That is what Elijah lived for; that is what Elijah suffered for.

For the sake of praying that one prayer, preaching that one little sermon, and putting his God to the test, Elijah had not thought it lost time to keep off active service for three and a half years, when God chose it should be so. And a great deal more was accomplished than if he had been going up and down through all the villages and towns preaching against Baal. For while he was quiet by the brook, God was converting seven thousand people. And within an hour of the answer to his prayer the prophets of Baal were slain.

The little plain sermon had been preached, the short, pithy prayer had been made which led every thought and expectation away from Elijah to his God. What would happen? "In Elijah there was no manifestation of fervor such as Baal's prophets had evinced, but the fire of the Lord fell, and consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench." There was no mistake about the answer of God. "When all the people saw it they fell on their faces and said, The Lord He is the God, the Lord He is the God." Who was convinced? Not one, nor two, but the whole mass of people—prophets, king, and all. Elijah was while he was at work for Him; while he thus rest, God works. But if we take the initiative, we keep God still until we learn to fall back behind Him.

All was not ended. The people had evidence sufficient that God could send fire from heaven; if He now sent rain they would know from whose hand it came. Elijah had prayed in obedience that it might not rain; now he prayed in obedience that God would send rain upon the earth (James 5: 18). First he warned Ahab, "Get thee up, eat and drink; for there is a sound of abundance of rain." And yet he had not begun to pray; but he was so sure of his case with God, that he could provide for Ahab beforehand. Then he went to the top of Carmel, and hid his face between his knees, and sent his servant seven times to look out for the certain answer. It was not long delayed. The God who had sent fire from heaven soon covered the sky with "clouds and wind, and there was a great rain."

A FULL account of Mr. H. M. Stanley's eventful life appeared in this journal on October 18th, 1883, narrating his history from the time when he was a reporter on the New York Herald to the time of his setting out on his important mission under the auspices of the King of the Belgians in 1879. It is therefore unnecessary to describe here the earlier events in his wonderful career. In concluding the notice referred to, brief mention was made of a work in which Mr. Stanley was then engaged, but of which no particulars were at that time known. It had been simply announced by the press that Mr. Stanley had accepted a commission from the King of the Belgians to found a free State in the country of which he had been the first explorer, but how the work was to be done, and in what form the State was to be founded, no information had been given to the public. The great explorer had plunged into the recesses of that unknown land, and was lost to sight. Recently he has returned, and a few weeks ago there appeared simultaneously on both sides the Atlantic a thrilling narrative of his experience, his work, his perils, his successes, and his plans for the future. This work was published on this side in two handsome volumes.*

It was in May, 1879, that Mr. Stanley set out again for the scene of his former marvellous exploits. The conditions under which this expedition has been performed are very different from those under which he and his men had to run the gauntlet down the river in little more than seven months. In the latter case Mr. Stanley was still the newspaper correspondent whose business it was to do the work he was sent to do and return as quickly as possible to tell his story. In the other case he has been the founder of a State, sent out to the scene of his former explorations to bring peacefully under civilizing influences some hundreds of thousands of square miles with their millions of inhabitants. A German journal, during the sitting of the Congo Congress, referred to him as and with some justice, so far as determination to accomplish his object is concerned, and in the comparative magnitude of his ambition. This deliberate attempt to create a new State, seeing the end from the beginning, is probably unprecedented in the history of the world. No colony has any analogy with it, ancient or modern, and no State of which we have read has ever had such a beginning. It seems clear that the initiative of this great undertaking is due to the King of the Belgians, though its precise shape, and certainly its carrying out, are due entirely to the knowledge, clear-sightedness, tact, and invincible will of Mr. Stanley.

THE ENTERPRISE INAUGURATED.

When Mr. Stanley returned to Europe in January, 1878, he was met at Marseilles by two commissioners from the King of the Belgians, Leopold II., who informed him that King Leopold intended "to do something substantial" for Africa, and that Mr. Stanley was expected to assist him. In the month of November he was invited to the royal palace in Brussels, whither he went, and found there upon his arrival various persons of more or less note in the commercial and monetary world, from England, Germany, France, Belgium, and Holland. The object of the meeting was to learn from Mr. Stanley how much of the Congo River was actually navigable by light-draught vessels, and, in general, the commercial possibilities of the entire region. The result of this and two or three subsequent meetings was the formation of an expedition of which Mr. Stanley was intrusted with the leadership.

The intrepid explorer proceeded immediately to Zanzibar, where he embarked with his party on board the steamship Albion for the Congo. On the morning of August 21st, 1879, the Albion, with Mr. Stanley on board, headed the flotilla of steamers, launches, and lighters in which the expedition was to ascend the Congo, and at starting the author thus writes of

THE "MIGHTY" CONGO:

"The Lower Congo has been ascended many a time since the date of its discovery, but it has never been described satisfactorily. For my previous omission in 1877 I could well be excused, for my fatigues had utterly prostrated me, and it was the blue Atlantic that I yearned for—I and my poor fellows.

"But now, strong with health, both they and I looked upon it with different eyes. The voluminous flood, which we had followed all the long way to its spacious bourne, and had seen under all aspects—now tranquil as a summer's dream, anon raging with horrible-creamed crests above deep brown hollows, engulfing our unwary mates, menacing our frail low barks—smiled on us to-day, as with calm but interested glance we gazed down secure from high decks on its placid surface. We have forgiven it long ago; we have buried the past, for time has softened our memories of its treachery. We feel still that it is a dangerous river to be trifled with. It has awful power when ruffled by impending rocks, or when its waves rise up, remonstrant to the breeze, and fall heavy and sullen. But we also have power now—power gained by knowledge and harsh experience. We will brave the giant stream with steel cutters driven by steam! Neither on the north bank nor on the south bank, nor yet on the river, is there ought to disturb this lifelessness of sleeping nature. The river-flood glides on serene in one unbroken, unruffled mass, but yet with an unmistakably resistless, though silent energy. On the wooded shores there is a solemn loneliness as of death; on the tranquil mass of ceaseless moving water we only see the peace of an undisturbed slumber."

ARRIVAL AT BOMA.

"Boma (Mboma) has a history, a cruel, blood-curdling history, fraught with horror, and woe, and suffering. Inhumanity of man to man has been exemplified here for over two centuries by the pitiless persecutions of black men, by sordid whites. The natives formerly were purchased by thousands, forcibly expatriated, enchained by dozens, packed closely in the holds of slave-ships, and shipped to the Brazils, West Indies, and North America, whence they never returned. Whole fleets have been maintained to carry on the slave traffic, and have anchored in this neighborhood. The miscellany of merchandise, and the stores of gin and rum in their holds, have induced the people of Boma to seek by all iniquitous means to gather the victims of superstition, folly, ignorance, and of violence from all parts inland. As this evil spreads abroad, other neighboring districts, Ponta da Lenha, Nokki, Mussoko, and all the river and coast towns, despatched their emissaries until there was not a village in all the wide space between the sea and the meridian of Stanley Pool which had not cause to curse the evil that had suddenly covered the land with mourning and woe."

Then follows a terrible story which luridly illustrates the past:

A TERRIBLE STORY.

"Modern Boma, however, in 1879, could only show one man who knew through personal experience what old Boma had been. He, and another living at some obscure factory lower down, had been guilty two years before of having committed a crime, which I doubt even the annals of old Boma could match. His stores were burnt one night, much stealing of cloth had become common—the dissatis among the slaves he owned being shown method of retaliation on their unkind. The guilty parties were discovered. They caught them, encircled their necks with collars, rove a short chain through the loops, and riveted the end link, which was purposely, over another link of the chain the middle of the gang. The slaves being secured, their hands were bound behind them they were put into a boat and rowed mid-channel, where they were hustled aside one after another into the river, ar chained and fettered, were soon drowned.

Now, Mr. Stanley thinks, all this is done. There is no ill-will between whites and the latter are "secure against tyranny, sion, and persistent evil-doing of the wh the very interests which have compelled traders to make their homes here by the river-side."

To give full information of all the passed and visited by Stanley and his cions during their journey up the gre would be impossible; we can only cull h there an incident, referring our readers ther intelligence to Mr. Stanley's work "Congo."

PERIL OF TWO MISSIONARIES.

At Kilolo Point Mr. Stanley found t sionaries of the Baptist Missionary Messrs. Crudgington and Bentley, on tl down the river in a canoe. They h passed through perilous experience. been requested to visit Kinshassa, they On landing, however, they were met by multitude, who ordered them back. S at the excitement they slowly retired, natives pressed on them, some trying round them, others advancing with muskets, and others flourishing long knives, spears, and bludgeons, as tho would annihilate them on the spot. F it appeared to be in the balance whe would be massacred instantly, or whe death should receive the sanction of chief Nchuvila and his principal men. however, the chief decided to let them safely, and, relieved of the fright, they l off. Arriving at Mfwa they nearly met adventures there, but managed to p turbulent mob. They then lost no time ing their way back to more peaceful down river, where they met with Mr. who assisted them to Isangila.

ENCOUNTER WITH A BUFFALO HE

On March 6th, 1881, the chief of the tion despatched some of his trusty men Soudi, Khalfan, and Sa'adala—to Vi letter to the chief of the station, and to the European mail. They started on t sion without delay, but on arriving at t aza stream they met a small buffalo l Soudi, who had been half slaughtered i 1875, was swept over the Kalulu Falls and had been captured and enslaved te time by the natives, now rashly tho with his Snider rifle he was a match fo mal, and forthwith with extreme cau menced to stalk one of the herd. Wh what he supposed to be a safe dista shot, he fired and wounded the buffo courage by seeing him fall, Soudi rusl sever the animal's jugular vein, since this ceremony the meat would have b for a Moslem to eat; but the buffalo dead, on seeing its enemy, charged, a him into the air, made a mere playthin until he was so mangled that he died s his companions had come up to him. number of these. They robbed us of our laying hens, and devoured the chicks, and then coiled themselves under the lower shelves of the magazine, and menaced our store-men with their venom, which they ejected in a stream from a distance of six feet. The poison must be exceedingly powerful and especially painful to the eyes, judging from its ill-effects, which lasted eight or ten days. Whip-snakes infest the grass; short, bulky pythons are near the water-courses; green snakes are coiled on the trees in the stony region; two pythons were killed on the Lufwenkenya. But although we have turned a large number into view, no accident has yet occurred."

A footnote tells us that the present year has been marked by a fatal accident of this kind; a Swedish officer was lately bitten by a snake and died within two hours. At the end of twelve months the expedition had made the road through from Vivi to Isangila, and Mr. Stanley thus sums up

A YEAR OF TRIAL AND TOIL.

"That it was not a holiday affair, with its diet of beans and goat-meat and sodden bananas, in the muggy atmosphere of the Congo canon, with the fierce heat from the rocks, and the chill bleak winds blowing up the gorge and down from sere grassy plateaus, let the deaths of six Europeans and twenty-two natives, and the retirement of thirteen invalided whites, only one of whom saw the interior, speak for us. It has been a year dark with trial and unusual toil. Our little band of laborers are proud of the grand work their muscles have accomplished, but are more hopeful of the future, inasmuch as their labors, by means of the steamer, will be greatly lightened."

The steady advance made during the next fourteen months under difficulties of the most serious and deterring character, is chronicled in Mr. Stanley's pleasant, making-light-of-difficulties style. The physical obstacles of the road, the opposition of native "kings" and "pretenders," the loss of his European assistants from disease, even his own grievous sickness, which brought him to death's door—none of these things did more than temporarily delay his sure progress. Léopoldville was founded in April, 1882, and in October of that year Mr. Stanley was back in Europe to give an account of his proceedings to the Association. At the end of the first volume he gives a brief account of the work done by the missionaries, who followed quickly in the steps of the pioneers of trade.

MISSIONS AT LÉOPOLDVILLE.

"It should have been observed before that two English religious missions had established themselves at Léopoldville, one to the right, and one to the left of the station, on ground belonging to the Association. The one established on Léopold-hill is called the Arthington Mission of the Baptist Church; the other is undenominational, and is styled the Livingstone Inland Congo Mission. Mr. T. J. Comber presides over the Baptist Mission, and Dr. Sims (whose portrait was published in this journal on May 25th, 1882) is chief of the other. Both gentlemen take a warm interest in their respective missions, both have been remarkably energetic, and both have especially distinguished themselves for zeal in looking after the important interests intrusted to their charge."

A PALAVER.

The curious way in which Mr. Stanley's diplomatic business had to be carried on may be understood from the following palaver which took place between him and Chief Ngalyma, who wished to prevent Stanley establishing his station at Vidi. Ngalyma arrived at Stanley's quarters with his suite, intending to forbid his farther progress. Stanley met him frankly, and summoning Susi, his interpreter, he said:

"Come, my brethren, friends, sit down. Tell Ngalyma, Susi, through Enjeli there, who knows Kikongo so well, how glad I am at seeing them all. Though it is very sudden, I take this visit and to have come so far to see me as most kindly intended."

"The chiefs, who kept their eyes wandering over the boats, boilers, and machinery tents, and kept up in undertones a perpetual interchange of ideas, scarcely deigned to regard me, until, after being seated, Ngalyma abruptly spoke to Enjeli, his son, in Kiteke, who translated it into Kikongo to me:

"I am come from Kintame to see my brother. Let him tell me what he has come here for." In response to your old invitation," I said.

A MENACE.

"At this moment another body of natives, carrying guns, came up, and seated themselves apart from Ngalyma's already large force. These were Makoko's men. Their appearance caused the chief to launch forth into a history of his acquaintance with me, beginning from 1877, as they had been accusing him of an intention to overstep his proper status as a foreigner who was only permitted residence on their soil to trade in ivory. He ended it in a peremptory manner thus:

"Now, my brother has been misinformed, and has misunderstood me. We Bateke are strangers living on this side of the river for trade only. The Bazombo and the Bakongo are our customers. We have no objection to trade with white men if they come for trade, but we do not think you have come to trade; therefore to Kintame. My brother must go back the way he came, unless he likes to stay here with Makoko. I have said it."

The interview was by no means a satisfactory one up to this point, and Ngalyma and the chiefs were invited to Stanley's tent. Here the subject was reopened by Ngalyma, who, having chosen a quantity of goods valued at $600 for his own perquisites, expressed himself to Stanley as follows:

"I will take these goods, but on the condition only that you stay where you are. You must make up your mind that you cannot come to Kintame. The chiefs will not have it. If you do not promise, this must end in war, and I can no longer be your friend. Now, what do you say?"

"It is useless, Ngalyma, to talk more about this," Stanley replied; "make up your mind that I go to or near Kintame. All the Wambundu are willing. You admit that you have no right to the country. How can you stop the Wambundu from doing what they like with their own country?"

"But the village of Kintame is mine," he said; "I and my people built it."

"That is all well. I do not want your village; I only want to get near the village and build a village of my own, whither many white men will come to trade. White men will do you no harm; you do not care to whom you sell your ivory?"

"Enough, enough," he cried. "I say for the last time you shall not come to Kintame; we do not want any white men among us. Let us go, Enjeli." And as he said the last words he pushed aside the tent door and strode outside, with the emotions of suppressed passion visible on his face. While standing near the tent door, for a moment irresolute, he saw suspended to a cross-bar supported by two forked poles.

"What is this?" he asked, pointing to the gong.

"It is fetish," I answered, sententiously.

"His young son, Enjeli, who was more acute than his father, whispered to him his belief that it was a kind of bell, upon which Ngalyma said:

"Bula Matari (Stanley), strike this; let me hear it."

"With all my force I struck the gong; the loud, bell-like tone sounded in the silence caused by the hushed concentrated attention of all upon the scene, was startling in the extreme, but as the rapid strokes were applied vigorously, the continued sound seemed to them like thunder. (See picture on first page.)

THE EFFECT OF THE GONG.

They had not recovered from the first shock of astonishment when the forms of men were seen bounding over the gunwale of my steamer, En Avant, right over their heads, and warwhooping in their ears. From my tent, and from the gorge behind them, a stream of frantic infuriates emerged as though from the earth. The store-tent was violently agitated, and finally collapsed, and a yelling crowd of demoniac madmen sprang out one after another, every one apparently madder than his neighbor.

"Every native present, would-be friend and would-be foe, lost his senses completely; the seated warriors forgot their guns and fled before this strange deluge and awful scene. The ammunition-bearers threw their gourds away—some were broken, and the powder and slugs were scattered over the ground; and as Ngalyma was standing paralyzed with fear, and with his faculties benumbed, I seized him by the arm, and said softly to him, 'Be not afraid, Ngalyma. Remember Bula Matari is your brother. Stand behind me; I will protect you.' Before evening Ngalyma returned on his way to Kintame with his people, much wiser than when he came."

was in the habit of appearing suddenly at the most inopportune times, and it was necessary to be constantly on the watch for his advent. So stealthy and treacherous is he that at any moment he and his companions might commence an attack. It is stated that even when in European drawing-rooms the sudden opening or closing of a door would bring Stanley to his feet with an involuntary motion of his hand to the place where his weapons usually hung when in Africa, and a look in his eyes not at all agreeable to some fair lady whose entrance had startled him.

A picture of a native warrior fully armed appears on the first page under Mr. Stanley's portrait. He says of them: "They act as if afflicted with a ferocious St. Vitus dance. They leap upward like so many acrobats suddenly seized with a terpsichorean mania, flankwise and rearward, then forward with a rush, bows in hand, drawn taut until the arrow-heads seem to touch the bow."

An account of Mr. Stanley's selection of a site for his new city of Vidi and his acquisition of it was published in these columns on June 18th of this year (page 389). Within the past few weeks a letter has been published by a disaffected member of the expedition, giving an unfavorable account of the climate and the general condition of affairs. Mr. Tisdal also reported unfavorably of the country, and Rear-Admiral English, who was deputed to investigate the facts for the Washington Government, quotes Mr. Tisdal's report with confidence. Nevertheless, independent observers confirm Stanley's account. Sir Frederick Goldsmid especially, who visited Vidi, speaks in glowing terms of its future. He says that the international stations founded by Stanley "merit the support and interest of the civilized world," that "these stations will in time become centres of traffic," and that "the work of the International Association will give a great impetus to commerce and civilization." This region has been visited also by H. H. Johnston, George Grenfell, Dr. Sims, Mr. Comber, and other men, who have travelled from five hundred and fifty to fourteen hundred miles up the Congo. In their writings they have much to say of the very large population of the middle and upper Congo, of the rich soil which grows all sorts of European produce, of the abundant food supplies, and of the eagerness of the natives to trade. No part of the Congo valley is healthful, but Mr. Comber, who has lived six years on the Congo, said that of thirty Europeans who had lived for three years on the river above Stanley Pool only one had died of sickness, and most of the men had enjoyed good health.

Two other pictures of Mr. Stanley's adventures appear on page 524.

THE THREE GROUPS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"And they sat down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties."—MARK 6: 40.

How Washington Felt at Valley Forge—The Problem—Jesus to the Rescue—The Best Bread Ever Made—The Analogy—The Different Groups—I. The Pardoned—An Imperial Arrival—II. The Seekers—Too Late with the Life-boat—III. The Careless—A Death-bed Picture—Companions for Eternity—The Other Alternative.

The sun was far down in the west, night was coming on, and there were five thousand people tired, hungry, shelterless. You know how Washington felt at Valley Forge, when his army was starving and freezing. You may imagine how any great-hearted general would feel while his troops were suffering. Imagine, then, how Christ, with His great heart, must have felt as He saw these five thousand hunger-bitten people. Yes, I suppose there were ten thousand there, for the Bible says there were five thousand men, beside women and children. The case is put in that way, not because the women and the children were of less importance than the men, but because they would eat less; and the whole force of the miracle turns on the amount of food required.

THE PROBLEM.

How shall this great multitude be supplied? I see a selfish man in that crowd pulling a lunch-con out of his own pocket, and saying: "Let the people starve. They had no business to come out here in the desert without any provisions. They are improvident, and the improvident ought to suffer." There is another man not quite so heartless, who says: "Go up into the village and buy bread." What a foolish proposition! There is not enough food in all the village for this crowd; beside that, who has the money to pay for it? Xerxes' army, one million strong, was fed by a private individual of great wealth for only one day, but it broke him. Who, then, shall feed this multitude?

I see a man rising in that great crowd, and asking: "Is there any one here who has bread or meat?" A kind of moan goes through the whole throng. "No bread—no meat." But just at that time a lad steps up. You know when a great crowd goes off upon an excursion, there are always men and boys to go along for the purpose of merchandise and to strike a bargain; and so I suppose this boy had gone along for the purpose of merchandise; but he was nearly all sold out, having only five loaves and two fishes left. He is a generous boy, and he turns them over to Christ.

JESUS TO THE RESCUE.

But these loaves would not feed twenty people, how much less ten thousand! Though the action was so generous on the part of the boy, so far as satisfying the multitude, it was a dead failure. Then Jesus comes to the rescue. He is apt to come when there is a dead lift. He commands the people that they sit down "in ranks, by hundreds and by fifties," as much as to say: "Order! order! so that none be missed." It was fortunate that that arrangement was made; otherwise, at the very first appearance of bread, the strong ones would have clutched it, while the feeble and the modest would have gone unsupplied.

I suppose it was no easy work to get that crowd seated, for they all wanted to be in the front row, lest the bread give out before their turn came. No sooner are they seated than there comes a great hush over all the people. Jesus stands there, His light complexion and auburn locks illumined by the setting sun. Every eye is on Him. They wonder what He will do next. He takes one of the loaves that the boy furnished, and breaks off it a piece which immediately grows to as large a size as the original loaf, the original loaf staying as large as it was before the piece was broken off. And they leaned forward with intense scrutiny, saying: "Look! look!" When some one, anxious to see more minutely what is going on, rises in front, they cry: "Sit down in front! Let us look for ourselves."

And then, when the bread is passed around, they taste of it sceptically and inquiringly, as much as to say: "Is it bread? Really, is it bread?" Yes, the best bread that was ever made, for Christ made it. Bread for the first fifty and second fifty. Bread for the first hundred and the second hundred. Bread for the first thousand and the second thousand. Pass it all around the circle; there, where that aged man sits leaning on his staff, and where that woman sits with the child in her arms. Pass it all around. Are you all fed? "Aye! aye!" respond the ten thousand voices, "all fed." One basket would have held the loaves before the miracle. It takes twelve baskets now. Sound it through all the ages of earth and heaven, that Christ the Lord comes to our suffering race with the bread of this life in one hand, and the bread of eternal life in the other hand.

THE ANALOGY.

You have all immediately run out the analogy between that scene and this. There were thousands there; there are thousands here. They were in the desert; many of you are in the desert of trouble and sin. No human power could feed them; no human power can feed you. Christ appeared to them; Christ appears to you. Bread enough for all in the desert; bread enough for all who are here. And, as on that occasion, so in this: we have the people "sit down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties," for the fact that many of you stand in no fault of ours, for we have tried to give you seats. As Christ divided that company into groups, so I divide this audience into three groups: the pardoned, the seeking, the careless.

I. And, first, I speak to

THE PARDONED.

It is with some of you half-past five in the morning, and some faint streaks of light. With others, it is seven o'clock, and thus full dawn. With others, it is twelve o'clock at noon, and you sit in full blaze of Gospel pardon. I bring you congratulation. Joseph delivered from Potiphar's dungeon, Daniel lifted from the lion's den, Saul arrested and unhorsed on the road to Damascus. Oh, you delivered captives, how your eyes should gleam, and your souls should bound, and your lips should sing in this pardon! From what land did you come? A land of darkness. What is to be your destiny? A land of light. Who got you out? Christ, the Lord. Can you sit so placidly and unmoved while all heaven comes to your soul with congratulation, and harps are strung, and crowns are lifted, and a great joy swings round the heavens at the news of your disenchantment? If you could realize out of what a pit you have been dug, to what height you are to be raised, and to what glory you are destined, you would spring to your feet with "Hosanna."

AN IMPERIAL ARRIVAL.

In 1808 there was a meeting of the emperors of France and Russia at Erfurt. There were distinguished men there also from other lands. It was so arranged that when any of the emperors arrived at the door of the reception-room, the drum should beat three times; but when a lesser dignitary should come, then the drum would sound but twice. After a while the people in the audience-chamber heard two taps of the drum. They said: "A prince is coming." But after a while there were three taps, and they cried, "The emperor!" Oh, there is a more glorious arrival at your soul to-night! The drum beats twice at the coming in of the lesser joys and congratulations of your soul; but it beats once, twice, thrice at the coming in of a glorious King—Jesus the Saviour, Jesus the God. I congratulate you. All are yours—things present and things to come.

THE SEEKERS.

II. I come now to speak of the second division—those who are seeking. Some of you with more earnestness, some of you with less earnestness; but I believe that, to night, if I should ask all those who wish to find the way to heaven to rise, and the world did not scoff at you, and your own proud heart did not keep you down, there would be a thousand souls who would cry out as they rose up: "Show me the way to heaven." That young man who smiled to the one next to him, as though he cared for none of these things, would be on his knees crying for mercy. Why this anxious look? Why this deep disquietude in the soul? Why, at the beginning of this service, did you do what you have not done for years—bow your head in prayer? You are seeking.

MERCY FOR ALL.

"I am a gambler," says one man. There is mercy for you. "I am a libertine," says another. There is mercy for you. "I have plunged into every abomination." Mercy for you. The door of grace does not stand ajar to-night, nor half swung around on the hinges. It is wide, wide open; and there is nothing in the Bible, or in Christ, or God, or earth, or heaven, or hell, to keep you out of the door of safety, if you want to go in. Christ has borne your burdens, fought your battles, suffered for your sins. The debt is paid, and the receipt is handed to you, written in the blood of the Son of God—will you have it? Oh, decide the matter now! Decide it here! Fling your exhausted soul down at the feet of an all-compassionate, all-sympathizing, all-pitying, all-pardoning Jesus. The laceration on His brow, the gash in His side, the torn muscles and nerves of His feet beg you to come.

But I remember that one inch outside the door of pardon, and you are in as much peril as though you were a thousand miles away. Many a shipwrecked sailor has got almost to the beach, but did not get on it. There are thousands in the world of the lost who came very near being saved—perhaps as near as you are to-night—but were not saved.

A WRECK.

On the eastern coast of England, a few weeks ago, in a fishing village, there was a good deal of excitement. While people were in church, the sailors and fishermen hearing the Gospel on the Sabbath, there was a cry: "To the beach!" and the minister closed the Bible, and with his congregation went out to help, and they saw in the offing a ship in trouble; but there was some disorder amid the fishing-smacks, and amid all the boats, and it was almost impossible to get anything launched. But after a while they did, and they pulled away for the wreck, and came almost up, when suddenly the distressed bark in the offing capsized, and they all went down. Oh, if the life-boats had only been ten minutes quicker! And how many a life-boat has been launched from the Gospel shore. It has come almost up to the drowning, and yet, after all, they were not rescued. Somehow they did not get into it!

I suppose there are people who have asked for our prayers, and I suppose there were some in the side room, last Sabbath night, talking about their souls, who will miss heaven. They do not take the last step, and all the other steps go for nothing until you have taken the last step, for I have here, in the presence of God and this people, to announce the solemn truth, that to be almost saved is to be lost forever. That is all I have to say to the second division.

THE CARELESS.

III. I come now to speak to the careless. You look indifferent, and I suppose you are indifferent. You say: "I came in here because a friend invited me to see what is going on, but with no serious intentions about my soul. I have so much work, and so much pleasure on hand, don't bother me about religion." And yet you are gentlemanly, and you are ladylike, in your behavior, and, therefore, I know that you will listen respectfully if I talk courteously. Christian people are sometimes afraid to talk to men and women of the world lest they be insulted. If they talk courteously to people of the world, they will listen courteously. So now I try to come in that way, and in that spirit, and talk to those of you who tell me that you are careless about your soul.

Then you have a soul, have you? Yes, precious, with infinite capacity for joy or suffering, winged for flight somewhere. Beckoned upward, beckoned downward. Fought after by angels and by fiends. Immortal!

"The sun is but a spark of fire,
A transient meteor in the sky;
The soul, immortal, as its sire,
Can never die."

Your body will soon be taken down, the castle will be destroyed, the tower will be in the dust, the windows will be broken out, and the place where your body sleeps will be forgotten; but your soul, after that, will be living, acting, feeling, thinking—where? where? Oh, there must be something of incomputable worth in that for which heaven gave up its best inhabitant, and Christ went into martyrdom, and at the coming of which angels chant an eternal litany and devils rush to the gate. When everything above you, and beneath you, and around you, is intent upon that soul, you cannot afford to be careless, especially when I think, this moment, while I speak, there are thousands of souls in heaven rejoicing that they attended to this matter in time, while at this very instant there are souls in the lost world mourning that they did not attend to it in time. Hark to

THE HOWLING OF THE DAMNED!

Oh, if this room could be vacated of this audience, and you were all gone, and the van spirits of the lost were come up and occupy this place, and I could stand before them with offers of pardon through Jesus Christ, and then ask them if they would accept it, there would come up an instantaneous, multitudinous, overwhelming cry: "Yes! yes! yes! yes!" No such fortune for them. They had their day of grace, and sacrificed it. You have yours; will you sacrifice it? I wish that I could have you see these things as you will one day see them!

Suppose, on your way home, a runaway horse should dash across the street, or between the dock and the boat you should accidentally slip, where would you be at twelve o'clock to-night or seven o'clock to-morrow morning? Or for all eternity where would you be? I do not answer the question. I would leave it to you to answer.

YOUR LAST HOUR.

But suppose you escape fatal accident. Suppose you go out by the ordinary process of sickness. I will just suppose now that your last hour has come. The doctor says, as he goes out of the room, "Can't get well." There is something in the faces of those who stand around you that prophesies that you cannot get well. You say within yourself: "I can't get well." Where are your comrades now? Oh, they are off to the gay party that very night! They dance as well as they ever did. They drink as much wine. They laugh as loud as though you were not dying. They destroyed your soul, but they do not come to help you die.

Well, there is father and mother in the room. They are very quiet, but occasionally they go out into the next room and weep bitterly. The bed is very much dishevelled. They have not been able to make it up for two or three days. There are four or five pillows lying around, because they have been trying to make you as easy as they could. On the one side of your bed are all the past years of your life—the Bibles, the sermons, the communion tables, the offers of mercy. You say: "Take them away." Your mother thinks you are delirious. She says: "There is nothing there, my dear, nothing there. There is something there. It is your wasted opportunities. It is your procrastinations. It is those years you gave to the world that you ought to have given to Christ. They are there, and some of them put their fingers on your aching temples, and some of them feel for the strings of your heart, and some put more thorns in your tumbled pillow, and you say: "Turn me over;" and they turn you over, but alas! there is a more appalling vision. You say: "Take that away!" They say: "There is nothing there—nothing there." There is—an open grave there; the judgment is there; a lost eternity is there. Take it away! They cannot take it away.

"You say: 'How dark it is getting in the room!' Why, the burners are all lighted. Your family come up one by one, and tenderly kiss you good-by. Your feet are cold, and the hands are cold, and the lips are cold, and they take a small mirror and they put it over your mouth to see if there is any breathing, and that mirror is taken away without a single blur upon it; and they whisper through the room: 'She is gone.'" And then the door of the body opens and the soul flashes out. Make room for the destroyed spirit.

DOWN! DOWN! DOWN!

Push back that door! Lost! Let it come into its eternal residence. Woe! woe! No cup of merriment now, but cup of the wrath of Almighty God. The last chance for heaven gone. The door of mercy shut. The doom sealed. The blackness of darkness forever!

Voltaire is there. Herod is there. Robespierre is there. The debauchees are there. The murderers are there. All the rejectors of Jesus Christ are there. And you will be there unless you repent. You cannot say, my dear brother, that you were not warned. This sermon would be a witness against you. You cannot say that God's Holy Spirit never strove with your heart. He is striving now. You cannot say that you had no chance for heaven, for the Omnipotent Son of God offers you His rescue. You cannot say: "I had no warning about that world; I didn't know there was any such place," for the Bible distinctly rings in your ears to-day, saying: "At the end of the world the angels shall separate the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire." And again that book says: "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God." And again it says: "The smoke of their torment ascendeth forever and ever."

You cannot say that you did not hear about heaven,

THE OTHER ALTERNATIVE.

for you hear of it now: "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." No sorrow; no suffering; no death. Oh, will you be careless any longer, when I tell you that Christ, the Conqueror of earth and hell, offers you now escape from all peril, and offers to introduce you this very hour into the peace and pardon of the Gospel, preparing you for that good land? The sides of Calvary run blood for you. Jesus, who had not where to lay His head, offers you His heart as a pillow of rest. Christ offers with His own body to bridge over the chasm of death, saying: "Walk over me; I am the way."

O suffering Jesus! the thief scoffed at Thee, and the malefactor spit on Thee, and the soldiers stabbed Thee; but these who sit before Thee to-day have no heart to do that. O Jesus! tell them of Thy love, tell them of Thy sympathy, tell them of the rewards Thou wilt give them in the better land. Groan again, O blessed Jesus! groan again, and perhaps when the rocks fall, their hard hearts may break.

"Nothing brought Him from above, Nothing but redeeming love."

The promise is all free, the path all clear. Come, Mary, and sit to-night at the feet of Jesus. Come, Bartimeus, and have your eyes opened. Come, O prodigal! and sit at thy father's table. Come, O you suffering, sinning, dying soul, and find rest on the heart of Jesus. The Spirit and Bride say "Come," and churches militant and triumphant say "Come," and all the voices of the past, mingling with all the voices of the future, in one great thunder of emphasis, bid you "Come now!" Are not those of you who are in the third class ready to pass over into the second division, and become seekers after Christ? Aye, are you not ready to pass over into the first division, and become the pardoned sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty? I can do no more than offer you, through Jesus Christ, peace on earth and everlasting residence in His presence.

"When God makes up His last account
Of natives in His holy mound,
'Twill be an honor to appear
As one new-born and nourished there."

Good-night! The Lord bless you! Go to your homes seeking after Christ. Sleep not until you have made your peace with God. Good-night—a deep, hearty, loving, Christian Good-night!

The Death of Another of Bishop Taylor's African missionaries is reported. The Rev. C. L. Miller has succumbed to the fatal African fever. Like Mr. Condit, whose death was recently announced, Mr. Miller refused to take any medicine, but looked to the Lord alone for healing. He was urged to use the means which had proved efficacious in other cases, trusting to the Lord to bless them to his recovery, but he would not yield.

The Nomination of the Rev. Stephen Merritt, the well-known philanthropist and preacher, as a candidate for the State Senate of New York, is a significant sign of the times. A meeting of influential citizens, without political affiliations, was held recently in the hall of the Grand Opera House, to take into consideration the disgraceful proceedings of the Legislature, and to initiate measures for reform. A resolution was passed declaring that "the interests of this city imperatively demand that the Senatorial and Assembly districts shall be represented by a class of men superior in character and ability to the men who have misrepresented them during the past few years;" that the emergencies of the hour require "men of spotless character, of sterling integrity, of honesty, of superior ability, of honorable independence—men whose interests are identified with the people they represent." As a corollary to that resolution, an invitation was sent to Mr. Merritt to become a candidate for the Eighth Senatorial District.

The Value of the Civil Service Reform Law has been doubted by many well-informed people, and those doubts have been industriously fostered by the politicians, whose power is curtailed by the law, they being no longer able to pay in offices for personal service. But it is well that the public should know that the law is really a national benefit. One office will serve as an illustration of the benefits it confers. Speaking last week at Cincinnati, Judge Thoman, one of the Civil Service Commissioners, said, in reference to the Patent Office, that persons seeking appointment in that office as examiners must be fully qualified to sit right down at a desk in the Patent Office the day they are appointed, and go right to work and do that work ably. If they are not fitted to do that by education and previous actual experience, they cannot be appointed. The complaint has gone over the country that the Patent Office is five years behind with its work. Do you know why it is so? Because it has been taking in inexperienced men to do their business, and it took fully five years for such a one to learn the details of the business. We now furnish the office with men who know the details of their business from A to Z, and who are qualified in every way to sit down and go right to work and do work as well as a man who has been in the office for years. In other words, we apply business principles to the Government, and make fitness and not political influence the sole consideration. We are teaching the people that the Government departments are not an immense alms-house into which all sorts of incapable persons who can do nothing else can be furnished with easy employment and good salaries. Patriotic citizens who have been long praying for the purification of American politics should be encouraged by this beginning.

THE EASTERN OR TURKISH QUESTION.

The Great Problem of the Age—Who Shall have Constantinople—The Holy Land an Important Factor—Mohammed's Significant Command—The Scene of the First Victory on Record—A Coveted Prize—Jewish Restoration the Only Solution—Not a Dream.

The great problem of the age is, Who shall be the owner of Constantinople, and who shall be the ruler? Shall it be England, France, or Russia? We maintain that England or France have not the least claim to the possession of Constantinople, the key of the East, and the control of the inland seas. Russia seems to have a better claim, and is eager for conquest. Since the last will of Peter the Great, she has manifested an aggressive spirit, and hopes yet to plant the cross in the church which is now the Mosque of St. Sophia, and to rule as the head of the Russian or Eastern Church in old Byzantium. But, contemplating the origin of Russia, she being a Slavic nation, her claim to the title of heir to the Eastern Church cannot be sustained, and her territory does not belong to the territory and people called "the Roman earth." We rather humbly suggest that the most rational solution would be that the King of Greece shall become the owner of Constantinople. Thus, the boundaries of that little kingdom will be increased, and a new Grecian Empire established which would have the balance of power, and the present king being connected by marriage with the rulers of England and Russia ("the seed of man" Dan. 2: 43), both powers might accept the compromise, and so the image of the prophet shall be seen intact in all its proportions. No doubt Russia will always be the great factor in this vexed question.

THE HOLY LAND.

It is not only the territory in Europe which draws our attention, it is also the territory in Asia, which must be considered, and, indeed, is so closely connected with "the Eastern Question" that it has equal weight in the scales of the political complication, Palestine, or Canaan, "the land of Immanuel" (Isa. 8: 8) is not like other countries on the globe, the property of the nations; it is a reserved spot for more than four thousand years. The Magna Charta of Israel's property is recorded in Gen. 10: 5; Deut. 32: 8. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the numbers of the children of Israel.

MOHAMMED'S SIGNIFICANT COMMAND.

That land is given to the seed of Abraham as a gift forever. It is a covenant gift, and "a gift cannot be sold" (Gen. 13: 15; 15: 18; 17: 7-12). Mohammed was aware of that fact, and acknowledged in his Koran: "That the products of Canaan, not the land of Canaan, should be their property."

That land is isolated from all other countries, protected by mountains, by deserts, and by the sea; its geography is unique, and yet it is the centre and focus of three continents. It is of such an importance that the Eastern or Turkish question never can be settled unless the ownership of Canaan first shall be settled and established.

A CALDRON.

Jerusalem has always been "the caldron or seething pot" of the nations (Ezek. 11: 3-11); the battle-ground during the ages past, it will be the battle-ground of the ages to come. The first battle, and also the first victory on record, did happen in that country (Gen. 14: 1-24), and so the last battle and the last victory will be fought in the land of Immanuel (Rev. 20: 9). No place on earth has such a record of carnage and bloodshed as Palestine. From the times of the judges, the kings of Israel, the kings of Syria, Egypt, and Assyria, Nebuchadnezzar, the Romans, the Caliphs, the Crusaders, Napoleon Bonaparte to Ibrahim Pasha, Mount Tabor and the plains of Judah have been the battle-grounds of the Eastern wars; and as several "Eastern questions" have already been settled in ages past, so the great battle to come will be on the confines of the land where the angels sang: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men" (Luke 2: 14). Then shall the language of Paul be understood—"Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!" (Rom. 11: 33.)

A COVETED PRIZE.

No place on earth has produced such a vexation of spirit as Jerusalem has done. It was a thorn in the eyes of the Samaritans and an eyecore for the philosophical spirit of Greece and Rome. After Mecca, Jerusalem is the next holy city for an Islam believer. It was the goal of the Crusaders, and even at this very day it has an enchanting power. The Jews have there the Via dolorum, and the graves of their fathers. The Mohammedans their Mosque of Omar, from which their prophet made his night's journey to the seventh heaven. The devout Christians feel that Jerusalem is called the city of the great king, and so it is the same in regard to the nations abroad. England covets that country as the highway to Hindoostan; France, as the representative of the Roman or western church, is claiming the right as the eldest son of the Church, and is making great purchases in Jerusalem and in Palestine; and Russia, as the representative of the Eastern Church, asserts her claim for possession, and has already invested great sums of money to establish herself in the holy city. It is the coveted prize, and for that reason "the Eastern Question" is the great dilemma of the age, and is the gordian knot to be cut by the sword of a modern Alexander.

SOLUTION.

To try to solve "the Eastern or Turkish Question" without making the Jews the principal factors in the case is lost labor. No nation can ever possess Jerusalem and the land of Canaan but Israel. The land is waiting for their return (Ezek. 36: 28), and the heirs are at hand and are coming (Ezek. 36: 8), and when once established in their own country will hold the equilibrium of three continents—Europe, Asia, and Africa. They only can hold the balance of power between France and Russia, between England and Italy, the only nations which will fight for possession and claim pre-eminence. Ten or fifteen millions of Jews concentrated in their "fatherland," schooled by ages of persecution, holding the centres of railroads and also the canal of Suez, and others under their control, must exercise a mighty influence upon all the nations far and near, because they will possess the key to Arabia, Persia, and Hindoostan; they will open the highways to Egypt and Ethiopia.

When Israel shall return, they shall carry with them "the untold treasures," the wealth of the nations (Isa. 60: 11), and they will make Jerusalem "the great world-exchange," and enterprises will be begun and brought into execution of mining excavation, archaeological researches, and others no man can divine, and everything shall lead to a final solution of the so-called Eastern Question.

NO DREAM.

It might be said those ideas are a phantasm, they are dreams taken from the Sibylline oracles! Indeed, we say they are no dreams; we speak of realities; we live in a period in which a whole continent, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, has been settled, cities have been built, and as by magic a nation has been established, such as was never seen before, and this in little more than four score years. Is America—the great west of the United States of America, a dream, or is it indeed a reality? And why should we not grant to the Jews the same privileges? Yea, more. They have the promises of Him who is "the possessor of heaven and earth" (Gen. 14: 19), and they will have "the first dominion."

Already the death-knell of Islam is heard in Jerusalem. Only eighty years ago no Jew could, as a Jew (except by the peril of his life), enter the gate of Jerusalem; now it can be called pre-eminently a city of Jews. Now a Christian church, called "Christ Church," is built upon Mount Zion. It is no dream, it is a reality; the sound of the wheels of the chariot is heard of the coming King of Israel in Jerusalem, "who shall reign upon the throne of David, his father, and whose dominion shall be without end" (Luke 1: 32, 33).

A LAUDANUM-DRINKER'S CAREER.

At a recent religious service a man who gave his name as J. Jones rose and said: "I have served the devil for a quarter of a century, although I had a praying mother and a God-fearing father, who attended to the interests of my soul while I was a boy. But as I grew older I broke through all home restraints and loving parental influences. I first gave up going to Sunday-school—not all at once, for this is not the devil's way of doing, but gradually.

"I had passed as a first-class teacher of mathematics, and had a splendid prospect, but since then I have come through Satan's hands, and he has made a terrible wreck of me. At a very early age I took to drinking. I went home intoxicated at the age of sixteen, entering into the devil's work with all my might. I knew I much provoked the Lord, and my conscience used to say, 'Well, John, when are you going to stop this sort of life?'

"You talk of drink! but I had a worse enemy with which to contend. I became an opium-eater, but by and by I found opium too expensive, and took to drinking laudanum. I soon became useless as a teacher, for my senses were dulled by the poison of which I was so freely partaking. Before entering on my usual duties one morning, the head-master of the school said to me, 'Mr. Jones, you must be taking drink or something of that kind.' I told him that I was in the habit of drinking laudanum, but promised to reform. Some time after this incident I was told that my Services would no longer be required.

"Many, many good resolutions I made, but I did not know then that the way to destruction is paved with good resolutions, so down I went in my sinful career. About this time a friend of my mother died, and left me a sum worth $2500, with half of which I went to London to enjoy myself, and at the end of ten weeks I was standing at Charing Cross a perfect wreck, with an old battered hat upon my head, and a few pence in my pocket, all that remained of half my fortune. As I stood there I thought, I will conquer yet; I have still half the money left; everything is not gone. But I had no money to take me back to Glasgow. I had not even a shilling to pay for a telegram to send to my parents. I fell upon a plan. I went to the station-master and got him to telegraph home. Soon money was sent, and I was on my way back to Glasgow, but when I arrived there my father and my mother did not know me, so debauched and broken-down was my appearance.

"I went to engineering, and remained in a situation for six weeks, and at the end of that time I found myself in prison, and when there I again thought, I will turn over a new leaf; I will read a chapter of the Bible every night and morning; yes, and I would say my prayers and attend church regularly. Gradually the remaining portion of my money slipped away, and I was left absolutely penniless.

"Once, when I was about to leave my father's house, he put his hand kindly on my shoulder, and with much emotion said: 'John, will you not come over to the Lord's side now?' But my heart was proud and rebellious, and I left the house. One Friday morning I left my miserable lodgings because I could not stay longer for want of means. I wandered until I came to the river's side, and as I looked into the water I thought it was the best place for me. I said to myself 'I have no earthly friend—even my father and my mother have turned me away.'

better voice within me said, 'Why not just and up one earnest cry to God, and tell I about it?' and there I did send up one help to Him whose ear is ever open to cry. He heard me, and I went to a friend, who has helped and encouraged since; and now, as I entered into the service with all my might, I will, with help, do all I can as long as I live to the cause of Christ."

NOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

giving His Mind For the Better.—At A meeting Mr. Jack remarked: "A man to a meeting at Coatbridge, where I was, and, as he was going out I asked him if he was a Christian. He replied in the negative his mother, who was with him, said: 'No, I want you to stay and decide for yourself.' 'No, mother,' he answered, 'I come back another night.' He was, however, persuaded to remain, and he and his wife themselves to the Saviour."

Bacchus Takes Toll.—A Well-known of Gospel Temperance in the North said: "In spite of the progress made and the work accomplished by the temperance cause, Glasgow, there still remains much to be done. Only the other day I heard of a man and his wife who came into Glasgow, and when entering the station at night to return they were both intoxicated. In the morning they were found lying on the rails with their heads mangled. In their drunken state they had fallen over the platform, and in there quite unconscious, until the train overtook them. Another case was that of a man and his wife who went home very much over for strong drink, and the following morning they were found dead—the woman in the man sitting by the fireplace. I lay the blame anywhere but at the door of the Church of Christ, which still seems only to wake to the awful perils of the drink people, and when I came out the children were all standing waiting for me. I again entered the cab, my little friends following close behind. I told the driver to drive fast so as to outrun the children. One by one they dropped off, until one little girl was left; I knew she was out of breath and ready to drop; I felt so sorry for her. Putting my head out of the window, I told the driver to stop, and said to the child: 'What do you want?' 'I want Jesus,' she replied; 'my mother takes drink, and swears, and my father also is very wicked, and oh, I want to love Jesus. I was in your meeting, but no one spoke to me.' I lifted her into the cab, and there I told her how Jesus had loved her, and how He had died for her, and there, I believe, in that cab, she was truly converted to the Saviour."

A Talk on a Dark Road.—Mr. Barr said: "I remember on one occasion I was preaching at Annan, and when returning from the church on a dark night I heard the sound of footsteps swiftly coming behind me. The person was soon by my side, and walked along by me in silence. Turning round I saw a young girl; she did not speak, and I said, 'Are you anxious about your soul?' 'Yes,' she replied, 'I wish I were saved.' As we walked along I told her of the Lamb of God crucified for her. With rapt attention she drank in every word, and before parting with her that night she had accepted the Lord as her Saviour. A strange incident is connected with her family. She was the last of the family who had entered the fold of the Good Shepherd. One member of their family was cruelly murdered on the Annan Road. The mother, a woman who feared God, went to the condemned cell and forgave the murderer of her child. Her body being weakened through grief, this last act was too much for her; on reaching home she went to bed and never to rise again until her spirit was called to be with God. 'I die willingly,' she said on her death-bed, 'knowing that the Lord will save all my family.'"

Leading Home a Dying Man.—Mr. Newby said: "A great revival living broken out in the town where I was living, another young man and myself took it into our heads to attend one of the meetings one evening. As our characters were well known, an old gentleman came up to us, and asked if we would go forward to be prayed with. This we refused to do. He asked if we would stand up while he prayed for us. The prayer made by the old gentleman impressed me very little. But the only part of that stick stuck to me was the following remarkable petition, which seemed the overflow of a presentiment that judgment impended: 'O Lord, if it is Thy will to take any of us to-night, I beseech Thee, let it be me.' When he had finished we went out. My companion laughed, and said: 'Old Cogdon means well.' 'Oh, yes,' I responded, 'he is a pretty good old fellow.' And as we went on joking in this strain, he began to lean heavily on my arm, so heavily that I said, 'Lean off; what's the matter with you?' He only leaned heavier, and said he was giddy. I then hailed a man who was passing, and asked him to help in getting my friend to his home. But ere we got him there he was quite unconscious, and the next day he was dead. Surely this was a striking illustration of Prov. 29:1, 'He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy.' A solemn warning indeed, but it passed away unheeded."

What Started the Tears.—The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "When I was a minister in the country I had a Christian friend living with me for a time, and one night, while we were sitting talking over our work, he observed: 'One day when I was in Bristol, I went out determined to win a soul for Christ. As I was walking through one of the lanes of that city I met a woman to whom I said, 'Is there any one in this neighborhood very ill?' 'Yes,' she said, 'there are a number.' 'Yes,' I replied, 'but is there any one who is dying in their sins?' 'You will get what you want up that stair,' she replied, I followed her directions, and entered a room where lay, stretched upon a bed, a very big, vicious-looking woman. I sat down by her side, but she never looked at me. I began to tell her how God hated sin and punished the sinner. With an angry movement she turned her back to me. 'Ah,' I thought, 'I am taking her the wrong way.' Then I spoke to her of Christ's great love for sinners in dying for them. I was repeating some passages of Scripture, and when I came to 'The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin,' she quickly turned round in bed and looked at me. Then sitting up she began to sing a verse of a beautiful hymn, while tears quickly ran down her face. She told me that I had brought back to her memory the time when she used to go to Sunday-school, and before leaving her she had received forgiveness from the great Friend of sinners."

THE CURSE OF ALCOHOL. A Dream of Christmas Evens.

CHRISTMAS EVANS was announced to speak on temperance at a certain meeting, and, as usual, people came from far and near to hear him. A certain minister in the neighborhood, Mr. W—, of A—, said at first he should not be present, for he anticipated a personal reference to himself, because he was not an abstainer; yet such was the fascination that he could not stay away. He came to the meeting late and crept into the gallery, where the preacher's eye, which had long been searching for him, at length discovered him.

Christmas Evans at once proceeded to say: "I had a strange dream last night. I dreamt that I was in Pandemonium, the council-chamber of Hades. How I got there I know not, but there I was. I had not been there long before I heard a thundering rap at the gates. 'Beelzebub! Beelzebub! you must come to earth directly.' 'Why, what's the matter now?' 'Oh! they are sending our missionaries to the heathen.' 'Are they? Bad news that. I'll be there presently.' Beelzebub rose and hastened to the place of embarkation. He saw the missionaries and their wives, and a few boxes of Bibles and tracts, but, on turning round; he saw rows of casks piled up, and labelled gin, rum, brandy, etc. 'That will do,' said he, 'there's no fear yet. The casks will do more harm than the boxes will do good.' So saying, he stretched his wings and returned to his own place."

After a time came another loud call, 'Beelzebub!' 'Yes.' 'They are forming Bible Societies now.' 'Are they? Then I must go.' He went, and found two ladies going from house to house distributing the Word of God. 'This will never do,' said he; 'but I will watch the result.' The ladies visited an aged lady, who received a Bible with much reverence and many thanks. Beelzebub loitered about, and when the ladies were gone, saw the old woman come to her door, and look around to assure herself that she was unobserved. She then put on her bonnet, and with a small parcel under her apron hastened to a public-house near, where she exchanged her Bible for a bottle of gin. 'That will do,' said Beelzebub; 'no fear yet,' and back he flew to his own place."

Again a loud rap came, and a more urgent call, 'Beelzebub, you must come now, or all is lost; they are forming Teetotal Societies. 'Teetotal! what is that?' 'To drink no intoxicating liquors.' 'Indeed! That is bad news. I must see to that.' He did; but soon went back again to satisfy the anxious inquiries of his legions, who were all on the qui vive about the matter. 'Don't be alarmed,' said he; 'it's an awkward affair, I know, but it won't spread much yet, for all the parsons are with us, and Mr. W—, of A— (here the speaker's eye glanced like lightning at him) is at the head of them.'"

"But I won't be at the head of them any longer," cried Mr. W—, and immediately walking down out of the gallery, he came and signed the pledge."

Wagon on a Frozen Lake.—Mr. Porter said: "A man wanted to cross a frozen lake in a boat, but as he was about to do so he became doubtful as to whether the ice would bear weight. He tried it here and there with his hands and it seemed perfectly sound, but doubt taken possession of his mind and he could trust himself to it. As he stood in this state of uncertainty a wagoner came over the ice with his wagon, drawn by two oxen. He evidently had no doubt of the security of the ice, but trusted himself and his team to it, and now he reached his destination in safety. What the difference between these two? The one I do not venture over because of imaginary fear, while the other, having no such doubts, over trusting to the strength of the ice, so is it with some people not venturing to themselves to the Lord Jesus Christ, because they have no faith in His keeping power, another will walk through life trusting to what he hath said, 'Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God.'"

Converted in A Cab.—Mr. Hammond said: "My former visit to Glasgow I was conducting a farewell meeting with the children in the town before going to another part, children crowded about me in great numbers to bid me good-by. I bade them good-by in the church, but when I got out to go into the town to be conducted to a meeting for grown people, it was surrounded with children. I told them what they wanted, and their answer was, 'We've come to bid you good-by.' I got into the cab, and these children followed it up the street and down another all through the town until we reached our destination. When the cab stopped they stopped—all out of breath, all things. I was sorry to tell them that there was no room for them in the church, but bravely said: 'We'll just wait out here.' And in and preached a short sermon to the

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Funeral of General Grant on Saturday last was a great and memorable spectacle. Nothing that the nation or the city could do to testify to the honor in which the dead hero was held was left undone. The grand pageant commenced with the departure of the remains from Mount McGregor for Albany, on Tuesday, August 4th. General Hancock went to the cottage to conduct the body with military honors to its last resting-place. A funeral service was held on the piazza where the General, during the last days of his illness, used to sit. Dr. Agnew and Bishop Harris conducted the preliminary services, after which Dr. J. P. Newman inflicted a sermon more than an hour long on the weeping family and friends. The casket containing the honored remains was then carried by the military guard to the depot and placed on board a special train. It arrived at Albany at four o'clock. The State capital was in mourning garb. Until ten o'clock on the following morning a long line of people crowded the streets on the way to the capitol, where the body lay in state. It was then taken to the depot and brought to New York. All along the railroad track people had gathered to see it pass, and the church bells in all the cities were tolled as the train rolled through. It was received at the New York depot by a military guard. Two batteries of artillery and companies of the various regiments stationed here preceded and followed the catafalque on which the purple velvet casket lay containing all that was mortal of General Grant. The streets were densely crowded; the house-tops, and even the trees, were utilized, as well as the windows and sidewalks, by respectful spectators. All day Thursday and Friday the body lay in state in the City Hall, and from six o'clock in the morning until after midnight each day people passed by the coffin, with its glass lid, in a continuous stream, at the rate of 120 a minute, to look on the face of the dead hero. On Saturday the corpse was borne with such homage as this country has never paid before to any of her citizens to the temporary tomb in Riverside Park, where it will repose until the permanent tomb and the monument are erected. President Cleveland and his Cabinet attended, and joined the procession. Ex-Presidents Hayes and Arthur were also there. Many States were represented by their governors, and even distant cities sent their mayors, and public bodies their chief officers. There were representatives of both Houses of Congress and of the Legislatures of the States. Foreign Ministers and Consuls and distinguished men from all quarters were in the mighty procession, making up a total of more than ten thousand civilians, besides thirty thousand officers and soldiers. The spectacle, however, of the most significance at the funeral of the great general was that of General Sherman and General Johnston in one carriage and General Sheridan and General Buckner in another, and the troops of Virginia in the same line with those of Massachusetts, bearing witness to the fulfilment of General Grant's desire, "Let us have peace." Business was suspended, all the banks and public offices and stores were closed, and there were few buildings without mourning drapery, while many were completely shrouded from roof to basement, except small apertures at the windows, with the sombre decoration. The route of the funeral procession was nearly ten miles in length, but there were no thin places in the crowd which lined the sidewalks on both sides of the way, while at every open space the throngs were so densely massed that the movement of any one in the mass was impossible. The funeral ceremony was the noble but simple ritual of the Grand Army of the Republic, followed by the burial service of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Then, after the benediction had been pronounced, the bugle sounding "military taps" resounded through the park, and the thunder of artillery and the rattle of musketry announced that the final tribute of homage to the nation's hero had been paid.

England's Tribute to General Grant is unparalleled in her history. Never before has a memorial service for any one but an Englishman been held in Westminster Abbey. On Tuesday, August 4th, the venerable edifice was crowded with a distinguished congregation, assembled to participate in an imposing ceremony. A portion of the burial service was sung, and the organ played Schubert's funeral march. Then the Ninetieth Psalm was read, and Canon Farrar delivered an eloquent address, eulogizing General Grant and the American nation. Among the audience were many illustrious personages. The Queen sent Colonel H. P. Ewart as her special representative. Lieutenant-General Sir Dighton Probyn was present on behalf of the Prince of Wales; Colonel William Colville for the Duke of Edinburgh; Major Alfred Egerton for the Duke of Connaught. The Duke of Cambridge, General Lord Wolseley, Adjutant General Sir Archibald Alison, Sir Gerald Graham, and numerous staff officers represented the British army. Of the government there were present in person the Premier and two Cabinet Ministers, the Earl of Idlesleigh, and the Earl of Harrowby; of the late Government, Mr. Gladstone, who came from the country against the doctor's orders, the Right Hon. Mr. Foster, and the Right Hon. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre. Other eminent personages were the Duke and Duchess of Teck, Mrs. Gladstone, the Marquis of Lorne, and many members of Parliament. The Americans present included the American Minister and Mrs. Phelps, Cyrus W. Field, Ex-Attorney-General Brewster, and other distinguished citizens now in England. We in this country do not fully realize the significance of this tribute, but it is evident, from the carping criticisms of a British Tory journal, that the honor is one of the highest that could be paid over there.

A Disastrous Tornado Visited Philadelphia on August 3d. It swept up the Delaware River about three o'clock in the afternoon, wrecking the ferry-boat which plies between the city and Salem, N. J. The upper and lower decks of the boat were torn away, with the pilot house; the pilot was drowned, and about fifty of the passengers were more or less hurt. The heavy machinery below deck was twisted and crushed up by the violence of the storm, as if it had been putty. Having swept through Camden, N. J., tearing down buildings and wounding many people, it struck the Mond district of Philadelphia. The track storm was almost due north from the Port mond coal wharves; about one hundred fifty dwelling houses were wrecked, or so damaged as to be rendered unfit for habit and two hundred families were driven from homes to be cared for by their neighbors. Several persons were seriously and some injured. A girl of ten years old was killed her home in sight of her mother, who was self pinned to the floor by fallen rafters, feet from her dying child, and many other sons were fatally injured. The tornado described by those who witnessed its progress upon the river, where it could be seen to a targe, as an immense black, cone-shaped mass with its apex resting upon the water and its mingling with the rain clouds which huge masses from the sky. Reading, Pa., more, Md., Smyrna, Del., and Staunton, also suffered, being on the outskirts of the tornado's track.

The Secretary of the Navy has Notified the signees of John Roach that the Government tend to take charge of the three unfinished cruisers and complete them, using Mr. Roach and appliances. Mr. Whitney, in his communication, declared the contracts forfeited, has informed Mr. Roach that the Government will make inventory and appraisement of done, and finish the vessels at its own expense and under the direction of its officers. Evidently the Government's purpose to employ Mr. Roach's workmen, who are now idle. The vessels shall have been completed, it will be a settlement with the contractor, in accordance with the usual methods. The Secretary apparently felt that the Government could not afford to allow the unfinished cruisers to go for they already represent an investment of about $1,750,000 of the people's money. Roach, two years ago, contracted to complete them in a year and a half, and it is his default to time that the Secretary uses as the justification of his action.

A Renewal of War Rumors is Reported from London. The European correspondent of the New York Times says that it is believed well-informed quarters that Russian troops in the western defiles of the Zulfikar Pass, is even more certain that the Ameer of Afghanistan is working with might and main to get forces together for Herat, and is in weekly communication with Lord Dufferin, the English Viceroy, while the new commander, General Roberts, is energetically preparing a camp beyond Quetta, which will be the base of a swift advance to Candahar the moment one is needed. A significant still is the tone of the Russian press which has suddenly become filled with hostile and sinister hints of necessary forward movements, and the elation with which military circles in St. Petersburg hail the prospect of speedy action. A significant confirmation of these disquieting rumors is the news from Petersburg. M. de Giers, the Russian Secretary of State, has gone away on a long holiday. That might be interpreted into a peaceful assurance that nothing of importance is expected to take place, were it not known that M. de Giers is the strongest advocate of the peace party, and his taking a holiday now indicates that his position is not dominant in the Russian Government.

A Slight Amelioration in the Ravages of cholera is reported. The Marseilles correspondent of the New York Herald says that Sunday there were only twenty deaths from pestilence registered in that city. The mayor, however, classifies persons of fifteen years among "infants," to diminish the roll. Most of the recent cases made a rapid progress. Among these was that of the leader of the orchestra of the Théâtre du Gymnase. Several cases occurred in the best portion of the city. Toulouse is afflicted with Asiatic cholera. There is a cloud of mistaken secrecy has led to a spread of the disease.

Mr. D. L. Moody will, it is Expected, Commence his fall campaign this year in the Southern States. New Orleans has already sent him an invitation, signed by eighteen of their city pastors, inviting him to come there and hold a series of union meetings.

Tent-Services have been Commenced in Boston, Mass., with prospects of success. They are being held in Boston under the auspices of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, the Boston Y. M. C. A., and some of the local churches. A tent has been pitched on a vacant lot on Union Park Street, and there meetings are to be held every night except Saturdays. The Rev. E. W. Bliss, the evangelist, has charge of the enterprise, and is assisted, by prominent clergymen of the different denominations.

A Jerry McAuley Memorial is Projected.—It is proposed to erect a drinking fountain, in some crowded part of this city, as a memorial of the late Jerry McAuley. Appropriate Gospel texts will be inscribed thereupon. The design has been prepared, and the cost is estimated at $2000. The matter is in charge of Messrs. Morris K. Jesup, William E. Dodge, A. S. Hatch, and Bradford L. Gilbert. Contributions for the purpose indicated should be sent to the last-named gentleman, Mr. Bradford L. Gilbert, at his office, 257 Broadway, New York.

The Rev. E. Payson Hammond's Campaign in Scotland has been closed amid indications of great blessing. He is now in London resting for a time. He hopes to commence evangelistic work in London in September, at the Midway Conference Hall. On a recent Sunday evening, being present at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, Mr. Spurgeon requested him to assist in officiating at the observance of the Lord's Supper. At the close, various friends who had been associated with Mr. Hammond's work in London seventeen years ago came and thanked him for the blessing then received.

A Medical Opinion on Total Abstinence of some importance, is given by Dr. John A. Brady, of Louisville, Ky., who, writing to the Voice, says: "The public health would be improved very greatly if the manufacture of alcohol should be wholly stopped. I fully indorse the statements of the editor of the Boston Journal of Chemistry that, 'If the fermentative process should cease, and the art of distillation should become a lost art, not a life would be lost in consequence.' Fully one half of the cases of accident to life and limb, in my practice, can be traced to drink; and such diseases as phthisis, hypertrophy of the liver, and Bright's disease of the kidneys result most frequently from the use of alcoholic beverages. I can also fully indorse the opinion of Colonel Greene and other insurance officers, that beer-drinking is only less detrimental, if less on the whole, than whiskey-drinking.

Legal Technicalities as Impediments to the administration of justice are not apparently of much use in Michigan. A man was convicted in one of the lower courts of the State on the charge of larceny, the particular offense being that of cheating an unsophisticated countryman out of a sum of money at a game of cards. His counsel objected to the classification of the crime as larceny, and the case went up to the Supreme Court for decision. It was delivered in these words: "We do not think it profitable to draw over-nice metaphysical distinctions to save thieves from punishment. If rogues conspire to get away a man's money by such tricks as those which were played here, it is not going beyond the settled rules of law to hold that the fraud amounts to stealing."

The Misery of a Popular Idol is Described by a reporter, who visited last week a row of tenement houses in the rear of Greene Street, New York. There he saw a woman sitting in abject misery. The front door of the house had been used for firewood, and part of the staircase had been applied to the same purpose. There was no furniture in the room, and the woman sat on an old soap-box watching a child peeling some raw potatoes with her finger-nails, while an old woman was scraping the bones of some stale meat rescued from an ash-barrel. All three were hungry and haggard-looking from long privation. The middle-aged woman, less than a dozen years ago, was the favorite of theatre-goers in New York, receiving a large salary, which during part of her career reached $250 for each night's performance, besides which costly presents came to her from wealthy admirers. She was suddenly stricken down with illness while playing in a Philadelphia theatre, and has never been able to go on the stage since. She is thirty-four years of age, and her death, which seems imminent, will be due to starvation more than to disease. Young ladies with a passion for the stage should see how the world treats one that it fawned on once, but who is no longer able to amuse it (Prov. 28: 19).

A Druggist's Fatal Blunder is Reported from Baltimore, Md. The five-year-old daughter of a physician in that city was suffering from remittent fever, and was attended by her father, who prescribed quinine in doses of one and a half grains. The child had not improved, and another physician was called in, who advised the father to increase the dose of quinine from one and a half to three grains. The prescription was made up at a drug-store. After the first of the increased doses the child exhibited all the symptoms of morphia-taking, and the father returning to the drug-store, learned that the clerk had made a mistake, and had sent morphia instead of quinine. The two physicians did their utmost to counteract the action of the poison, but in the child's condition, suffering as she was from the fever, the morphia took fatal effect, and she died the same night. A similar mistake is sometimes made in the case of newly awakened sinners. In their condition nothing is so fatal as the soothing words of friends, who would lull them into a false security. It is seldom that they can be awakened again (Ezek 13: 10).

A Problem for the Supervisors was Submitted in an objectionable way recently by the officials of San Leandro, Cal. The San Francisco Chronicle says: "A bloated, hideous Chinese leper sat under a bush yesterday afternoon in the grounds of the Hall of Records, of Oakland. He was the centre of a group of wondering small boys and curious spectators. A reporter went up and asked: 'What is the matter, John?' He answered in a single word, 'Leprosy.' It seems that he had been brought in that morning from San Leandro and turned over to the Board of Supervisors, then in session. That body did not know what to do with him, and he had been deposited on the grass near the receiving hospital pending negotiations. Health Officer Buck refused to assume control of him for the city of Oakland, but offered to send him to San Francisco to ascertain on what terms the Health Officer there would take charge of him, if at all." It was a sad case. None could heal the poor, diseased creature, and no one wanted to be burdened with the charge of him. Sometimes we meet with moral outcasts whose case seems similarly hopeless. But then we can take to Him who healed the lepers with His word, and they recover (Mark 1: 40, 41).

How a Rattlesnake Captured a Locomotive was related recently by an engineer on the Nashville, Chattanooga, and St. Louis Railroad. A despatch, dated July 12th, to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat from Nashville, Tenn., says that Henry Andrews, the driver of locomotive No. 56, reports that he was beyond Stevenson, Ala., with a train full of passengers, when he saw a gigantic rattlesnake crawl out of the wood in the tender and glide toward the cab. "The fireman saw it, too," says the engineer, "and he jumped off and left me. I pulled back the throttle and leaped over the snake, and landed in the tender. Standing on a log, I watched that snake take possession of the cab, which he did without any ceremony. No. 6 was waiting for us at Stevenson, and I knew that if that snake ran the engine till we got there, the coroner of the town would be kept busy for a week. I crawled over the tender and made my way to the postal car, and told the messenger and conductor. We carefully crept out to the tender with our pistols ready, and, looking into the cab, saw that rattler stretched out on the board by the window. Well, it didn't take more than three seconds for us to put three bullets into his carcass. They struck him so quickly and so thoroughly that, before he could get a chance to rattle, he was dead. Well, to make a long story short, I landed on time at Stevenson, and, strange to say, the first fellow I saw was the conductor, but, thank Heaven, there weren't any inquests for him to hold." None of the passengers knew how near they had been to a catastrophe while that snake held possession of the engine-cab. A time is near when the world will be in a position which that train typifies. Through Antichrist, Satan, "that old serpent" (Rev. 12: 9), will occupy the seat of power, and will hold it while the world speeds swiftly to destruction; but he will be overthrown at Christ's coming (11 Thess. 2: 8).

A Man Died in his Coffin Recently at Emmitzburg, Md. Forty years ago, though in good health, he had a coffin made and brought to his house, and he slept in it every night afterward. His novel bed was chosen, he said, as a constant reminder that death is always near. His desire to impress this fact upon himself was owing to the sudden death of his wife, at the age of thirty years, by heart disease. They had been to a ball, and after returning home retired to bed. Fifteen minutes later he found that his wife had died by his side. The shock was severe, and he never forgot it. He always kept his coffin thereafter in the corner of his dining-room. He would get into it every night and pull the lid up until only his face was exposed to view. The reporter who telegraphed the news says: "Last night he retired to his coffin at the usual hour, but when the servant called him this morning it was found that he was dead." The majority of men appear to forget that death is approaching, but this man seems to have dwelt upon it morbidly. It may be hoped that the constant reminder he thus gave himself led to practical results in prompting him to prepare for the life to which death admitted him (Ps. 90: 12).

A Wife's Devotion to her Unworthy Husband was manifested last week in a Canadian town. About six months ago a Brooklyn lady was married at her home, with the consent of her parents, to a handsome and apparently prosperous young man. He was the confidential employe of a company, and appeared to be thoroughly honest and trustworthy. Three weeks ago the young couple were missing, and no one knew where they were; but it was found that the husband was a defaulter to a considerable amount, which his bondsman had to pay. Last week the young wife's family heard that the runaways were at a town near Montreal, and immediately they proceeded thither to bring their daughter home. The interview, which took place on August 6th, was a distressing one. The young wife admitted that her husband had confessed his crime to her, but she said she had married him, and she loved him, and was resolved to cling to him no matter what happened. Finding her daughter so firm, the mother pleaded with her earnestly and pathetically to return to her old home, and appearing to make no impression, was so overcome by her feelings that she fainted. Then the father tried to persuade his daughter to leave her husband, but he also failed, and the father and mother were obliged to return home alone and heart-broken to Brooklyn. Few women in like circumstances would have rejected ease and affluence for a hard life with a disgraced husband. We can admire such fidelity, and can but regret that Christ, who with infinitely better reason asks for the supreme love of his followers, so seldom finds them as devoted as that wife. Not often are they ready to leave all to follow Him (Matt. 10: 37, 38).

RUTH'S REWARD.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The Lord recompenseth thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust."—RUTH 2:12.

The Kindness of Boaz to the Young Stranger—New Converts to be Cheered and Encouraged—An Old Woman's Teaching at a Newmarket School—Why Converts should be Helped—I. What they have Done—Left their Associates—Have Excited their Scorn—Have Come among Strangers—Are Humble—Have Come to the Same Refuge—II. The Full Reward—Making the Best of Both Worlds—Peace of Conscience—Joy of Doing Good—III. The Figure of the Reward—What Ruth Gained.

THIS was the language of Boaz, a man of substance and of note in Bethlehem, to a poor stranger of whom he had heard that she had left her kindred and the idols of her nation, that she might become a worshipper of the living and true God. He acted a noble part when he cheered her and bade her be of good courage, now that she was casting in her lot with Naomi and the chosen nation. Observe that he saluted her with words of tender encouragement; for this is precisely what I want all the elder Christians among you to do to those who are the counterparts of Ruth. There is a text, a very short one, which I would like often to preach from in reference to those who are newly saved, and I would invite you continually to be practising it; that text is,

"ENCOURAGE HIM."

So many will throw cold water upon the aspirant after holiness that I would urge others of you heartily to cheer him. Where spiritual life is weak, it should be nurtured with affectionate care. If Ruth is to be happy in the land of Israel a Boaz must look after her and be her true friend. Let her nearest kinsmen be speedy in fulfilling this duty.

I have no doubt that much sorrow might be prevented if words of encouragement were more frequently spoken fitly and in season; and therefore to withhold them is sin. I am afraid that many poor souls have remained in darkness, shut in within themselves, when two or three minutes' brotherly cheer might have taken down the shutters, and let in the light of day. Many matters are real difficulties to young believers, which are no difficulties to us who have been longer in the way. You and I could clear up in ten minutes' conversation questions and doubts which cause our uninstructed friends months of misery. Why are we so reticent when a word would send our weaker brethren on their way rejoicing? Encouragement is due to young converts; every Ruth ought to be comforted when she casts in her lot with the people of God.

AN OLD WOMAN'S TEACHING.

We should, in all probability, see a much more rapid growth in grace among our young converts if they were better nursed and watched over. Some of us owed much to old-experienced Christians in our younger days. I know I did. I shall forever respect the memory of a humble servant in the school wherein I was usher at Newmarket—an old woman, who talked with me concerning the things of the kingdom, and taught me the way of the Lord more perfectly. She knew the doctrines of grace better than many a doctor of divinity; and she held them with the tenacious grasp of one who found her life in them. It was my great privilege to help her in her old age; and but a little while ago she passed away to heaven. Many things did I learn of her which to-day I delight to preach.

Having thus introduced the text, let us notice in this model word of encouragement what the convert has done that we should encourage him; secondly, what full reward that is which he will receive; and thirdly, following out the historical connection of the text, I should like to conclude by noticing what figure sets forth this full reward—a reward which we desire for every Ruth who has left those who were outside of the covenant in Moab to come and join herself with the Israel of God, and the God of Israel.

I. First, then, what has

THE YOUNG CONVERT

done? We illustrate the subject by the instance of Ruth. Many young converts deserve encouragement because they have left all their old associates. Ruth, no doubt, had many friends in her native country, but she tore herself away to cling to Naomi and her God. The young convert is an emigrant from the world, and has become, for Christ's sake, an alien. Possibly he had many companions, friends who made him merry after their fashion, men of fascinating manners, who could easily provoke his laughter and make the hours dance by; but, because he found in them no savour of Christ, he has forsaken them, and for Christ's sake they have forsaken him. Among his old associates he has become as a speckled bird, and they are all against him. You may, perhaps, have seen a canary which has flown from its home, where it enjoyed the fondness of its mistress; you have seen it out among the sparrows. They pursue it as though they would tear it into pieces, and they give it no rest anywhere. Just so the young convert, being no longer of the same feather as his comrades, is the subject of their persecution. In their hearts they crown him with a fool's cap, and write him down as both idiot and knave. He will need to exhibit years of holy living before they will be forced into respect for him; and all this because he is to join with Israel. Why should he leave them? Has he grown better than they? Does he pretend to be a saint? Can he not drink with them as he once did? He is a protest against their excesses, and men don't care for such protests. According to the grade in life, this opposition takes one form or another, but in no case does Moab admire the Ruth who deserts her idols to worship the God of Israel.

Is it not meet that you older Christian people, who have long been separated from the world, and are hardened against its jeers, should step in and defend the new-comers? Should you not say, "Come you with us, and we will do you good: we will be better friends to you than those you have left. We will accompany you on a better road than that from which you have turned; and we will find you better joys than worldlings can ever know?" O brothers, while such fugitives are wondering which way to go, and their evil companions are inviting them to return, step in, and show them the true place of shelter. Keep off their former tempters; form a body-guard around them; escort them till they are out of immediate danger; charm them with your loving conversation till they forget their false friends. When Ruth had quitted her former connections, it was wise and kind for Boaz to address her in the words of comfort which I will again quote to you: "The Lord recompenseth thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust."

COME AMONGST STRANGERS.

She was not yet at home in the land of Israel, but confessed herself "a stranger." She knew Naomi, but in the whole town of Bethlehem she knew no one else. When she came into the harvest-field the neighbors were there gleaning, but they were no neighbors of hers: no glance of sympathy fell upon her from them; perhaps they looked at her with cold curiosity. Boaz very properly felt that she should not think that courtesy and kindness had died out of Israel; and he made a point, though he was by far her superior in station, to go to her and speak a word of encouragement to her. Should not certain of you follow the same practice? May I not call you to do so at once?

There will come into our assemblies those that have been lately impressed with a sense of their guilt, or have newly sought and found the Saviour; should they be suffered to remain strangers among us long? Should not recognition, companionship, and hospitality be extended to them to make them feel at home with us? Do let us try with all our hearts so to look every man upon the things of others that no single seeking soul shall feel itself deserted. Seekers should be spared the agony of crying, "No man careth for my soul." Are you a believer? Then you are my brother. We are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. Come, let us pluck up courage, and encourage every Ruth when she is timid among strangers. Let us help her to feel at home in Immanuel's land.

The new convert is like Ruth in another respect: he is very lowly in his own eyes. Ruth said to Boaz, "Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldst take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?" She had little self-esteem, and therefore she won the esteem of others. She felt herself to be to whom any kindness was a great favor; and so do young converts, if they are real and true. We meet with a certain class of them who are rather pert and forward, as the fashion of the day is in certain quarters; and then we do not think so much of them as they do of themselves; but the genuine ones, who are truly renewed, and who really hold out and continue to the end, are always humble, and frequently very trembling, timid, and diffident.

I remember, when I first went to the house of God as a Christian youth who had lately come to know the Lord, that I looked with veneration on every officer and member of the church. I thought them all, if not quite angels, yet very nearly as good; at any rate, I had no disposition to criticize them, for I felt myself to be so undeserving. I do not think that I have quite so high an idea of all professed Christians as I had then, for I am afraid that I could not truthfully entertain it; but, for all that, I think far better of them than many are apt to do. I believe that young people, when first brought to Christ, have so deep a sense of their own imperfection, and know so little of the infirmities of others, that they look up to the members of the church with a very high esteem, and this fixes upon such members, officers, and pastors a great responsibility. Since these converts are lowly in their own eyes, it is proper and safe to encourage them; moreover, it is kind and needful to do so.

Once more, the young convert is like Ruth because he has come to trust under the wings of Jehovah, the God of Israel. Herein is

A BEAUTIFUL METAPHOR.

You know that the wing of a strong bird especially, and of any bird relatively, is strong. It makes a kind of arch, and from the outer side you have the architectural idea of strength. Under the wings, even of so feeble a creature as a hen, there is a complete and perfect refuge for her little chicks, judging from without. When I have seen the little birds put their heads out from under the feathers of their mother's breast it has looked like the perfection of happiness; and when they have chirped their little notes, they have seemed to tell how warm and safe they were, though they may have been a rough wind blowing around the hen. They could not be happier than they are. This is what our young converts have done: they have come, not to trust themselves, but to trust in Jesus. Is not this what you are doing? You full-grown saints—is not this your condition? I know it is. Very well, then; encourage the younger sort to do what you delight to do.

II. But now I must come closer to the text. Having shown you what these converts have done to need encouragement, I want, in the second place, to answer the question, What is of those who come to trust under the wings of God? We would answer that a full reward will come to us in that day when we lay down these bodies of flesh and blood, that they may sleep in Jesus, while our unclothed spirits are absent from the body but present with the Lord. In the disembodied state we shall enjoy perfect happiness of spirit; but a fuller reward will be ours when the Lord shall come a second time, and our bodies shall rise from the grave to share in the glorious reign of the descended King. Then in our perfect manhood we shall behold the face of Him we love, and shall be like Him.

THE PRESENT REWARD.

But there is a present reward, and to that Boaz referred. There is in this world a present recompense for the godly, notwithstanding the fact that many are the afflictions of the righteous. This present world must be subordinate to the world to come, and is to be cheerfully sacrificed to it, if need be. Yet, be it never forgotten, if any man will live unto God he will make the best of both worlds, for godliness has the promise of the life that now is as well as of that which is to come. Even in losing the present life for Christ's sake we are saving it, and self-denial and taking up the cross are but forms of blessedness. If we seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, all other things shall be added to us.

Do you ask me, "How shall we be rewarded for trusting in the Lord?" I answer, first, by the deep peace of conscience which He will grant you. Can any reward be better than this? When a man can say, "I have sinned, but I am forgiven," is not that forgiveness an unspeakable boon? If you were to offer all that you have to buy this peace, you could not purchase it; but were it purchasable it were worth while to forgo the dross of a myriad worlds to win it. That, however, is only the beginning of the believer's reward. He that has come to trust in God shall be "quiet from fear of evil." What a blessing that must be! "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings; his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord." When a man is at his very highest as to this world's joy, he hears the whisper of a dark spirit saying, "Will it last?" He peers into the noorw with apprehension, for he knows not what may be lurking in his path. But, when a man is no longer afraid, but is prepared to welcome whatever comes, because he sees in it the appointment of a loving Father, why, then he is in a happy state.

FREE FROM ANXIETY.

More than this: the man who trusts in God rests in Him with respect to all the supplies he now needs or shall ever need. We are never quite content; it always needs a little more to fill the cup to the brim; but only think of singing, "What can I want beside?" Is not this sweet content a full reward from the Lord in whom we trust? I cannot imagine a fuller present reward than complete rest from all anxiety, and a calm confidence in a providence which can never fail.

Another part of the believer's great gain lies in the consciousness that all things are working together for his good.

JOY IN SERVICE.

Then, let me tell you, they that trust in God and follow Him have another full reward, and that is, the bliss of good work. Can any happiness excel this? There has lately passed away from our midst a true side of the river, one who in his earlier days knew the curse of drunkenness, but was led by hearing the Gospel in the street to seek and find a Saviour, and to escape from the bondage of an evil habit. He became a Christian temperance man, devoting himself, I was about to say every day in the week, to the cause, for I think he did so; all his spare time was spent for that sacred purpose. He has lately passed away, but not without having enjoyed a reward from his God. When I used to look into the face of our friend Mr. Thorniloe I felt that he had received a full return for casting himself upon the Lord; for the joy of his heart shone in his countenance, and delight in his work caused it to be his recreation. Oh, idle professor, if you would be as diligent in serving your Lord as he was, life would be music to you!

Let me tell you another splendid part of this full reward, and that is, to have prevalence with God in prayer. Somebody called me, in print, a hypocrite, because I said that God had heard my prayers. This was evidently malicious; a man might be called fanatical for such a statement, but I cannot see the justice of imputing hypocrisy on that account. If by hypocrisy be meant a sincere conviction that the great God answers prayer, I will be more and more hypocritical as long as I live. I will glory in the name of God—the God that heareth my prayer. If that writer had claimed that he prayed and had been heard, it is possible that he would have been guilty of hypocrisy: of that matter he is personally the best informed, and I leave the question with himself; but he has no right to measure my corn with his bushel. Certainly, I shall not use his bushel to measure my corn, but I shall speak what I know and am persuaded of. In deep sincerity I can bear testimony that the Lord hears prayer, and that it is His wont so to do.

THE FULL OF THE REWARD.

Many other items make up the full of the reward; but perhaps the chief of all is communion with God—to be permitted to speak with Him as a man speaketh with his friend—to be led by the divine Bridegroom to sit down in the banqueting-house, while His banner over us is love. Those who dwell outside the palace of love know nothing about our secret ecstasies and raptures. Come, then, and put your trust under the wings of God, and you shall be blessed in your body and in your soul, blessed in your house and in your family, blessed in your basket and in your store, blessed in your sickness and in your health, blessed in time and in eternity; for the righteous are blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. My prayer for every young convert is the benediction of Boaz, "The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust." May this benediction rest on each one of you for ever.

WHAT RUTH GAINED.

III. Finally, what that figure sets forth this full reward? What was the full reward that Ruth gained? I do not think that Boaz knew the full meaning of what he said. He could not foresee all that was appointed of the Lord. In the light of Ruth's history we will read the good man's blessing. She lost her Moabitish kindred, but she found a noble kinsman in Israel. She quitted their home of her fathers in the east, land to find a heritage among the chosen tribes, a heritage redeemed by one who loved her. Ah! when you come to trust in Christ, you find in the Lord Jesus Christ one who is next of kin to you, who redeems your heritage, and unites you to Himself. You thought that He was a stranger; you were afraid to approach Him; but He comes near to you, and you find yourself near to His heart, and one with Him for ever.

Yes, this is a fair picture of each convert's reward. Ruth found what she did not look for—she found a husband. It was exactly what was for her comfort and her joy, for she found rest in the house of her husband, and she became possessed of his large estate by virtue of her marriage union with him. When a poor sinner trusts in God he does not expect so great a boon, but, to his surprise, his heart finds a husband, and a home, and beyond all conception; and all this is found in Christ Jesus our Lord. Then is the soul brought into loving, living, lasting, indissoluble union with the well-beloved, the unrivalled Lord of love. We are one with Jesus. What a glorious mystery is this!

Ruth obtained an inheritance among the chosen people of Jehovah. She could not have obtained it except through Boaz, who redeemed it for her; but thus she came into indisputable possession of it. When a poor soul comes to God, he thinks that he is flying to Him only for a refuge, but, indeed, He is coming for much more; that He is coming for a heritage undefiled, and that fadeth not away. He becomes an heir of God, a joint-heir with Jesus Christ,

As I conclude I bear this my personal testimony to the benefit of godliness for this life. Apart from the glories of heaven I would wish to live trusting in my God, and resting in Him for this present life, since I need His present aid for every day as truly as I shall need it at the last day. Men speak of secularism as attending to the things which concern our present life, and I am bold to assert that the purest and best secularism is that which trusts itself with God for things immediately around us. We shall be wise to make secular things sacred by trusting them with God. Faith is not for eternity alone, but for this fleeting hour also; it is good for the shop and for the market-place, for the field and for the domestic hearth. For the cares of the moment, as well as for all else, we take refuge under the wings of God. There shall we be blessed for Christ's sake. Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

LAWN TENNIS

as a Game of Skill, by Lieutenant S. C. F. Peile. The remarkable popularity which in a few years the game of lawn tennis has achieved justifies the author in attempting to render the lovers of it proficient. What is worth doing at all is worth doing well, and the maxim applies to recreation as fully as to business. Some of the greatest men in all departments of life—statesmen, lawyers, clergymen, and physicians—have found it necessary to have some relaxation, some amusement in which to relieve the tension of the mind and recuperate the mental energy, which flags under unintermittent labor. To them lawn tennis has come as a boon. It is not so exhausting physically as baseball, and it is not a sedentary game, like chess, which does not give the kind of change necessary to men engaged in occupations that exercise the mind and not the body. Lawn tennis, therefore, has become very popular, and its popularity is easily understood. Recognizing this fact, Lieutenant Peile, who is the most skillful player in America, has prepared this little volume of hints and instructions, believing that Americans, whether they play or work, like to acquire themselves creditably. Pp. 90; price, 75 cents. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

LECTURE TO MEN.

by Henry Varley. This pamphlet, with its companion, Private Address to Boys and Youths on an Important Subject, may now be purchased in New York at a low price. Perhaps there is no subject on which boys and men need advice and warning so urgently as the one dealt with in these two little books. Yet there is no subject on which parents and teachers find greater difficulty in speaking. Many a man, weak and prematurely aged, laments that no one cautioned him in his young days on the wrong he was ignorantly doing to himself, the consequences of which are bearing bitter fruit in his later years. This difficult office Mr. Varley has undertaken and has performed with remarkable success. As was mentioned in the course of the sketch of his life which appeared last week, this is not a matter of opinion merely. Mr. Varley has testimony in the shape of hundreds of letters, that his attempt has been signally successful. The thanks of many victims have been sent to him with grateful acknowledgments from parents and teachers, who, lacking the courage or tact required for giving the needed warning with effect, have placed the pamphlets in the hands of those who they suspect need just such teaching. Mr. Varley rests his appeal on physiological as well as religious grounds, and knowing well the weakness of human nature, and aware that an evil habit once contracted is often continued long after the conscience has condemned it, he gives practical advice for the benefit of such who are anxious to reform. The books are exclusively for men and boys, but they do not contain any of the disgusting details which render the so-called medical books on the same subject pernicious. The two pamphlets may be had together for 20 cents, from Mr. Whittaker, No. 2 Bible House, New York.

A CANTERBURY PILGRIMAGE :

Ridden, Written, and Illustrated, by Joseph and Elizabeth Robins Pennell. An extremely bright and interesting little book is this description of a ride on a tricycle from London to Canterbury over the smooth, hard roads which once, in a state not so pleasant for travellers as they are now, were trodden by the Canterbury pilgrims. The three days occupied by the journey were spent among delightful scenes in the garden of England, by two observers who could appreciate the beauties of nature. The descriptions and bright, spirited sketches render the scenes very vivid to the reader, who seems to see with the travellers the rich and beautiful country through which they passed. Price, in paper covers, 50 cents. Published by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

TWO MEMORABLE SCENES IN AFRICA.

MR. H. M. STANLEY, whose portrait appears on the first page, first became famous by his success in finding Dr. Livingstone. The great explorer was on the last of his many expeditions into the interior of Africa, and had not been heard of for many months. It was generally supposed that he must be dead, when the enterprising proprietor of the New York Herald conceived the idea of sending a man to search for him in the recesses of the dark Continent. Mr. Stanley, among all the employes on the Herald, was the man who had shown the greatest self-reliance and capacity for such a perilous mission. He was selected, liberally supplied with money, and sent out. It was a long and dangerous journey, with scarcely a clue to the right track. But Mr. Stanley was happily preserved and directed. He came upon traces of Livingstone after about six weeks' marching from the confines of civilization, and on November 10th, 1871, the fifty-first day of the journey, and ten months after he set foot in Africa, Stanley came upon the camp of the white traveller of whom he had heard, and who he felt sure was Livingstone. He thus describes his

MEETING WITH LIVINGSTONE :

"At last the sublime hour has arrived; our dreams, our hopes, and anticipations are now about to be realized! Our hearts and our feelings are with our eyes, as we peer into the palms and try to make out in which hut or house lives the 'white man with the gray beard' we heard about when we were at the Malagarazi. 'Unfur your flags, and load your guns!' 'We will, master, we will, master!' respond the men, eagerly. 'One, two, three—fire!' A volley from nearly fifty guns roars like a salute from a battery of artillery; we shall note its effect presently on the peaceful-looking village below.

"Before we had gone a hundred yards our repeated volleys had the effect desired. The people of Uji rushed up in hundreds to meet us. We were surrounded by them, and almost deafened with their shouts of welcome—'Yambo, yambo, bana! Yambo, bana!' Suddenly I hear a voice on my right say, 'Good-morning, sir!' Startled at hearing this greeting in the midst of such a crowd of black people, I turn sharply round in search of the man, and see him at my side, with the blackest of faces, but animated and joyous—a man dressed in a long white shirt, with a white turban around his woolly head, and I ask: 'Who in the world are you?' 'I am Susi, the servant of Dr. Livingstone,' he said, smiling, and showing a gleaming row of teeth. 'What! Is Dr. Livingstone here?' 'Yes, sir.' 'In this village?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Now you, Susi, run and tell the doctor I am coming.' 'Yes, sir.' And off he darted at once with a speed that was remarkable.

LIVINGSTONE'S APPEARANCE.

"My heart beat fast, but I did that which I thought was most dignified under such extraordinary circumstances. I pushed back the crowds, and passing from the rear, walked down a living avenue of people, until I came in front of the semicircle of Arabs, before which stood 'the white man with the gray beard.' As I advanced slowly toward him I noticed that he was pale, that he looked wearied and wan, that he had gray whiskers and mustache, that he wore a bluish cloth cap with a faded gold band on a red ground round it, and that he had on a red-sleeved waistcoat, and a pair of gray tweed trousers. I would have run to him, only I was a coward in the presence of such a mob; so I walked deliberately to him, took off my hat, and said: 'Dr. Livingstone, I presume?' 'Yes,' he said, with a kind, cordial smile, lifting his cap slightly. I replaced my hat on my head, and he replaced his cap, and we both grasped hands. I then said aloud, 'I thank God, doctor, I have been permitted to see you.' He reverently answered, 'I feel thankful that I am here to welcome you.' (See illustration on this page.)

Mr. Stanley remained with Livingstone until March 14th, 1872, when, having supplied him with necessities, of which Livingstone was badly in need, owing to his having been robbed, he left the great missionary and returned to Europe, with Livingstone's journal and letters. Dr. Livingstone continued his journey, and no white man afterward saw him alive. He died alone, save for his faithful black followers, on May 4th, 1873, little more than a year after he parted from Stanley.

The second scene represented in the illustration above, occurred during Mr. Stanley's later journey in Africa, in 1877. He journeyed as far as Bumbireh Island, in Lake Victoria Nyanza, where he had from massacre. As the boat in which Stanley and his party were neared the shore, a number of natives waded out and laid hands upon the bow, and wading backward, dragged the boat ashore. The hostile intentions of the natives were soon manifested. Two hundred of them, armed with bows, gathered upon the beach. "Our lives," says Stanley, "were protracted until 3 P.M., when the big drum summoned all the natives to war. They were kind enough to notify us that they intended to cut our throats, and to tell us in a scornful manner to get ready. We had often given valuable presents, and would have given every cloth in the boat had they demanded it. The final preparations, however, were not be mistaken, and my instinct warned me that the time had arrived to act. 'Boys, be careful what you answer me. Do you think you could shove this boat in the water, to save your lives?'

THE CRISIS.

"They all replied in a positive manner in the affirmative. I sent Safeni forward to the mustering bands with a fine cloth that I had reserved for a last trial, and the men took their positions carefully along the sides of the boat. After allowing Safeni time to proceed about twenty paces from us, and seeing that their attention was taken up with the cloth, I shouted out 'Push!'

"As soon as I felt the boat begin to move I called out to Safeni, who turned round and came bounding toward us. But we were soon observed. The distance was nothing, and down the natives poured toward us. The boat was shot into the water, Safeni was just about plunging into the lake when I observed a couple of tall savages on the point of attacking me. See illustration.) I hesitated no longer. The two were shot, and we were saved.

"Furious at being baffled, the savages swarmed into three canoes close by, and chased us as we were paddling with the bottom boards of the boat which we tore up. Perceiving that we could never hope to escape with such improvised paddles, I ordered them to cease, and waited for them. Two of the advancing canoes were mashed, and the third was obliged to hasten ashore in sinking condition. Days of famine, days of suffering, vexation, annoyance, and sickness followed the exposure we were put to after our flight from Bum-berah Island."

RELIGION IN THE MARKET.

(See Illustration.)

"What success, Tom?" asked a bright, cheery woman, as her husband entered the clean, orderly kitchen after his day's business in the market. Time was when Tom did not come home so early in the day, nor with so steady a step as that of to-night. A few weeks ago, however, he had "turned over a new leaf," as he said, had signed the ledger, and had been converted. He had been pretty low before that occurred, and his dollars were few and far between. He was doing his best now, but was not sanguine. "A man has a hard row to hoe," he said, "who is going to take religion into the market." But his wife, whose prayers for many long years had now been answered, was doing all she could to encourage him, and would not fear of his leaving the market for an humbler occupation. She would economize, and they could save the beer money, anyhow. It would all come right, she assured him, in the end. But things were not prosperous; and when she looked up from her cooking at Tom's face as he entered the room, she wished she had not asked about it. Success. Failure was written in large letters in the man's face.

"No success, Annie," he said. "I shall rarely come out even on to-day's transactions. We'll have a loss on those peaches. I'll sell 'em to-morrow for what I can get. I believe I'll have to leave the market, after all, if I'm to keep to religion, and I mean to keep that, anyhow. I could have sold my two largest baskets of peaches to-day if I'd been willing to tell a lie."

"How was that, Tom?" "Why, I made up two or three little baskets of the best of the peaches, and put a ticket on 'em. By and by up comes a Quaker looking round, and I saw he meant buying. He looked at the peaches, and seemed to like the looks of 'em. 'Hast thou many of those, friend?' he said. 'I'll have two baskets if they are equal to these.' Well, I looked at him, and I saw he'd like my word, and the devil seemed to tempt me hard. But I'd looked the baskets through, and they were a long way from being up to the mark. So I just told him the truth, that the little baskets were all the good ones I had. He turned to Peter's stall right off, and Peter sold him two baskets, and they were no better than mine, but he guaranteed 'em all right, and the Quaker was simple-like, and took 'em without looking. I've got mine now, for I never had so good a chance after, and I don't know what I'll get for 'em. Pete laughed when the old boy was gone, and said he guessed religion wasn't going to pay around there, and I don't think it is, Annie.

"Never mind, Tom; we'll manage somehow. You didn't take religion for pay, so you've no call to be disappointed. Two baskets of peaches won't ruin you. The devil must think mighty little of you to try to buy your soul with three dollars for peaches."

"Well, Annie, you give one good courage. I'd never keep religion without you. You've got more grit than any woman I know, and if you don't mind being poor, I'm sure I don't." They had their supper, and then in plain, earnest words, Tom having read a chapter, thanked God that he had been delivered from evil that day and had been kept in the hour of temptation. Before bed-time he had recovered his cheerfulness, under Annie's bright looks and words, and had almost forgotten his vexation about the Quaker.

A few days passed away, and Tom's prospects did not brighten; but just a week after his trouble about the peaches, Tom came home whistling, and entered the kitchen with a smiling face.

"You've got some good news, Tom, I can see," Annie said.

"Yes; it's most too good for a joke, but it's like one. You remember that Quaker I told you about, Annie?"

"That one who wouldn't have the peaches last week?"

"Yes, the same. Well, he was at the market again to-day. He went to Pete right off, and I thought Pete's in luck again. But he wasn't. You oughter heard that Quaker talk to him. He just preached about the sin of lying till Pete was fit to drop, he looked so ashamed. Then he came over to me and asked me did I always tell the truth like I did the other day. I said 'Yes,' lately; I was trying to do the square thing now. Then he asked me a mart o' questions, and I told him just how it all came about. He seemed kinder interested, and spoke very kind. He said telling truth didn't always pay, nor religion neither, but just as you said, Annie, we never expected it would. However, he meant it to pay for once, and he just bought me out. I sent the things to his house, and I tell you, Annie, he's well fixed, and going to be a friend. I'm to send for orders regular, and he's coming to see you. I told him about you, and how you were a-helping me over the rough ground at the start. He said he'd like to know you, and he's coming some day soon."

Annie did not say, "I told you so." She knew Tom would think that without being reminded. So she just kissed him, and they sat down to supper with lighter and more thankful hearts than they had known for some time. They were finding out, though, as Tom said, "it was not in the contract," that God was blessing them in this life as well as in the promise of the life to come.

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

The Climax of Suffering.

THE cellars were a doleful place to live in, but they were as safe as any place we could find. Indeed, they seemed to be the safest, as nothing could hurt us there, unless the house fell and buried us. A few months before this we should have been amazed at the bare suggestion of living in such a dark and dreary place; but we had learned much in those weeks of alarm, and safety was now our chief concern. It seemed as if the Prussians meant to lay the city in ruins with those big shells flying over the walls night and day. So we went down—the Sergeant and I—to see what we could do to brighten things before my grandmother came down.

"Sergeant," I said, feeling very downcast, "how long is this to last?"

I could see by the light of our lantern how very grave he was.

"Max," he answered, "if it's true what we hear—only there is no depending upon rumors—the General must surrender sooner or later. They say Marshal Bazaine is shut up in Metz, and cannot get out. But that is not the worst."

"What is the worst?" I asked.

"It cannot be true," he said; "it's a Prussian boast. They say the Emperor and General MacMahon have been beaten at Sedan, and given themselves up—they and all the army, and gone prisoners, while the Prussians are marching on to Paris."

I could hardly speak or move, so great was my wonder and my dismay.

"But who is there to come to our succor," I asked.

"There is none but God," he said, raising his hat. I believe he was a good man, though very silent and reserved, even to Lisbeth, who had a way with her which drew people to talk of what was in their inmost minds.

"Then we may have to stay in this hole weeks and weeks!" cried Gretchen, whom we had forgotten, and who had been busy somewhere in the farthest of the cellars.

"Ah! let us make it as comfortable as we can," said the sergeant. "Come, Max, I am ready to help you down with the furniture."

So we moved the best of the things down into the cellars; but how changed the best furniture was from the time when I could see my own face in the polished wood and brass. Gretchen made many a lament over it, as she received it from us; for what with the dust and the smashing in of window-panes, and the flying of splinters, it had got many a scratch and stain upon it. Yet we arranged it as well as we could in the cellars; and when all was done, and the lamp lighted, and a cliauffrette with hot embers in it placed before my grandmother's chair for her feet, it looked better, far better, than I had expected. When it was all ready, Sergeant Klein went up to our salon, to help my grandmother to come down the dark and gloomy steps into our place of refuge.

I fancy I can see them now, coming slowly, step by step, down into the cellar, Sergeant Klein guiding her as tenderly as a woman could, with all the strength of a strong man added to the gentleness; and my grandmother leaning upon him so feebly, and peering with her dim eyes into the gloomy darkness before her. Elsie was on the steps above them, following quietly, with her knitting in her hand, holding it clasped to her as her greatest treasure, while a little of the light of day seemed to linger about the child. It is very plain to be seen, if I only close my eyes, and think of them for a moment.

"Sergeant," said my grandmother, when he was about to bid us good-evening, "stay, and take your supper with us."

I liked that; for she had maintained a kind of ancient dignity, which kept him at a distance. But I had to entreat him to stay; and when he complied, he was quite dull under the restraint of her presence, yet I saw that the honor pleased and gratified him. Even Gretchen was quite content. She said it was a very different thing to entertain one of our brave defenders than to give loaves of bread to any ragged urchin in the street.

It was a day or two after this—day and night were now nearly the same to us, and I cannot be sure how long it was—that I found Sergeant Klein one evening in full regimentals, both he and his men, and about to be absent all night. Their rooms were above us now: for they had taken possession of the ground floor, which had formerly been a shop, with a dwelling-room behind it; and we liked to feel that they were close at hand. Sergeant Klein's face was grave, as it always was; but I was struck by its unusual animation and the brisker tones of his voice, as he said cheerfully to me, "Good-by, Max, till to-morrow."

The next morning I carried Elsie, as I often did, to the hospital where Lisbeth was nursing. It was in one of the churches, and the floor was covered with low beds, touching almost upon one another, with scarcely room to stir between them. Lisbeth was stooping over one of them, the tears rolling down her face; a strange thing to see, for she was grown used to all kinds of suffering and death. I trod as softly as I could up the narrow aisle between the thick rows of beds, and looked down upon the face lying almost at my feet. It was bloodless and gray, and very still; but the eyes were open, looking at us, and recognizing us all with a sort of smile.

"Oh, Sergeant Klein!" I cried, "how is it? how has it happened?" But I could say no more; for it was a more horrible thing to me than I can tell, to see him lying there, when only the evening before he had called out to me, "Good-by, Max, till to-morrow!" His lips moved, and Lisbeth bent over him to catch what he was saying.

"He wants Elsie to sit on the bed by him," she said. "Take care she does not hurt him, Max; and stay with him. There is so much to do to-day."

She went away, leaving him with me. I put Elsie on the bed, and knelt down beside it, taking care that she should not hurt him, by pressing too near to him. He lay looking fondly at her for a few minutes, thinking of his own little children, perhaps.

"How does Elsie's knitting go on?" he whispered with his white lips.

"Oh," she said, sorrowfully, "it is not so clean as it ought to be! Nobody could knit it clean now. But when it is finished mother is going to wash it quite white—as white as snow."

"As white as snow," he murmured, "as white as snow."

He looked at me eagerly, as if he wanted to ask me a question, and I guessed what it was.

"You want to know where those words are," I said; and his eyes answered "Yes," as plainly as if his lips had spoken it.

"Come, now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow."

Then I thought of another verse or two, which I believed would comfort him; and I said them, kneeling down with my mouth close to his ear, for the cannon were booming all the time, so that one could not hear easily. His face grew bright as he listened.

These are the words which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Washed! he said, with long pauses between the words, washed—as white as snow—in the blood of the Lamb.

I scarcely dared to look into his face, so white with the coming of death; but suddenly, with a great effort, he drew Elsie's face down to his, and kissed her. When I lifted her up a moment or two after he was dead.

Once more Lisbeth and I followed a funeral to the garden. When we had been there before, the flowers were still blooming, and each one had a quiet grave to himself; but now a great trench was dug, and the coffins were laid in it three or four deep; all buried together in haste, and almost without mourning. The flowers and the bees were gone; only the sunshine, and the blue sky, and the stars of night were the same. These would look down upon the graves unchanged, when all memory of those who had perished was forgotten.

But I could not help wondering what would become of Sergeant Klein's wife and children, and the little farm on the hills, that he had left only two months ago.

How many widows and fatherless children in France and Germany were in like case! The loving heart that cared for them, the strong arms that worked for them, were lying in a bloody grave, sacrificed to the quarrel of two royal despots. A kind, gentle, honest man was our friend Klein. No quarrel had he with the Germans, nor did the man who fired the shell that mangled his manly form bear him any ill-will. Napoleon and William had quarrelled, and each had seized the men under their sway, and set them fighting. Ah, well, the world will not always be so foolish as to let any one man have such power! I thought of these things much during those days of darkness and danger.

You must think of us now as living in the cellars, with no light except that of the lamp, and hearing every now and then the crumbling of the old walls above us, which were so precious to my poor grandmother. I think her mind began to fail her a little, and no wonder; for she talked incessantly of the days when she was a young wife and mother, and called me sometimes by my grandfather's name and sometimes by my father's. She grew restless and uneasy whenever I was out of her sight, and would cry bitterly. Gretchen said, all the time I was away; though she never forgot to tell me to go every morning and see how the Cathedral was standing. So I found it to be my duty—that is, I was sure it was what the Lord Jesus Christ would have done in my place—to stay with her in the chilly damp and darkness of the cellars, except when there was some necessary errand which sent me away.

It was very irksome—more irksome than I can tell. This was the worst and dreariest part of the siege to me. Sergeant Klein was dead, and there was no one to bring us any news, either of expected succor or surrender. Sylvie was gone, and I could hear nothing—not a word of her, where she was or how she was; she might now be lying in some lonely grave, lost to us, as Louise was forever lost to her brother.

If it had not been for Elsie, I do not think I could have borne the suspense and confinement. She was our only delight and comfort, whiling away the weary hours with her pleasant prattle. Her little vest was being quickly finished, under my grandmother's superintendence; for nothing took her thoughts away so much as to have Elsie on a footstool beside her, knitting the birthday present for the Lord Jesus Christ. It seemed to bring Him so very really and closely among us, as a living person, that whenever I felt inclined to murmur at the dreary hours, when I would so willingly have been out in the open streets, and amid all the stir, and even the horrors of them, the mere sight of Elsie and her work would recall Him to my mind, and make me think how gently He would stay beside any poor, aged, and desolate woman. Elsie was surely His gift to us, when everything else was being taken away. Gretchen herself used to stand still, watching her fondly, sometimes; and would make her a little cake to eat, when her appetite began to fail.

It was now that I discovered Gretchen's secret store, without which we should have suffered many a sharp pang of hunger. In the darkness of the furthest cellar there had been carefully constructed, so as to escape observation, a small door, not four feet high, opening into a small vault. It must have been built with the house, nearly three hundred years before, when sieges and wars were more common than they have been of late times. When the siege had been first proclaimed, Gretchen had stored in it a good pile of potatoes, and carrots, and apples, besides a strong, thick chest filled with flour, which was beginning to smell musty from the damp, in spite of the thickness of the chest. There were stores of sugar, and wine, and oil as well, so that there was enough to last us for a whole month yet, and surely the siege must be ended before then! I put my arm round Gretchen's neck, and kissed her brown cheek; for, thanks to her, we were safe from dying of starvation. She was so pleased that she gave Elsie and me a roasted apple for dinner beyond our usual allowance.

Still, our close confinement, and the want of nourishing food, began to tell upon us all. We could not keep up our strength on apples, and no flesh meat was to be had for love or money. Our baker's house had long since been destroyed, and scarcely any good bread was to be bought in the city. Our flour was musty, but we could get none better, and hundreds would have been thankful even for ours, if we could have spared it for them. Gretchen did all she could to make our meals palatable; but it was both difficult and dangerous to cook; for we had no stove in the cellars, and she had to venture up to the floor above, where a stove was still standing.

Every day saw the want, the famine, and the deaths grow greater. Lisbeth told us they were running short of everything that was needed in the hospitals, while fresh patients were coming in every hour. As for the Botanic Gardens, they were piled up with graves. If the bombardment was to go on much longer, the city would be only a heap of ruins, peopled with skeletons.

One day, when I had gone out, much later than usual, to visit the Cathedral, and was moving slowly and languidly along the street facing the grand middle entrance, I saw a great rabble of the citizens pressing in at the door under the tower, while a few soldiers stationed there were doing their best to beat them back. Most of them looked wild and wolfish, like the lads I had seen fighting for a morsel of half-rotten turnip; and they fought desperately, bearing down the soldiers with their frantic energy. A man stood near to me, leaning against a wall, his wasted hand pressed against his heart, and watching the conflict with hungry eyes.

"What are they about?" I asked.

"They are the citizens," he gasped, speaking the words painfully, "with the white flag. General Ulrich has refused our petition to surrender, and they mean to hoist it themselves. I think I shall die as soon as I see it."

There we stood, looking with all our eyes, and a crowd of others, men and women, watching the struggle, and catching now and then a sight of it within, as the line of citizens passed the tower-windows, fighting their way upward. At last we saw them come out upon the gallery which runs along the western front of the Cathedral, and out floated the flag in the air, white as a small white cloud against the sky; and we set up a shout of triumph, but only very feeble shout, for the numbers that raised it.

I was hurrying home to carry the good news, when a yell of anger and despair, louder than our cry of triumph, made me run quickly back again. The flag had been torn down, and a troop of soldiers from the garrison had come to disperse the mob. Oh, the dull, dead misery of that disappointment! The crowd was being driven back, some of them uttering fierce oaths, and cursing General Ulrich; and others wringing their hands, and wailing like women.

(To be concluded.)

ELIJAH AT HOREB.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 23, 1 Kings 19: 1-18. Golden Text, ver. 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Elijah an Instrument Only—The Trial of his Faith—Elijah's Threat—Elijah's Disappointment—The Angel's Mission—In the Cave—Looking at the Dark Side—A Question for Elijah—A Commission—The Future Unfolded—The Consoling Assurance.

ALTHOUGH Elijah had been so signally used of God, he was still "a man of like passions [or nature] with us" (James 5: 17). God had spoken through him, acted through him, and used him as His instrument; but Elijah in himself was only an earthen vessel that the excellency of the power might be of God, and not of him (II Cor. 4: 7). He was no more lifted above the liability to be tempted than was his Lord, for even Jesus "suffered being tempted" (Heb. 2: 18).

The crowning moment of Elijah's life was come and gone. His own life and the faithfulness of his God were alike staked upon the challenge which had been made on Mount Carmel. A witness had been borne for God, which was almost unprecedented in history, and the king himself had been witness to it. But now comes a TRIAL OF ELIJAH'S FAITH.

Ahab, instead of communing with the God who had answered by fire before the very eyes, and who had sent rain and saved the land from the scourge of famine, goes to talk with the infamous Jezebel. Far from being convinced and humbling herself to the true and living God, this wicked woman is furious that the prophets of her God are slain. She sends a messenger to Elijah, "So let the gods do to me and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow about this time." For once Elijah acts upon impulse, and so

YIELDS TO TEMPTATION.

He looks at the circumstances instead of at the Lord, and instantly gets discouraged. He was called to a life of faith which deals only with God, and which leaves Him to deal with men and things. But this time he misses it. The very man who could take his life in his hand and go fearlessly to meet Ahab now flees for his life from fear of Jezebel. And why? Simply because he does not put the matter into the hands of God. For once Elijah takes his cause into his own hands, but it is once too many. All his wondrous past experience does not save him from falling into this mistake. What we are and what we have been will never save us, but only what God is to us through faith in Him. Elijah's faith for the raising of the dead sufficed for that time; his faith for God's answer by fire sufficed for that time; but the present circumstances need present faith, and nothing in the past can make us independent of God for one moment in the present.

The manifestation of God on Carmel had been so glorious to him that he cannot conceive how Ahab and Jezebel are not crushed by it. The whole cause seems lost, and evil seems still to triumph. It may be he had formed a mental picture of Ahab and Jezebel both converted, and the whole court of Israel yielded up to the service of God, and his dream is rudely broken and dispelled. From looking at circumstances, he comes to look at himself, and is equally disappointed. He leaves his servant at Beersheba, and goes a day's journey into the wilderness, and in his deep despondency he cries, "If I am not better than my fathers." Up to this time we have no indication that Elijah expects anything from himself; he is always occupied with God. But no sooner does he leave the path of faith and look at himself, at circumstances and people, than he becomes just like any other man.

"I AM NOT BETTER than my fathers." This is just the level of the worlding, or of the Christian who has not received the Holy Ghost in His fullness. The Holy Ghost does not speak of Himself, but witnesses of Jesus (John 16: 13; 15: 27). And most truly they in whom the Holy Ghost has full possession do not talk about themselves for good or bad. "I am not better than my fathers," betrays an expectation of something in himself, which should be better than others. There never can be anything good in us, except "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1: 27).

But how should the Lord treat His discouraged, humbled servant? Should He reproach and rebuke him? He sends an angel to touch him, and to say unto him: "Arise and eat." And he who had been looking everywhere but into the face of God sees how tenderly God has been caring for him: "There was at his head a cake baked on the coals, and a cruse of water" (R. V.). "He did eat and drink, and laid him down again." A second time the angel of the Lord touches him and leads him to take the food prepared, saying: "Arise and eat, because the journey is too great for thee." He does so, and in the strength of that meat he goes forty days and forty nights. But although the despair has passed from him, yet Elijah is not walking in the light of God; he is still looking on the human side of things; he can fast, he can do anything, but just at this crisis he cannot understand God. At last he reaches Horeb, the mount of God, and takes up his abode in a cave.

How is he to get back into the sunlight? All seems to him so dark, almost as though God were indifferent to His own cause. Oh, if man had to disentangle himself from the snares of the enemy, he might well give up hope! But when God sees there is no willing clinging to sin or to self He comes down to us where we are. The Word of the Lord comes to Elijah where he is in the cave: "What doest thou here, Elijah?" Now it all comes out: Elijah has been

of things—"I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts: for the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away." What a change from the old key of Elijah's words! His former subject-matter was always, "The Lord God of Israel," "The Lord God of hosts before whom I stand;" now it is I, I, I.

The first thing to be done is to get his eye off himself. Accordingly, God says to him, "Go forth and stand upon the mount before the Lord." It was but to say, "Return, Elijah, to thy old life of standing before God." "And, behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and broke in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still, small voice." Elijah knows that voice; it is the first thing which draws him from his lethargy; it is life and power to him. He hears it, and wraps his face in his mantle, and goes out and stands at the entering in of the cave. The same question is asked of him, he gives the same reply, the spell is not yet broken.

Then God treats him with His old confidence, and sends him on a message: "Go, return on thy way to the wilderness of Damascus; and when thou comest, anoint Hazael to be king over Syria; and Jehu the son of Nimshi shalt thou anoint to be king over Israel; and Elisha the son of Shaphat, of Abel-meholah shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room." Baal worship should be destroyed, but not in the way Elijah had thought; God was faithful, but He worked out His own plans, not Elijah's.

"It shall come to pass, that him that escapeth the sword of Hazael shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth from the sword of Jehu shall Elisha slay." Here is God's plan, the unfolding, Elisha shall have a successor; the testimony of prophecy shall be continued. Ahab is not converted, but Jehu shall be raised up to destroy Baal out of the land. The thought might easily arise in Elijah's heart, "Is all this to take place only in the future, and are all the souls for which I have prayed to perish?" One moment the veil is dropped which hides the working of God, "Yet I have left me [will I leave me, R. V.] seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him." While Elijah was counting upon Him, God was at work; He did not need Elijah's supervision. A mighty work of revival was going on quietly throughout the land; Elijah's prayers had been abundantly answered. Now, the spell was broken, the prophet was at large. Again, he could carry messages for God, again he could ignore the self which was so prominent in his despondency. Now, with a glad heart, he can go in the name of his God to find and anoint Elisha as the future prophet of Israel.

Oh, how we learn of this history the utter nothingness of man! We cannot depend on ourselves, our knowledge, our experience, or any other thing, but only on our God. Everything else breaks down. And then we learn also that God is to be trusted; that when we have committed anything to Him, He does undertake it, and even when we see nothing, there, far out of our sight, He is at work, carrying out His purposes, fulfilling His promises, answering the prayers of His people. Let us count on Him absolutely, trusting where we can see nothing but His Word to rest upon, for surely they which trust in Him shall never be ashamed.

"SOME TIME."

Some time, when all life's lessons have been learned,
And sun and stars forevermore have set,
He things which our weak judgment here has spurned.
The things o'er which we grieved with lashes wet
I'll flash before you out of life's dark night.
As stars shine most in deeper times of blue;
And we shall see how all God's plans were right,
And how what seemed reproof was love, most true.

And we shall see, that, while we frown and sigh,
God's plans go on as best for you and me;
And when we called, he loved not our cry,
Because his wisdom to the end could see,
And on as prudent parents disallow
Too much of sweet to craving babyhood,
O God, perhaps, is keeping from us now
Life's sweetest things, because it seemeth good.

And if, some time, commingled with life's wine,
We find the wormwood, and rebel and shrink,
To sure a wiser hand than yours or mine
Pours out this potion for our lips to drink;
And if some friend we love is lying low,
Where human kisses cannot reach his face,
And I do not blame the loving Father so,
But bear your sorrow with obedient grace.

And you shall shortly know that lengthened breath
Is not the sweetest gift God sends his friend,
And that sometimes the sable pall of death
Conceals the fairest boon his love can send.
We could push away the gates of life,
And stand within, and all God's working see,
And could interpret all this doubt and strife,
And for each mystery find a key.

But not to-day. Then be content, poor heart:
God's plans, like hills pure and white, unfold;
We cannot see the close that lies apart;
Time will reveal the calyx of gold.
And if through patient toil we reach the land
Where tired feet with sandals loose, may rest,
Then we shall clearly know and understand
I think that we shall say that "God knew best."

"He loved us, and gave himself for us;" and we now that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are called according to his purpose.

If God be for us, who can be against us?
He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also rejoice in us all things?

For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come,
Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.—Rom. viii. 35, and orisons of last verse.

QUINBY'S NEW BEE-KEEPING.

The Mysteries of Bee-Keeping Explained.

Combining the Results of Fifty Years' Experience, with the Latest Discoveries and Inventions, and Presenting the most Approved Methods, Forming

A COMPLETE GUIDE TO SUCCESSFUL BEE-CULTURE.

By L. C. ROOT, Apiarian.

With 100 Illustrations, and a Portrait of M. Quinby.

When the first work of Mr. Quinby appeared, in 1866, it marked a great advance in the literature of the Apian, and at once became the standard authority. Very soon after its issue, the process of extracting honey was introduced, and almost revolutionized the practice of bee-keeping; this had hardly become an established success when comb-foundation demanded attention, and required other modifications of former methods. These great improvements were tested, simplified, and adopted by Mr. Quinby, and with a view to present these and other new methods, he was planning a new volume, when his sudden death occurred, at the age of 65. Thus was arrested a career of nearly half a century, during which he had devoted himself to the improvement and development of bee-culture, all of the fruits of which, in discoveries and inventions, were freely given to his fellow-laborers and the public.

Though Mr. Quinby was prevented from preparing his contemplated new work, the results of his later years of labor are not lost. The work fell to the hands of Mr. L. C. Root, his son-in-law, as well as his business associate for many years. That Mr. Root is favorably known as an Apiarian, is shown by the fact that he was, for many years, President of the Bee-keepers' Association, and he now properly succeeds Mr. Quinby in literature, as well as in business. Indeed it is fortunate that the unfinished task of Mr. Quinby has fallen into the hands of one who was so familiar with his methods and thought; while he presents Mr. Quinby's later views, as none other could have done, he greatly increases the value of the work by adding largely from the results of his own extended experience. It has not been found practicable to indicate which of the new matter is by Mr. Quinby or which by Mr. Root, as the record is often of their united experience; both being more desirous of establishing useful facts than of claiming the credit of their discovery.

A Beneficent Life Closed—A Champion of the Church—Birth and Early Life—A Disappointed Minister—Settlement at Ballston—Illness—Three Happy Years at Matteawan—Prostrated by Sickness—Editorial Work—Ten Years of Toil—Advent of Prosperity—European Tours—Work on Harper's Magazine—Authorship—Public Offices—Illness and Death.

"I HAVE fought a good fight," wrote the great apostle of the Gentiles when he was approaching death, and looked back over his years of toil and suffering. "I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." The master in Israel whose portrait appears on the first page and whose recent death we are now lamenting, might have used those words of his own career without vanity or self-glorification. For nearly half a century Dr. Prime has been known through the length and breadth of the land as a valiant soldier of Christ, an intrepid defender of the truth against assaults of all kinds. Infidels, Romanists, Agnostics, and members of "the advanced school" have crossed swords with him, and have learned to respect his Christian skill and valor. He has stood in the forefront of the battle.

A CHAMPION OF THE CHURCH of Christ, a leader in many a hard struggle, a veteran whose very name was a tower of strength. To his ministerial brethren the loss is a heavy one. His death leaves a vacancy which will not be easily filled, and the Church will sorely miss the encouraging, hopeful words which, whether speaking or writing, seemed always at his command. There are few evangelical ministers, especially few who have been in any kind of trouble or conflict, who have not at some time been debtor to him for kindly sympathy, sometimes uttered in his cheery, genial tones, sometimes in a personal letter, delicately and gracefully expressed, sometimes in the columns of the press. His hand was quick to strike when correction was needed, but it was tender as that of a woman when there was a wound to be bound up, or a bleeding heart to be soothed. In the pulpit, on the platform, in the editorial chair, the presence of Dr. Prime was a beneficent influence operating for good, an influence we can ill spare.

His death, as Dr. J. R. Paxton sadly said at his funeral, is a personal loss. There are thousands of Christian men—all, we think, who ever came in personal contact with him—who will echo those words on their own account. He was a true gentleman. His courtesy was not limited to distinguished persons or personal acquaintances. Numbers of strangers visiting the city, who had no claim on his consideration, were indebted to him for counsel and kindness. A case in point which years ago came under our own observation may be mentioned. A Christian gentleman, who had but recently crossed the Atlantic, had business to transact at the office of the Observer. He called there, but came away lamenting that his business had gone awry, and that his feelings as a foreigner had been wounded by what he described as the gross rudeness of an employé. He was advised to appeal to Dr. Prime himself, but, having no introduction, shrank from intruding on the great man. At length he took courage to write, and, to his surprise, was answered courteously by return mail. Armed with Dr. Prime's letter, he again presented himself at the office. The pompous individual who had insulted him before again came forward with a repulse written on his face. The foreigner quietly presented his credentials, and was amused to see the celerity with which the official changed his demeanor to one as near that of a gentleman as he could assume, and at the ease with which his business was transacted. Such incidents appear trivial, but the trivialities of life have much to do with its happiness or discomfort, especially when the feelings of a stranger are involved.

It was the same spirit of friendliness and cordiality which made his public letters charming. Dr. Prime was on the best of terms with his readers, and he ever wrote as one who loved his fellows. There is no surer way to the hearts of men than that of loving them, and the general outburst of regret which the announcement of Dr. Prime's death has called forth, is only an illustration of that fact.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Very curiously, Dr. Prime found the niche in the Christian church which he so ably filled through a disappointment. The fact may be an encouragement to some who have tried to serve God in some particular way and have failed. There was no one so well qualified to fill the editorial chair of a religious newspaper as Dr. Prime, but he would never have filled it if he had been permitted to continue the pastor of a church. At the age of twenty-two he was the settled minister over the Presbyterian Church of Ballston Spa, N. Y., and was looking forward to a career of usefulness. His great-grandfather and his father were both clergymen of distinction, and he had himself received an excellent training for the work. At the age of eight he began the study of Latin; at nine, Greek; at ten, Hebrew; at eleven he was fitted to enter college, though by reason of his youth that step was deferred until he was thirteen; at seventeen he was graduated at Williams, and the very next morning at nine o'clock (having ridden part of the night to reach the place) he began to teach in an academy where most of his pupils were considerably older than himself. He went to Princeton afterward for theological study, and had preached his first sermon before he was twenty-one. That sermon was preached in 1833, at Bedford, Westchester County, N. Y., and two years ago he went there again to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the event. The following year he was invited to accept the pastorate of Ballston Spa, and he accepted with much pleasure. Ballston was the scene of his birth. He drew his first breath there, on November 4th, 1812, though he passed his boyhood at Cambridge, Washington County, N. Y., where his parents removed soon after he was born.

HIS FIRST CHARGE.

The climate of Ballston Spa tried him severely, and he was somewhat reckless in his energies. Writing of that first year of ministerial labor, he said: "Mine was a short pastorate. One brief year of labor, and I was laid aside. And this suggests a caution to young ministers and their people. In the zeal of their youth, the fresh pastor rushes upon his work as though he were not, in part, at least, made of flesh. Conscious of great vitality, and untaught by experience, he is ready to preach whenever he has a chance, as if there were no limit to his powers of endurance.

"How long could a young man of slender build and delicate lungs expect to hold out, who preached three times every Sabbath, and held two or three meetings in the week, and made pastoral visits in a congregation scattered four or five miles in every direction? It was miserable economy of life and health. And the pastor and people were equally at fault in the matter. They asked, and he did not refuse. Every Sabbath evening, after two full services, the men in the village would get up a team, sometimes two or three teams, and carry me off four or five miles into the country, where notice had been given of preaching in a school-house, and there we would have an earnest meeting, in which the laymen participated while I did the speaking. Sometimes I lodged among the farmers on Sunday night, but more frequently rode home in the cold after a steam bath in the crowded school-room."

AT MATTEAWAN.

A brief period for rest and recuperation succeeded, and then the pastorate of the church at Matteawan, N. Y., was offered to Dr. Prime and accepted. He went there in 1837, and remained three years, which he always regarded as the happiest years of his life. He had just been married, and the charm which is always associated with the first home of a happy married life clung about the parsonage of Matteawan. Writing two years ago to the present pastor of that church, Dr. Prime thus referred to his experience there: "It was an ideal pastor charge, beautifully nestled at the foot of the mountains, near the great river, the people largely engaged in manufactures, liberal, hospitable, intelligent, and earnestly religious. entered upon my labors with enthusiasm, and pursued them with constantly increasing ardor and enjoyment. All the children were my friends. I was said to know every child in the parish by name. Those who grew up to manhood and womanhood continue to be my friends, and it is enough for me to be reminded that was the pastor in Matteawan of one who speak to me, to awaken my warmest interest. In foreign lands those young parishioners have hailed me as the friend of their childhood. How we do I remember the prayer-meetings, the revivals, the conversions, the communion season which we all enjoyed." To the end of his life Dr. Prime was accustomed to speak enthusiastically of his happiness there, and of the cordiality and kindness of his people.

THE END OF MINISTERIAL WORK.

More than one attack of illness prostrated him, but on his recovery he resumed his labor with renewed energy. At length, early in the year 1840, he was seized with an attack so severe that it was evident that persistence in preaching could only end in death. Then, with a reluctance shared by pastor and people, he resigned his charge. In the letter in which he announced the sad necessity to his people, he said:

"When I was first settled here 'I was sick and ye visited me.' From that time I have struggled daily in the midst of my manifold labors against a disease that has disabled many ministers of the Gospel, and laid not a few in the grave. Often when others may have thought that I was neglecting my duty I have been seeking temporary relief from the insidious effects of disease. Since my attack in October last it has manifested some symptoms that indicate clearly the necessity of a speedy cessation of public speaking. Such being the will of Providence 'What are we that we should reply against God?' Bowing to that will, I have now to ask the congregation to unite with me in a request that the Presbytery will dissolve the pastoral relation subsisting between us."

Dr. Prime was hoping that, though compelled to discontinue service as a preacher, some other field of usefulness might be opened to him. In a humorous speech delivered in April last, he remarked: "The opening of the year 1840 found me the pastor of a village church, for the second time broken down in health, and despairing of being able to continue in any labor that required public speaking. I said to my father, 'I must give up preaching.' Now, it is a good thing to have a father to say an encouraging word when you are down, and this is what he said: 'God help you, my son, you are fit for nothing else.'" God did help him, and he was abundantly fit for something else.

THE OBSERVER.

He applied for work on the Observer in the spring of 1840, and having already contributed occasional articles to its columns, his journalistic abilities were known, and he was appointed associate editor. The paper was then published in the Morse Building, on the corner of Nassau and Beekman streets, and was under the charge of Messrs. Sidney E. and R. C. Morse and A. P. Cummings. He settled down to his work with an energy that astonished every one, and very soon the entire editorial charge was left in his hands. The arduous character of his duties may be inferred from his own account, which he gave at a meeting held last April to celebrate the forty-fifth anniversary of his connection with the Observer.

"I was [he said] cook, cabin-boy, and all hands in one. I wrote the editorials, revised the manuscripts, made the selections, got up the news, religious and secular, read all the proofs, and had no help in any department except that Mr. David M. Stone, now the distinguished editor of the Journal of Commerce, contributed a financial article weekly. Yet even then I did not perform so much work as the editor before me. He managed the business office, edited the paper alone, got the papers ready for the mails, took them in a hand-cart and wheeled them to the post-office himself. I met a gentleman a short time ago who told me of his finding the editor with his hand-cart wheel stuck in a hole, and he helped him out."

This capacity for work remained with Dr. Prime to the last, though, happily, with increasing years there was less necessity for exertion. But when, on January 31st, 1882, the Potter Building was destroyed by fire, and with it were spoiled the forms of the next issue of the Observer, Dr. Prime rose to the emergency with an energy that reminded his old friends of his early achievements. He sent for two stenographers, and taking them to the parlor of an hotel, he dictated his entire editorial page in two hours, and the paper was in the hands of the subscribers on time. The first ten years of his editorial experience were, however, a trying time. His health was enfeebled, he had a wife and three children, and his salary was exceedingly small. At the end of that time, however, his most difficulties were over. His exertions were rewarded with a share in the proprietorship, and he knew no more the depressing effects of poverty which, in his profession more than in any other, cripple the mind and curtail its powers. By that time Dr. Prime's name had been identified everywhere with the Observer, and he had impressed his personality upon it. His hand was recognized in it in every department, and his bright, cheery words were welcome everywhere. A series of letters under the signature "Ireneus" was commenced and soon became famous. In those he chatted familiarly with his readers about any topic that happened to be prominent, and those letters were always read, whatever might happen to the other parts of the paper.

A VOYAGE TO EUROPE

became necessary at last. Thirteen years of incessant labor, broken only by vacations of the briefest extent, had told on a system always feeble. He broke down completely, and absolute rest became indispensable. His brother, Dr. E. G. Prime, consented to occupy his place during his absence, and immediately on his arrival the worn-out editor was lifted from his bed and taken on board ship. His brother says: "We carried him to the ship in a very feeble condition, and though we did not, like the elders at Ephesus in bidding Paul farewell, fall on his neck and kiss him, we did sorrow deeply lest we should see his face no more." The voyage and change of scene, and more than all, the absolute rest of mind which he enjoyed in Europe, produced the desired effect, and Dr. Prime returned to his post, after a year's absence, with renewed strength, mental and physical. It was, however, deemed prudent to reduce the strain under which he had collapsed, and Dr. E. G. Prime remained to continue his assistance.

The relief thus gained from the drudgery of the work had a valuable result. Dr. Prime had more time for his editorials and "Ireneus" letters, which grew brighter and sprightlier than ever. It also introduced him to a new circle of readers. Messrs. Harper & Brothers, the eminent publishers of this city, invited him to conduct one of the departments—that of the Editor's Drawer—in their magazine. The firm say of him: "He seized upon the opportunity with alacrity, and established a wide correspondence to collect the floating wit and humor of the day. From the most distant States and Territories came streams and reams of entertaining incidents, adventures, comicalities of all sorts, to amuse the public; but it was the editor's rule, which admitted no exception, never to allow a profane word to soil the Drawer, or a joke that would not be admissible in the most refined circles of society. The popularity of that department of Harper's Magazine became immense, while the secret of its source was carefully preserved. When the late Mr. James T. Fields ascertain that the editor of the Drawer was Dr. Prime, he remarked that that was 'the greatest joke that ever appeared in the Drawer.' This engagement also served to help another cherished scheme. The hundred dollars a number which Dr. Prime received from the publishers for his work was carefully laid aside, and was used as opportunity occurred to increase his share in the proprietorship of the Observer.

AUTHORSHIP.

The re-establishment of his health and his reduced editorial labors afforded Dr. Prime an opportunity, of which he eagerly availed himself, to recommence preaching, and in other ways to extend his usefulness. He did not accept a pastorate, but his ministerial friends were delighted to obtain so excellent a supply for their pulpits, and his services in that capacity were in frequent request. Sometimes he would go to the aid of a sick brother for an extended period, while the afflicted minister went away for rest. But his chief field of activity was with his pen. Beside his regular weekly supply of matter to his journal, he produced nearly forty volumes, one of which, his "Life of S. B. Morse," was a work of over seven hundred pages. An extensive European tour in 1866-67, and another in 1876-77, furnished him with matter for two or three volumes. Among others that he wrote were: "The Alhambra and the Kremlin," "The Old White Meeting-House," "Annals of the English Bible," "Thoughts on the Death of Little Children," "The Power of Prayer" (a sketch of the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting), with several continuations, "Memoirs of Rev. Nicholas Murray" and "Under the Trees." "The Power of Prayer," which was first published in 1859, was translated into several languages, and was reprinted in Europe, Asia, and Africa, attaining, it is said, a circulation of more than one hundred and seventy-five thousand copies.

PUBLIC OFFICES.

Beside these occupations, Dr. Prime's superabundant energy enabled him to accept and fill efficiently many important offices in connection with religious and philanthropic institutions. He has frequently been a Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and in 1883 he went as a delegate from the Northern body to the Southern General Assembly. He has been Corresponding Secretary of the American Bible Society, of which he was one of the active directors; Vice-President and Director of the American Tract Society; Corresponding Secretary of the American Evangelical Alliance; Vice-President and Director of the American and Foreign Christian Union; President of the New York Association for the Advancement of Science and Art; ex-President and Trustee of Wells College for Women; Trustee of Williams College; Honorary Fellow of the Incorporated Society of (English) Authors, and a member of many other religious, benevolent, and literary organizations.

LAST ILLNESS AND DEATH.

After Dr. Prime passed the turning-point in life of threescore years and ten, his friends noticed with solicitude a decrease in his energy. His mind was vigorous as ever, and it seemed that his sympathies deepened and broadened. None of the asperities that sometimes accompany old age crept into his work, but if there was a change in it, it was in a gentler, more brotherly spirit than before. But while the spirit was vigorous and active, the body showed signs of wear and decay. He continued to communicate with his readers as fully as ever, but he went out less frequently, and during the severe weather, both of excessive cold and heat, he was confined to his house.

On June 4th he left the city with his wife to celebrate at Ballston the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination and installation as first pastor of the Presbyterian church in that place. Those services performed, he proceeded to Manchester, Vt., where he intended to pass the month of August with his family. On his way he was seized with congestion of the liver, and on his arrival a physician was summoned. Before the end of a week he seemed to have completely recovered. He was, however, still conscious of weakness, and did not go out. On Sunday, July 12th, after sitting up for some time, he walked across the room to the bed, and lying down, closed his eyes as if for slumber. A little later a change in his appearance attracted notice, and it was found that he had had a paralytic seizure. He lay helpless for six days, unable to speak save in monosyllables, but he was able to satisfy his anxious family, who gathered around him, that he was not suffering pain, and that his mind was tranquil. On Saturday, July 18th, he passed away so calmly and peacefully that his sorrowing friends did not know the moment that his spirit fled.

It was a fit end to a life of activity, as of a tired warrior laying himself down to rest. He will be sorely missed, first and chiefly by the readers of his journal, who will no longer be cheered and encouraged by his irrepressible good humor and wise, pithy comments; the church and the benevolent societies which he so faithfully served will lament his removal, and a host of friends from distant cities will miss one of the charms of their visits to the metropolis. To the great Head of the Church, whom we thank for sending and qualifying our departed friend for his special sphere, we look to raise up others to continue the work he did so long and so well.

How to Deal with Socialism is one of the most difficult problems of our time. One of the best suggestions is that made in the National Review to men of wealth by Lord Brabazon, who advises them to "descend into the streets" and hold friendly intercourse with the dwellers in the slums. "I do not so much care," says Lord Brabazon, "that you should increase your subscriptions to charitable objects (though this might often be done with advantage), as that you should use the great influence you possess in the cause of the happiness of the greatest number. I want you to show the poor man that he is not forgotten by you; that you are alive to his sorrows; that you sympathize with him in his troubles; that you respect him for his honest struggles against penury and want; that you admire him for his patience; that you willingly acknowledge that moral worth is superior to all social distinction; that you recognize wealth as a talent which has been given you from above, and that your greatest pleasure in life is to use it for the good of your less favored brethren. If wealth descended oftener into the streets, there would be less animosity between capital and labor. Let the rich man take for his motto, 'Not alms, but a friend'—a friend who should use his wealth and his education to bridge the yawning chasms of society, for is it not true that separation begets ignorance, and ignorance hatred?"

Another Campaign in the Soudan is being earnestly advocated by General Wolseley, who has returned to England, and is anxious to retrieve his reputation. His demand receives little support either from the Government or the people. The few British troops at Suakim are reported to be suffering terribly from disease, a fact which discourages the public from any new enterprise in that direction. A cable despatch to the Sun says that thousands of corpses of men and animals are lying exposed to the sun, being only slightly covered with sand, in the vicinity of Suakim, have made the soil a vast breeder of typhoid fever, which has caused many deaths, and filled not only the regular hospitals but also the portable hospitals with sick soldiers. The latter hospitals are usually used only during active service, but so rapid was the increase of disease among the soldiers that they had to be brought into requisition to afford accommodation for the suffering men. The only water to be had is distilled by the ships in the harbor, and this is served to the troops warm. No vegetables are attainable, and the hardships of even those not sick are almost beyond endurance.

THE RANSOMLESS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Beware lest He take thee away with His stroke: then a great ransom cannot deliver thee."—JOB 36: 18.

Strokes that are Final—I. Removal of Intellect—Responsibility of the Demented—The Cornish Fool—Intellect an Uncertain Possession—Death-bed Repentance Precarious—II. Withdrawal of the Spirit—A Despairing Letter—The Dead Line—III. Death—Where the Gospel Call Stops—No Renewal of the Offer—An Unreasonable Doctrine—A Place not Favorable to Reform—The Ransom Made.

TROUBLE makes some men mad. It was so with Job. He had lost his property, he had lost his physical health, he had lost his dear children, and the losses had led to exasperation instead of any spiritual profit. I suppose that he was in the condition which many are now in who sit before me. There are those here whose fortunes have begun to flap their wings, as though to fly away. There is a hollow cough in some of your dwellings. There is a substruction of comfort and happiness, and you feel disgusted with the world, and impatient with many events that are transpiring in your history, and you are in the condition in which Job was when the words of my text accosted him: "Beware lest He take thee away with His stroke: and then a ransom cannot deliver thee."

I propose to show you that sometimes God suddenly removes from us our gospel opportunities, and that when he has done so our case is ransomless. "Beware lest He take thee away with His stroke: then a great ransom cannot deliver thee."

I. Sometimes the stroke comes in the REMOVAL OF THE INTELLECT.

"Oh!" says some man, "as long as I keep my mind I can afford to adjourn religion." But suppose you do not keep it? A fever, the hurling of a missile, the falling of a brick from a scaffolding, the accidental discharge of a gun—and your mind is gone. If you have ever been in an anatomical room, and have examined the human brain, you know what a delicate organ it is. And can it be possible that our eternity is dependent upon the healthy action of that which can be so easily destroyed?

"Oh!" says some one, "you don't know how strong a mind I have." I reply: Losses, accident, bereavement, and sickness may shipwreck the best physical or mental condition. There are those who have been ten years in lunatic asylums who had as good a mind as you. While they had their minds they neglected God, and when their intellect went, with it went their last opportunity for heaven. Now they are not responsible for what they do, or for what they say; but in the last day they will be held responsible for what they did when they were mentally well; and if, on that day, a soul should say: "Oh! God, I was demented, and I had no responsibility," God will say: "Yes, you were demented; but there were long years when you were not demented. That was your chance for heaven, and you missed it." Oh, better be, as the Scotch say, a little "daft," nevertheless, having grace in the heart; better be like poor Richard Hampson, whose biography has just appeared in England—a silly man he was, yet bringing souls to Jesus Christ by scores and scores—giving an account of his own conversion, when he said: "The mob got after me, and I lost my hat, and I climbed up by a meat-stand, in order that I might not be trampled under foot; and while I was there, my heart got on fire with love toward those who were chasing me, and springing to my feet, I began to exhort and to pray." Oh! my God, let me be in the last, last day the Cornish fool, rather than have the best intellect God ever created unilluminated by the Gospel of Jesus Christ!

THE CORNISH FOOL,

AN UNCERTAIN POSSESSION.

Consider what an uncertain possession you have in your intellect, when there are so many things around to destroy it; and beware, lest before you use it in making the religious choice, God takes it away with a stroke. I know a good many of my friends who are putting off religion until the last hour. They say, when they get sick they will attend to it, but generally the intellect is beclouded; and oh, what a doleful thing it is to stand by a dying bed, and talk to a man about his soul, and feel, from what you see of the motion of his hand, and the glare of his eye, and from what you hear of the jargon of his lips, that he does not understand what you are saying to him. I have stood beside the death-bed of a man who had lived a sinful life, and was as unprepared for eternity as it is possible for a man to be, and I tried to make him understand my pastoral errand; but all in vain. He could not understand it, and so he died.

Oh! ye who are putting off until the sick hour preparation for eternity, let me tell you that, in all probability, you will not be able in your last hour to attend to it at all. There are a great many people who say they will repent on the death-bed. I have no doubt there are many who have repented on the death-bed, but I think it is the exception. Albert Barnes, who was one of the coolest of men, and gave no rash statistics, said thus: That in a ministry of nearly half a century—he was over seventy when he went up to glory—he had known a great many people who said they repented on the dying bed, but, unexpectedly to themselves, got well; and he says, How many of those, do you suppose, who thought it was their dying bed, and who, after they repented on that dying bed, having got well, lived consistently, showing that it was real repentance, and not mock repentance—how many? not one, not one!

II. Again: this stroke may come to you in the WITHDRAWAL OF GOD'S SPIRIT.

I see people before me who were, twenty years ago, serious about their souls. They are not now. They have no interest in what I am saying. They will never have any anxiety in what any minister of the Gospel says about their souls. Their time seems to have passed. I know a man, seventy-five years of age, who, in early life, became almost a Christian, but grieved away the spirit of God, and he has never thought earnestly since, and he cannot be roused. I do not believe he will be roused until eternity flashes on his astonished vision.

It does seem as if sometimes, in quite early life, the Holy Spirit moves upon a heart, and being grieved away and rejected, never comes back. You say that is all imaginary? A letter, the address of which I will not give, dated last Monday morning, came to me on Tuesday, saying this: "Your sermon last night (that is, last Sabbath night) did not fit my case, although I believe it did all others in the Academy; but your sermon of a week ago did fit my case, for I am 'past feeling.' I am not ashamed to be a Christian. I would as soon be known to be a Christian as anything else. Indeed, I wish I was, but I have not the least power to become one. Don't you know that with some persons there is a tide in their spiritual natures which, if taken at the flood, leads on to salvation? Such a tide I felt two years ago. I want you to pray for me, not that I may be led to Christ—for that prayer would not be answered—but that I may be kept from the temptation to suicide!"

NO RETURN.

What I had to say to the author of that I said in a private letter; but what I have to say to this audience is: Beware lest you grieve the Holy Ghost, and He be gone, and never return. Next Wednesday, at two or three o'clock, a Cunard steamer will put out from Jersey City wharf for Liverpool. After it has gone one hour, and the vessel is down by the "Narrows," or beyond, go out on the Jersey City wharf, and wave your hand, and shout, and ask that steamer to come back to the wharf. Will it? Yes, sooner than the Holy Ghost will come back when once He has taken his final flight from thy soul. With that Holy Spirit some of you have been in treaty, my dear friends.

The Holy Spirit said: "Come, come to Christ." You said: "No, I won't." The Spirit said, more importunately: "Come to Christ." You said: "Well, I will after a while, when I get my business fixed up; when my friends consent to my coming; when they won't laugh at me—then I'll come." But the Holy Spirit more emphatically said: "Come now." You said: "No, I can't. I can't come now." And that Holy Spirit stands in your heart to-night, with His hand on the door of your soul, ready to come out. Will you let Him depart? If so, then, with a pen of light, dipped in ink of eternal blackness, the sentence may be now writing: "Ephraim is joined to his idols. Let him alone! Let him alone!" When that fatal record is made, you might as well brace yourselves up against the sorrows of the last day, against the anguish of an unforgiven death-bed, against the flame and the overthrow of an undone eternity; for though you might live thirty years after that in the world, your fate would be as certain as though you had already entered the gates of darkness. That is the dead line. Look out how you cross it!

"There is a line by us unseen,
That crosses every path;
The hidden boundary between God's patience and His wrath."

And some of you, to-night, have come up to that line. Aye, you have lifted your foot, and when you put it down, it will be on the other side! Look out how you cross it! Oh, grieve not the Spirit of God, lest He never come back!

DEATH.

III. This fatal stroke spoken of in the text may be our exit from this world. I hear aged people sometimes saying: "I can't live much longer." But do you know the fact that there are a hundred young people and middle-aged people who go out of this life to one aged person, for the simple reason that there are not many aged people to leave life? The aged seem to stand around like stalks—separate stalks of wheat at the corner of the field; but when death goes a-mowing, he likes to go down amid the thick of the harvest. What is more to the point: a man's going out of this world is never in the way he expects—it is never at the time he expects. The moment of leaving this world is always a surprise. If you expect to go in the winter, it may be in the summer; if in summer, it may be in the winter; if in the night, it may be in the daytime; if you think to go in the daytime, it may be in the night. Suddenly the event will rush upon you, and you will be gone. Where? If a Christian—into joy. If not a Christian—into suffering.

THE GOSPEL CALL STOPS

outside of the door of the sepulchre. The sleeper within cannot hear it. If that call should be sounded out with clarion voice louder than ever rang through the air, that sleeper could not hear it. I suppose every hour of the day, and now, while I am speaking, there are souls rushing into eternity unprepared. They slide from the pillow, or they slip from the pavement, and in an eye-winkling they are gone. Elegant and eloquent funeral oration will not do them any good. Epitaph, cut on polished Scotch granite, will not do them any good. Wailing of beloved kindred cannot call them back.

But, says some one: "I'll keep out of peril; I will not go on the sea, I will not go into battle—I'll keep out of all danger." That is no defence. Thousands of people, last night, on their couches, with the front door locked, and no armed assassin anywhere around, surrounded by all defended circumstances, slipped out of this life into the next. If time had been on one side of the shuttle and eternity on the other side of the shuttle, they could not have shot so quick across it. A man was saying: "My father was lost at sea, and my grandfather, and my great-grandfather. Wasn't it strange?" A man talking to him, said: "You ought never to venture on the sea, lest you, yourself, be lost at sea." The man turned to the other, and said: "Where did your father die?" He replied: "In is bed." "Where did your grandfather die?" "In his bed." "Then," he said, "be careful, lest some night, while you are sleep on your couch, your time may come!"

HORROR OF INSECURITY.

Death alone is sure. Suddenly, you and I will go out of life. I am not saying anything to our soul that I am not going to say to my own. We have got to go suddenly out of this life. If I am prepared for that change, I do not care where my body is taken from—at what point I am taken out of this life. If I am ready, it is well. If I am not ready, though I might be at home, and though my loved ones might be standing around me, and though there might be the best surgical and medical ability in the room, I tell you, if I were not prepared, I would be frightened more than tongue can tell. I may seem like cowardice, but I am not ashamed to say that I should have the most indescribable horror about going out of this world if I thought I was unprepared for the next—if I had no Christ in my soul; for it would be a plunge compared with which a leap from the top of Mont Blanc would be nothing.

FINALITY.

But this brings me to the most tremendous thought of my text. The text supposes that a man goes into ruin, and that an effort is made afterward for his rescue, and then says the thing cannot be done. Is that so? After death seizes upon that soul, is there no resurrection? If a man topples off the edge of life, is there nothing to break his fall? If an impenitent man goes overboard, are there no grappling hooks to hoist him into safety? The text says distinctly: "Then a great ransom cannot deliver thee." I know there are people who call themselves "Restorationists," and they say a sinful man may go down in the world of the lost; he stays there until he gets reformed, and then comes up into the world of light and blessedness. It seems to me to be a most unreasonable doctrine—as though the world of darkness were a place where a man could get reformed. Is there anything in the society of the lost world—the abandoned and the wretched of God's universe—to elevate a man's character and lift him at last to heaven? Can we go into the companionship of the Neroes, and the Herods, and the Jim Fisks, and spend a certain number of years in that lost world, and then by that society be purified and lifted up? Is that the kind of society that reforms a man and prepares him for heaven? Would you go to Shreveport or Memphis, with the yellow fever there, to get your physical health restored? Can it be that a man may go down into the diseased world—a world overwhelmed by and by that process, and in that atmosphere, be lifted up to health and glory? Your common sense says: "No! no!" In such society as that, instead of being restored, you would go down worse and worse, plunging every hour into deeper depths of suffering and darkness. What your common sense says the Bible reaffirms, when it says: "These shall go away into three months of punishment." I have quoted it wrong. "These shall go away into ten years of punishment." I have quoted it wrong. "These shall go away into a thousand years of punishment." I have quoted it wrong. "These shall go into everlasting punishment." And now I have quoted it right; or, if you prefer, in the words of my text: "Then a great ransom cannot deliver thee."

Now just suppose that a spirit should come down from heaven and knock at the gates of woe and say: "Let that man or ! Let me come in and suffer in his stead. I will be the sacrifice. Let him come out." The grim jailer would reply: "No, you don't know what a place this is, or you would not ask to come in; beside that, this man had full warning and full opportunity of escape. He did not take the warning, and now a great ransom shall not deliver him."

Sometimes men are sentenced to imprisonment for life. There comes another judge on the bench, there comes another governor in the chair, and in three or four years you find the man who was sentenced for life in the street. You say: "I thought you were sentenced for life." "Oh!" he says, "politics are changed, and I am now a free man." But it will not be so for a soul at the last. There will be no new judge or new governor. If at the end of a century a soul might come out, it would not be so bad. If at the end of a thousand years it might come out, it would not be so bad. If there were any time in all the future, in quadrillions and quadrillions of years, that the soul might come out, it would not be so bad; but if the Bible be true, it is a state of unending duration.

ETERNITY.

Far on in the ages one lost soul shall cry out to another lost soul: "How long have you been here?" and the soul will reply: "The years of my ruin are countless. I estimated the time for thousands of years; but what is the use of estimating when all these rolling cycles bring us no nearer the terminus." Ages! Ages! Ages! Eternity! Eternity! Eternity! The wrath to come! The wrath to come! The wrath to come! No medicine to cure that marasmus of the soul. No hammer to strike off the handcuff of that incarceration. No burglar's key to pick the locks which the Lord hath fastened. Sir Francis Newport, in his last moment, caught just one glimpse of that world. He had lived a sinful life. Before he went into the eternal world, he looked into it. The last words he ever uttered were, as he gathered himself up on his elbows in the bed: "Oh, the insufferable pangs of hell!" The lost soul will cry out: "I cannot stand this! I cannot stand this! Is there no way out?" and the echo will answer: "No way out." And the soul will cry: "Is this for ever?" and the echo will answer: "For ever!"

Is it all true? "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, while the righteous go into life eternal." Are there two destinies? and must all this audience share one or the other? Shall I give an account for what I have told you to-night? Have I held back any truth, though it were plain, though it were unpalatable? Must I meet you there, oh, you dying but immortal auditory? I wish that my text, with all its uplifted hands of warning, could come upon your souls. "Beware lest He take thee away with His stroke: then a great ransom cannot deliver thee."

RANSOM MADE.

Glory be to God, there is a ransom that can now deliver you, braver than Grace Darling putting out in a life-boat from Longstone light-house for the rescue of the crew of the Forfarshire steamer—Christ the Lord launched from heaven, amid the shouting of the angels. Thirty-three years afterward, Christ the Lord launched from earth for heaven, amid human and infernal execration; yet staying here long enough to save all who will believe in Him. Do you hear that? To save all who will believe in Him. Oh, that pierced side! Oh, that bleeding brow! Oh, that crushed foot! Oh, that broken heart! That is your hope, sinner. That is your ransom from sin, and death, and hell.

Why have I told you all these things to night, plainly and frankly? It is because I know there is redemption for you, and I would have you now come and get it. Oh, men and women long prayed for, and striven with, and coaxed of the mercy of God—have you concentrated all your physical, mental, and spiritual energies in one awful determination to be lost? Is there nothing in the value of your soul, in the graciousness of Christ, in the thunders of the last day, in the blazing glories of heaven, and the surging wrath of an undone eternity to start you out of your indifference, and make you pray? Oh, must God come upon you in some other way? Must He take another darling child from your household? Must He take another instalment from your worldly estate? Must He come upon you with sorrow after sorrow, and smite you down with sickness before you will be moved, and before you will feel?

Oh, weep now, while Jesus will count the tears. Sigh now in repentance, while Jesus will hear the grief. Now clutch the cross of the Son of God before it be swept away. Beware, lest the Holy Spirit leave thy heart. Beware, lest this night thy soul be required of thee. "Beware, lest He take thee away with His stroke: then a great ransom cannot deliver thee." Oh, Lord God of Israel, see these impenitent souls on the verge of death ready to topple over! See them! Is there no help? Is this plea all in vain? I cannot believe it, blessed God. Oh, thou mighty One, whose garments are red with the winepress of thine own sufferings, in the greatness of thy strength ride through this audience, and may all this people fall into line, the willing captives of thy grace. Men and women immortal! I lay hold of you to-night with both hands of entreaty and of prayer, and I beg of you, prepare for death, judgment, and eternity.

WHEN a person claims to be a hundred years old or more, the public naturally feels incredulous. It is not easy to convince men that life can be prolonged far beyond the limit mentioned by the Psalmist of threescore years and ten for ordinary people, and fourscore years for the strong. Sometimes, too, elderly people desiring notoriety lay claim falsely to advanced age. Others who are not designedly imposing on the public are themselves deceived as to their own age through imagining that they actually witnessed some important event, when, in fact, their impressions of it are due to hearing a vivid description of it from their parents or elder brothers. So it has come about that when some old man or woman tells us that he or she is above a hundred years old, we are apt to think they are adding wittingly or by mistake ten or fifteen years to the actual number. It is, however, clearly established, that it is not impossible to live a century. There is the clearest evidence, for example, that Sir Moses Montefiore, the eminent Jewish philanthropist who died a few weeks ago, was born in 1784, and died in 1885; and there are other well-established cases. A very interesting instance is that of the lady whose portrait appears on page 540.

The parish registers of Sutton Coldfield, England, show that in March, 1782, the curate of the church, the Rev. James Hastings, brought to the church his eldest daughter, who was born on March 14th of that year, and she was baptized there by the name of Joanna. The curate himself lived to a good old age, as did several of his children, some of whom attained distinction. The identity of Joanna could not have been changed, and as she is living now, she is in her hundred and fourth year. One of her nephews, George W. Hastings, is a member of Parliament, two of her brothers, who are dead, were admirals in the Royal Navy.

Joanna is now living at the salubrious town of Malvern, at the foot of the Malvern Hills. A bronchial trouble prevents her taking exercise in the open air, but otherwise she enjoys excellent health. She has never married, but, like many old maids, has been all her life a blessing to the families of her brothers and sisters, living a life of self-denial and helpfulness. From her early youth she has been a sincere Christian, and, like her Master, she has gone about doing good. The fact is significant that so many very old people have led lives of this kind. It may be commended to the notice of young people beginning life. Two inferences may be drawn from it, either of which is worth consideration. Either God sometimes rewards with length of days people who spend their lives in doing good, or a life of quiet confidence and trust in God, which relieves the mind of the worry that kills, conduces to longevity. One thing we are assured of in either case: "The years of the wicked are shortened" (Prov. 10: 27).

THE ORDER OF FUTURE EVENTS.

By Rev. T. C. Deshares, of Toronto.*

The Event Past—Those to Come—The Watchers—Preserved from the Tribulation—The Abomination of Daniel—Its Place—No Intervening Event to be Expected—Watching Directed—The Promised Blessing.

We notice, as we examine closely the remarkable sermon delivered by our Lord on the Mount of Olives recorded in the 24th and 25th chapters of the Gospel of Matthew, that the rapture of the believing watchful company is the sign of the presence of Christ. As Jesus sat on the Mount of Olives He presented before the disciples, in response to their desire, the order of events that would transpire to the end of the age. There was, first, the destruction of Jerusalem, which is past, the interval of the rejection of the Jewish nation, their return in unbelief as signalled by the presence of the Lord in the air, His return in blessing with manifested power, and the judgment of the Gentile nations. As He had said, "Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. 23 : 39). It is reasonable to suppose that to the Jewish nation He would first direct His attention in setting forth the wondrous events and circumstances that would be connected with their return. The prophecy furnishes a confirmation of this, and thus from the 6th to the 31st verse, inclusive, of the 24th chapter, we have naught but details of distress, suffering, and tribulation, which they would have to experience and pass through till the Lord was revealed from heaven as their Messiah King.

But while we see this, we also see, with our eyes wide open upon the prophetic page, the dignity and glory that is associated with a distinct order of people.

THEY WERE TO BE WATCHERS

for their coming Lord. They were not, if they were true to their privileges as sons of God, united by the Holy Ghost to the risen exalted Son, to pass through the tribulation, the great, the dreadful portion of a remnant of the rejectors of the glorified Messiah. The language is clear and decisive as to this blessed company: "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. For as in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be. Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Watch therefore; for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come" (Matt. 24 : 37-42). Such as were ready and watchful were to be raptured before the first pang of distress of that dread hour that was to come upon all the world.

THE PLACE OF THE ABOMINATION.

We learn from the 15th verse where the abomination spoken of by Daniel the prophet was to stand. It was to stand in the Holy place. The people were to be regathered, the Holy place was to be rebuilt, and the sacrifices restored. As our Lord referred to Daniel and said, "Whoso readeth will understand," we have but to refer to him and read in order to understand. In the 9th chapter of His prophetic vision we have the distinct statement that in the midst of the seventieth week, the unaccomplished period of time, the Prince that shall come, the great leader of the infidel nations, the mighty Head of evil that had been gathering, would cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the over-spreading of abominations that make desolate even until the consummation (Dan. 9 : 27).

The whole prophecy of our Lord is clear with regard to the closing period of this age. Three years and a half counted backward from the 15th verse, and three years and a half (the period of the great tribulation) counted forward to the close, will make up the seventieth week or seven years. The point of commencement is uncertain. There is therefore between the present and the coming of presence of the Lord. I take it, then, that the presence of the Lord (I use the word presence, as it is a more suitable word to express the original, as it implies a lengthened period)—I say, I take it that the presence of the Lord in the air covers a lengthened period until the final consummation. When Jesus comforted His disciples by the assurance, "I will come again and receive you unto myself," the word "receive" in the original implied "companionship," the very word that is used in the passage just quoted. "The one shall be taken and the other left." As the taken and the left one were both exhorted to watch, we see at a flash that they were both believers, and that only one was obedient to the word of the Master, and for this was borne aloft to His presence. We conclude, then, that the words of Jesus, "I will come again and receive you unto myself," had special reference to the watchful company.

Again, in the transfiguration scene we have Moses and Elias in glorified bodies, and Peter, James, and John taken to the Mount to witness the glory. Why the selection of these three? Why were the remaining nine left to contend powerlessly with the demoniac in the plain below? Why was the word "taketh" used by our Lord here, the very same word that was used in the previous instances? Was this coincidence undesigned? While Moses and Elias typify the order of the resurrection of the dead and the rapture of the living, did not Peter, James, and John shadow forth the blessed company of believers who, in the deep darkness, would be watching for the appearance of the morning star that was to usher in the coming day?

When Peter alluded in his epistle to this scene of glorious majesty he spoke on this wise: "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the daystar arise in your hearts" (1 Pet. 1 : 19). If the first Book of Moses be consulted as to any utterance of the Holy Ghost bearing upon this subject, we have a striking type in the person of Enoch, "and Enoch walked with God and he was not, for God took him" (Gen. 5 : 24). And the Apostle Paul, referring to this transaction, has said, "And was not found, because God had translated him" (Heb. 11 : 5). Enoch comes before us as a type of those who were to be raptured before the flood of tribulation would sweep over our world. The "walking with God" implied a readiness as his not being found the secrecy of the rapture. Surely when our Lord said, "Watch ye therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man" (Luke 21 : 36), He meant that the watchful saint would escape some fearful trial. Surely when He spoke from the glory to the Philadelphia Church, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth" (Rev. 3 : 10), He meant that those who did not keep that word would have to face a terrible hour.

I cannot conceive it possible that our Lord, in addressing His disciples, should so frequently exhort them to "watch" for His coming, without attaching some special blessing to the obedience of His word. If those who were moved by the Holy Ghost to impart instruction for the guidance and well-being of the Church of God not only seized upon that word "watch," but also introduced other words in their writings expressive of the intense yearning which possessed the hearts of all who believed in His second coming, I do say, with all the tender affection that one Christian should have toward another, that we must either attach no meaning whatever to language, or believe the Word of the living God, that there was a special blessing, honor, and dignity in store for all such. If we allow any other event, such as the restoration of the Jews, or the millennium, to intervene between the moment we grasp the living Christ by faith and the coming of the Lord, all those words expressive of readiness for that coming might as well be expunged from the divine vocabulary.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Stern Mooring Not Cast Off.—A Christian worker related the following at a recent meeting: "Not long ago I was standing watching a steamer leaving a pier. It left as one would have thought all right, but it did not get more than a yard from the wharf, because one of her stern moorings was still fastened to the pier, therefore her progress was stayed until the fastening was unloosed. Just so with many Christians; they cannot grow in grace because there is something drawing them down to the world; it may seem trifling to them, but yet that one cord is keeping them back in Christian life. We must lay aside every weight, and the sins which do so easily beset us, and then our path will be ever upward and onward."

A Mother's Solemn Vow.—A Friend Related the following: "A mother whom I knew had a little boy that was the idol of her heart. Sickness came into her family, and one after another of her children was taken from her until she was left with only this little boy. He, too, was seized with the same disease, and the poor mother was almost distracted, and with pitiful tones she cried, 'Oh, I can never give him up.' But when she saw the little frame lying on a bed of great suffering, she cried, 'Oh, Lord, take my child away from this pain, and I will give my heart to Thee.' Her prayer was answered, and the little sufferer was taken to be with God. She kept her vow, and has given her life to the Saviour's service."

Sowing too Deep for Harvest.—Dr. Bonar remarked: "I heard of a farmer in America who got some seed of a new and very fine variety of Indian corn. With great pains he prepared the soil, and with much care sowed the corn deep into the ground, because he thought by so doing he would reap a plentiful harvest. A neighbor farmer also got a handful of this new corn, but he covered it very lightly with earth. When the reaping time came the farmer first mentioned was greatly disappointed to see, instead of a plentiful harvest, as he expected, a few scanty patches here and there. But his neighbor, out of the handful of grain, had a splendid field of corn. Dear friends, you who are called to speak of Christ to others, do not go too deep for your hearers, for if you do so your harvest must be scanty and spare, but rather with simple language deliver your message from your Master."

A Lamb Led to the Shepherd.—The Rev. Mr. McLachlan remarked: "I attended Mr. Hammond's meeting in the Queen's Rooms, Glasgow, the other day, where a number of young people were gathered. In the after-meeting I went down to a little boy and said, 'Are you trusting Jesus?' 'No; but I would like to,' was the reply. Opening my Bible, I directed him to Isaiah 53 : 5. 'He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed.' 'Who was wounded for our transgressions?' I asked. 'Jesus,' he answered. 'And who put Jesus to death for us?' I again asked. 'The Jews,' he said. But I told him to look at the next verse, where it said: 'The Lord hath laid upon Him the iniquity of us all.' 'Now,' I said, 'can you tell me who it was?' 'It was God,' he replied. Before leaving he professed to give himself to the Lord. After he had done

I prayed, and then I told him to pray; and simple and sweet language he thanked the Lord for what He had done for him. Strange say, his mother had given herself to the Lord the occasion of Mr. Hammond's previous visit to Glasgow, seventeen years ago, and now it is rejoicing that under the same servant of God her son has surrendered himself to Christ."

Unhappy at a Fair.—Mr. A. Campbell Related: "Last summer I was going through a fair in Paris, when I noticed a little boy mingling along with both hands pushed into his eyes and weeping bitter tears. I wondered what his child could be crying for in such a place, for I thought it was the very place to make a child happy. Going to him, I said, 'What is the matter with you, my little fellow? What are you crying about?' Looking up at me through his tears, he said, 'Give me my father, give me my father.' With some difficulty I found his mother and restored the child to him. As I walked on my way I thought, 'The world is not like this fair; it has everything in it that one does not desire; nothing can I think of but what I may obtain. I have tried them all, but nothing satisfied me until, like the little boy, I cried, 'Give me my Father,' and until I found that God was indeed my Father, through accepting Christ as my Saviour I had no joy."

A Wicked Career Ended.—Mr. Graham Related: "When I was a little boy I was a great trouble to my parents. I was the worst boy in my neighborhood; nothing was too bad for me. As I grew older I had a great longing to be a sea. One day I went to the captain of a vessel that was just sailing for the East Indies, and I asked him leave to go with them. After much urging, he unwillingly consented to take me. I ran home and told my mother, who after some delay gave me leave to go. From that time my life became worse and worse, until I had plunged into the very depths of sin. As I neared the East Indies, a young fellow, who had been speaking of nothing else all the voyage out but of his home and his friends and the surprise he was going to give them, one day, while talking in this strain, turned very pale and fell at my feet. He was carried ashore, and in a very short time he died. 'Then,' I thought, 'if that had been Alexander Graham, his soul would have been in hell!' These were my first serious thoughts. From that time I was deeply impressed. I used to go apart by myself and read my Bible. It was on one of these occasions that I first became aware that the Lord was willing to pardon me. When reading John 3:16, I asked pardon and received forgiveness of all my sins. But I can trace my conversion to a praying mother, for she had ever ceased to pray for me, through all my wicked career."

Nightly Visits to the Village Cross.—Mr. Laughlan said: "An old lady sat in the same church as I did, and when the minister was speaking I used to notice how she drank in every word that was spoken. I took a great interest in her, for she was a soul-winner, and did many good deeds, and I thought if ever I spoke to that lady I would ask her how she came to Jesus. It was seventeen years before I got this longed-for opportunity, but at the end of that time I was preaching in the church myself, and at the close I went up to her, and said, 'I have been longing for many years to ask you a question. How were you brought to the Lord?' On our way home she told me the following: 'I formerly belonged to a district about a hundred miles from Glasgow, and in that town there was a great cross erected dividing four streets. When I was very young I used to steal quietly out of bed, when all the house and the town were still, and run swiftly along until I came to that cross, and kneeling at the foot of it poured out my childish thoughts to God, for I had a strange idea that this was the cross to which they had nailed my Lord and Master. All my childish joys and sorrows were poured out there. And it was there I first learned to love Jesus, and since then I have served Him.' How old were you when you were conscious of having undergone this great change?' I asked. 'Between six and seven years of age,' she answered; and I thought, 'No wonder God used her for His work, when she had given a whole lifetime to Him.' She was then over sixty years old."

THE LONDON SCANDALS.

As many of our readers may have been misled on this subject by journals, like the New York Herald, which are horrified at the idea of the shameful crimes described by the Pall Mall Gazette being exposed, and profess to fear that the exposure may demoralize innocent persons, it may be well to quote some opinions of leading Christian transatlantic journals, with one or two facts. The evils described are flourishing here in awful luxuriance, and soon there will have to be a similar exposure in America, if nothing is done to purify the moral atmosphere.

The labyrinth of London, like that of Crete, has many chambers and underground passages; the clue that leads to the entrance is easily broken. Here, for instance, is one case given by the Pall Mall Gazette, in which a girl who is now in a respectable situation was imprisoned until her ruin was effected:

"K. S., a nursemaid, under fifteen, was once asked to take tea by a woman whose acquaintance she had made. She entered her house, but was not allowed to go out. She was forcibly detained in the house, but kindly treated. One night she was drugged, rendered unconscious, and when in that condition she was ruined by a nobleman. He kept her there for some months, when at last she succeeded in making her escape. The house is in a street near Hyde Park, kept by Miss , who pretended to keep a dyer's shop. The girl was sent to Cheshire from the hospital, and is now doing well."

A GIRL ESCAPES AFTER BEING SOLD.

"Being anxious to satisfy myself as to the reality of these transactions," says the Commissioner of the Pall Mall Gazette, "I instructed a thoroughly trustworthy woman to see if she could discover any of the children of whom I had heard, whose price was quoted like that of lambs at so much a head. The woman of the house to whom she went was somewhat suspicious, owing to the presence of a stranger, but after some conversation she said that she had one girl within reach, whom she would make over at once if they could come to terms. The girl was sent for, and duly appeared. She was told that she was to have a good situation in the country, within a few miles of London. She said that she had been brought up at home, had been in service, but had been out of a place for three weeks. She was a pleasant, bright-looking girl, who seemed somewhat nervous when she heard so many inquiries and the talk about taking her into the country. The bargain, however, was struck. The money was paid, the girl handed over, but something said had alarmed her, and she solved the difficulty of disposing of her by making her escape. 'Her escape,' said the ex-keeper, 'is one of the risks of the trade. If I had been really in for square business, I should never have agreed to take the girl from the house, partly in order to avoid such escape and partly for safety. It is almost invariably the rule that the seller must deliver the girl at some railway station. She is brought to you, placed in your cab or railway carriage, and it is then your business to see that she does not escape you.'"

THE REV. NEWMAN HALL STATES:

"One Sunday evening the parents of a young girl came in great distress, inquiring for her. She had been at the Sunday afternoon school, and had not returned home. They searched in vain for three weeks, and then found her in one of the lowest haunts of London, ruined and deserted. A pretended friend had enticed her into a house for refreshment, the drink had been drugged, and she knew nothing till she woke in terror and despair."

Miss Brewster relates a touching incident of a beloved girl who went astray, and finally came home to die. "Promise me, dear father," she said, "that you will banish all drink from the table from this hour, for it was my first step toward ruin." Never again was wine seen upon that table. The use of wine and stimulants in houses is an auxiliary to the temptations which lead young women astray.

"AN ENGLISHWOMAN."

In a lengthy communication, breathing horror and indignation at the cruelties perpetrated by the priests and priestesses of this Moloch god, says: "These nameless horrors are not done as between man and woman alone, nor with our young girls only, awful as that is; but this that is now committed in our land is done upon our children. Fathers and mothers, think of it if you dare, realize it if you can!"

THE REV. MR. MOORE SAYS:

"When the first article of the Pall Mall Gazette's recent exposures was published, good people stood aghast almost stupefied, and were scarcely able to give even an opinion as to the probable results upon the morals of the public. Many remembered the lines of Pope:

'Vice is a monster of such frightful mien,
As to be hated needs only to be seen;
But seen too oft—familiar with its face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.'

and consequently they were fearful that the publication of such horrid revelations would make society worse instead of better. But even before the report was completed, there was a decided reaction in the public mind. And now that there has been sufficient time for reflection, it is generally conceded by those who are unprejudiced in the matter, that in the end much good will be effected. Undoubtedly, familiarity with vice is dangerous. But how can familiarity be avoided when vice is all around us? It is not needful to pursue the course of investigation adopted by our contemporary, and which has produced such a social earthquake, in order to come into contact with at least many features of the evil which has been exposed. The signs of this evil are all around us—in our streets, in our public gardens and parks. And here, unless we are greatly mistaken, are the seeds sown which bring the fruit to which public attention has been directed. As long as the unseemly conduct of the sexes, which is constantly on exhibition, especially during the summer evenings, in nearly all places of public resort, is allowed to go unrebuked and unpunished, it will be vain to seek for the suppression of the greater crimes which are hid away from the public view. But there is always danger attending any effort at reform. Interference with what exists is generally attended by some evil. If an old, decayed house is pulled down, it is not without some inconvenience and danger to the people in the neighborhood; but a temporary evil must be borne to reach a better state of things."

Another journal says: "Public opinion on the great moral question started by the Pall Mall Gazette is swelling to the flood. Never has so terrible a blow struck at flagrant immorality. The patrons of vice are smitten with amazement and anger, but the dread of exposure imposes restraint on their public manifestations. The shame lies not in the publication, but in the perpetration of these abominations. The disease known may perchance be cured, or abated, but unknown it works its fatal consequences. The great difficulty that has hitherto hindered social reformers in their crusade against the Acts of Parliament legalizing vice has been prudery and incredulity. The subject could not be publicly discussed, and for lack of discussion the magnitude of the evil was not realized. The Pall Mall Gazette has removed this difficulty with a vengeance, and now that the first shock is got over, we see the gathering volume of a healthy public feeling that will carry to success any legislative remedies that may be demanded. But, after all, it is not so much to the law as to the Gospel that we must look for the abatement of immorality."

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Qualified Approval of President Cleveland's administration was given by the National Civil Service Reform League at its recent meeting at Newport, R. I. The resolution referring to it was: "That by the general course of his executive action in regard to appointments and removals, and notwithstanding certain actions of the administration which, measured by the principles of reform, we disapprove, President Cleveland has proved, amid immense perplexities and difficulties, his fidelity to the patriotic principles asserted in his letter of December 25th, 1884, to the Executive Committee of this League, and his firmness and courage in enforcing his convictions." The League also pledged itself to urge by all means in its power the extension of the Pendleton law to all the officers and employments under the Government to which it is applicable.

An Order Issued by the Secretary of War caused a sensation last week in Washington society. It directed that all officers of the line of the army now serving on the staff of general officers who have been absent from their companies and regiments more than four years shall join their proper commands. A leading administration journal thus explains the order and the excitement it has produced: "Social and political influence has served to procure comfortable positions in the East for many officers, and to keep other officers on the frontier. This favoritism has not only retained these fortunate officers in their comfortable places, but also procured for them, directly or indirectly, promotions not earned. Once admitted to the circle of favorites, they have enjoyed advantages of every kind that were withheld from officers on the frontier." These favorite officers, it appears, are known as "Coburgers," a name imported from England, where the pleasant places in the army were reserved for Prince Albert's friends who hailed from Coburg.

A Gratifying Characteristic of the Ceremonies at the funeral of General Grant, and of the comments of the press subsequently, is the disappearance of the old sectional hostility. The presence of the Confederate generals among the pall-bearers has been generally hailed, both in the North and South, with satisfaction.

Only two Northern papers appear to have protested, and one of those is published in Maine. In the South the protests are similarly few and unimportant, and in one case the manager of the paper promptly repudiated, on his own account, the sentiments of his editor, which, he said, had his unqualified disapproval, and which, in his opinion, did not reflect the sentiments of the Southern people. A notable event in confirmation is reported also. On the day before the funeral the house at Appomattox in which Lee surrendered to Grant was draped with mourning emblems, a large crowd of prominent Southerners participating in the work.

The New Post Office Improvement was formally explained to the postmasters and the public last week. New "special delivery" stamps will be put in use October 1st. By placing one of these stamps, costing ten cents, upon a letter, in addition to the regular postage, the sender secures its immediate delivery in all towns and cities where the system is established. All post-offices having carrier delivery will deliver the specially stamped letters, and the system will be introduced in all cities and towns in the country having four thousand or more inhabitants.

A Distressing Mining Disaster Occurred at Shickshinny, near Wilkesbarre, Penn., on August 11th. The mines of the West End Coal Company at that place are remarkably free from explosive gases, but they give out deadly sulphurous fumes which are dispersed by a steam fan. On the evening of August 10th the fan was not in operation, owing to an accident to the engine. In the morning, when the day-men went down they were uneasy about the fan, but the boss told them it would be at work in an hour. Sixty men went down the slope, but before all had reached the workings the foremen were seen to drop down insensible, and all were growing dizzy with the noxious gases which had accumulated during the night. A rush was made for the open air, but many sank down overcome before they could escape, and had to crawl out on their hands and knees. Just how many were left in the pit was unknown, but the names of eleven men who were certainly there were stated. Search parties were organized immediately, the men going down into the pit with their mouths and nostrils covered with handkerchiefs saturated with ammonia, but they were driven back by the sulphurous fumes. One of the rescuing party, whose brother was among the lost, persisted in going forward to try to save his brother, and he was added to the number of the victims. Twelve in all were killed.

The Fate of Riel, the Leader of the Canadian half-breed revolt, is being fiercely discussed in the Dominion, and the dispute is arousing intense excitement. The feeling among English-speaking people in favor of the hanging of Riel is general. Many Protestants, and especially Orangemen who have voted the Conservative ticket and for Sir John A. Macdonald, say if Riel is pardoned they will never vote for Sir John again. The Toronto World, in the course of an article on Riel, says: "If Riel is pardoned by Sir John A. Macdonald at the intercession of the French Canadians, he will discover that on making one friend he will alienate one hundred, and precipitate a war of races, which some people look upon as inevitable at no distant day."

The British Parliament was Prorogued on August 14th. The Queen's speech delivered on the occasion gave, as usual, a résumé of the events since the opening of the session. Respecting the disastrous Sudan campaign the speech said: "Although the objects of the expedition were unattained, I have great reason to be proud of the bravery and endurance displayed by my soldiers and sailors, and of the skill wherewith they have been commanded. I received with great pleasure the loyal offers of military assistance for this campaign from my colonies, from the native princes of India, and a contingent from the colony of New South Wales served with distinction in the actions on the coast of the Red Sea. The death of El Mahdi will probably enable me to perform with less difficulty the duties toward the ruler and people of Egypt which events have imposed upon me. I shall not relax my efforts to place government and good order in that country upon a firm foundation." A singular omission in a speech which referred to many unimportant events was that no mention was made of the suppression of the half-breed rebellion in Canada, which, considering all the circumstances of the campaign, would, it was expected, have received royal acknowledgment.

The Anglo-Russian Difficulty is Not Yet adjusted. The latest authoritative intelligence is not sanguine. Before the prorogation of Parliament Lord Randolph Churchill, Secretary of State for India, said the duties of the Afghan Boundary Commission had not yet been completed, and that the Government did not intend to withdraw the commission. The dispute with Russia about Zulufkar Pass, the secretary continued, was not trivial, but the Government was not altogether without some hope to arrive ere long at a satisfactory settlement of all the points remaining in dispute between England and Russia.

The Agitation Aroused in England by the disclosures of the Pall Mall Gazette of the prevalence of vice in high places increases. In Liverpool, Manchester, and other large cities vigilance committees are being formed for the purpose of obtaining local legislation for the suppression of open vice. Mrs. Fawcett, the widow of Professor Fawcett, is strongly in favor of continuing the agitation. Replying to certain criticisms on her conduct in this respect, Mrs. Fawcett contends that the agitation begun in the revelations made by the Pall Mall Gazette has already resulted in many benefits to the people of England, among which she enumerates a great arousing of the public conscience, increased activity, both public and private, in the kind of moral work performed by the Rescue and Purity Associations, and increased severity in the sentences for crimes against children. "All this," Mrs. Fawcett says, "will tend to save young men and women from wallowing in vice." The Purity Society has encountered much opposition in its work of shadowing public men. Its numerous agents, who have been acting as detectives, have been warned to refrain from annoying members of Parliament, many of whom have complained of being "pestered."

An Imperial Meeting is Being Arranged between the Czar of Russia and the Emperors of Germany and Austria. The National Gazette of Berlin states that Prince Dolgorouki, aide-de-camp to the Czar, has gone to Gastein to arrange for a meeting between Emperor William and the Czar after the meeting of the latter and Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria at Kremsier. The Russian Minister of Communications is already at Warsaw, making preparations for the Czar's visits to the Emperor of Austria and the Emperor of Germany.

Dr. Talmage Preached in London on Sunday evening last to an enormous congregation. He had previous to setting out for Europe declined all invitations to preach or lecture, as he needed rest. Some friendly pressure must therefore have been exerted to induce him to change his determination. The London correspondent cables that his sermon was delivered in the celebrated Wesleyan Chapel, behind which is the grave of John Wesley, and in front of which is Bunhill Burial Ground, where lie the bones of John Bunyan, Isaac Watts, Daniel Defoe and Horne Tooke. The preacher referred in his sermon to this hallowed ground. The chapel was crowded to suffocation. During the indoor services several thousand people stood in the front graveyard and in the street, impeding travel and awaiting Dr. Talmage outside. After the regular service he came into the church porch and addressed the multitude in full voice, and then with a smiling face he gave out a stirring hymn, after singing which the populace made the policemen happy by again freeing the thoroughfare.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers and others with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received to the amount of $4.50 since our last notice. From a Friend, Seward, Me, $2; a Friend in Montana, $1.50; a Friend in Chicago, Ill., $1.

A Christian Convention for Christian Life, divine healing, and evangelistic and missionary work will be held in the Gospel Tabernacle, West Twenty-third Street, New York, from Monday, October 5th, to Friday, October 9th. There will be three sessions each day. Various Christian workers and teachers from Europe and America are expected to take part in the services. Rev. A. B. Simpson, the pastor of the Tabernacle, writes: "All who desire simpler and fuller instruction in the Word of God, a more vivid manifestation of Jesus Himself, a deeper Christian life, a special baptism of the Holy Spirit for service and the quickening of their hearts in the truth, the life, and the work of the Lord, and in the hope of His Appearing, are cordially invited to attend this gathering, to wait upon the Lord for a deeper and richer blessing for ourselves than even last year, and a special outpouring of His Spirit upon the Church and world." Further particulars will appear next week.

The Northfield Christian Convention, held last week, attracted a large number of Christian workers from all parts of the country. The meetings were led by Mr. D. L. Moody and Rev. Drs. Gordon, of Boston; G. F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn; A. T. Pierson, of Philadelphia, and Brookes, of St. Louis, aided by prominent Christian workers of this country and Great Britain. The singing was under the charge of Messrs. Sankey, McGranahan, and Lowner. Fully three thousand persons attended the opening exercises, and the subsequent meetings were crowded, large numbers being unable to find admittance.

A Sunday Concert in Pittsburg was prevented by the energetic action of the Christian churches and pastors of the city last week. Several prominent people signed a called requesting the Mexican National Band to give a sacred Sunday evening concert at Exposition Park Theatre on August 16th. It was announced that the request would be granted, whereupon indignant protests were made by the Protestant clergymen of Pittsburg and Allegheny against any such desecration of the Sabbath. They even called a meeting for Saturday afternoon in the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, to take legal steps to stop the concert. Manager Starke, however, forestalled the ministers by publishing a card in an evening paper announcing that there would be no concert.

An Excellent Work is Being Done in Washington, D. C., at the "Central Union Mission," where Major George A. Hilton has been holding meetings. The mission was opened on January 25th last, and has been from the beginning a veritable "soul-saving station." Hundreds of young men who have gone to Washington seeking Government employment have been induced to attend the meetings, and a large number have been converted. In the national capital run-shops abound to an appalling extent, and such a mission as this is therefore a much-needed means of blessing. Its rooms are at 909 Pennsylvania Avenue, and services are held there twice each day. Since it was opened, no less than ten thousand persons have attended there. Major Hilton will, we understand, pay a short visit to New York in the fall to keep some long-standing engagements. He will receive a hearty welcome here, and we trust his visit will be much blessed. Miss Frances E. Willard, who has seen much of his work in Washington, D. C., Altoona, Penn., and other places, writes of him: "He has very exceptional gifts as a speaker, and the power of the Spirit rests upon him. Our white-ribbon women in Washington trust and prize this strong re-enforcement greatly. Major H. resembles Dwight L. Moody in physique, in zeal, and in methods. I do wish he might go to the West under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. for Gospel temperance work. I am confident he would be a mighty power there as here."

A Train Plunged Down a Steep Embankment into a lake at Mebrition, Ont., on August 10th, owing to a failure of the air-brakes. The train was a heavily-laden Pacific express drawn by two engines. When entering the Grand Trunk Yards at Mebrition it was found that the brakes would not work. A tug had just passed through the swing bridge, at the crossing of the Welland Canal, beyond the depot. The bridge was being closed as the train approached, and was only two or three feet open when the cars reached it. The train passed over the floor of the bridge, and on reaching the opposite side of the canal plunged down the steep embankment into the lake. The foremost engine was buried in the water, and the second one was completely wrecked over it. The baggage and express cars went over the bank, and the foremost passenger coach went partially over. The engineers and firemen were killed, and several of the passengers badly injured. This is not the first catastrophe by many due to the failure of the brakes at a critical moment. Many moral and spiritual calamities occur from an analogous cause. Thousands of young men who are ruined, believed when they commenced a sinful career that they would be able to pull up in time (Prov. 28: 26).

The Portraits of General Grant Exhibited in New York since he died would form a curious collection if they were gathered together. A man who had never seen the General would be bewildered if he tried to form an idea of his features from the pictures. In the stores on Broadway and the chief thoroughfares excellent portraits look out from among the mourning drapery, and even the shoe-blacks have contrived to get good likenesses to hang on their street-chairs. But in the poorer streets there was a remarkable variety, indicating the activity of the artist's imagination and his nationality rather than his fidelity. The favorite portrait among the Bowery liquor-sellers is that of a genuine Irishman, the only clues to identity being the wart on the right cheek and the square-cut beard. In the German quarters General Grant's face is decidedly Teutonic. In Essex and Ludlow streets his visage has a clearly marked Hebrew cast of features, while around Mulberry Street the popular portrait represents the General with a waxed moustache and with his hair trimmed like an Italian officer. In each case the artist's conception of the hero is the thing depicted, not the man as he was. The same tendency is manifested in religion, especially of late years. Too many preachers present the Divine character not as it is revealed in the Bible, but as they conceive it to be by the light of human reason (Rom. 1: 20, 21).

A Fatal Disaster which Occurred at Wilmington, Del., recently, indicates that New York is not the only city in which builders evade the laws, and building inspectors are remiss in their duties. On July 29th a large brick building in course of erection in South Wilmington was blown down by a sudden gust of wind, killing two men outright and wounding nine seriously. The calamity is supposed to have been due to the weakness of the walls, which were only nine inches thick. The building inspector had several times notified the owners that the walls were not thick enough, but as the greater part of the structure had been erected, he could not muster courage to order them to take it down again. At the time of the accident the workmen about the building had fled to the interior to escape an approaching storm, when a gust of wind entered the open end of the structure and lifted the roof violently. The walls began to sway, and before the men had time to escape they were buried under a downfall of bricks and mortar. This catastrophe is as disastrous as that of the man who built his house on the sand, and, like that, is a type of mistakes in spiritual building. There are many members of our churches, especially such as were converted at revivals, whose subsequent progress has been defective. Their Christian character is too weak to stand a storm, and their pastors sometimes lack courage to insist on their beginning again from the foundation (1 Cor. 3: 12-15).

The Destructive Work of Missiles Fired in the war has not ended after twenty years of peace. A contractor who has undertaken to saw up the timber from the battle-field of Antietam has had several men dangerously hurt by the fragments of shells imbedded in the wood. He says that all sorts of missiles, from cannon balls to buckshot, are almost daily met with in the timber, and that it is really dangerous to stand near the saws in his mill when such lumber is being cut, a number of saws having been snapped into fragments when running at a high rate of speed, by striking iron shot imbedded in the logs. A large, angular fragment of a shell was struck by a saw a few days ago, and a perfect shower of sparks rained about the mill from the contact of the metals, the saw being finally snapped in several pieces, which flew here and there, inflicting serious injuries. Thus, suffering results after many years, in a time of peace and to innocent people, from the deplorable conflict of the past. It is so in private quarrels—those who suffer most are often not the principals, nor those who witness the strife, but their descendants (Prov. 17: 14).

An Invention of Inestimable Value is one that would protect oil-tanks from lightning. Every year enormous sums are lost in the oil fires which are started by the electric fluid. A New York scientist believes that he has discovered a sure protection for the tanks. His idea is to utilize the immense conducting surface of wire gauze, which is a well-known dissipator of electricity as well as of heat. He proposes to surround oil tanks with three or four thicknesses of common wire mosquito netting, laid one upon another, which, he avers, will prove to be utterly impervious to lightning as well as to flame. The inventor proposes to put the gauze to another beneficial use. He claims that a strip of the netting composed of several thicknesses of gauze, if placed vertically across a river on which burning oil is floating, will prevent the fire spreading below that point, as the oil could pass freely through the gauze without carrying any flame with it, and would flow away cold and harmless. If the invention is all that is claimed for it, its usefulness will be enormous, and there will be a large demand for it. There are other lightnings coming upon the earth which men have more reason to dread than natural lightning (Rev. 16: 18), but against those the Christian has a sure protection provided for him. He need fear no evil when he is covered with Christ's righteousness (Isa. 61: 10).

A Tell-Tale Memorandum was Picked up at a dinner-party in New York recently. It was a large party, the hostess being a well-known leader of society. Among the guests was a titled Englishman, who paid marked attention to the ladies of the party, some of whom were heiresses of great wealth. After the dinner a servant picked up under the Englishman's chair a slip of paper which had evidently slipped from his pocket. The servant carried it to his employer, who, not knowing to whom it belonged, opened it and read the contents. It was a list in writing, which was afterward identified as the hand of the Englishman, of all the unmarried ladies present, and against the name of each was placed the estimated present and prospective value of her fortune. How the mercenary wooer fared in his enterprise has not yet been disclosed. Evidently his ideas of the sanctity of matrimony were so degraded that one may hope that he failed to persuade any American girl to accept his suit. Such unions, many of which have been made recently, present a startling contrast to the apostolic idea of marriage, which furnished a type of the union between Christ and His Church. That bride owes to the Bridegroom not only her possessions, but her purity and beauty (Eph. 5: 25-27).

THE MODERN DEAD SEA.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The waters shall be healed."—EZEKIEL 47: 8.

The Ancient Dead Sea—Associations of the Dead Sea—Without Fish—Hides Dark Mysteries—Modern Sodom—A Cauldron of Vice—The Means of Healing—I. The Promise of Healing—Will be Fulfilled Thoroughly—Instrumentality Employed—II. The Healing Waters—Whence they Came—How they Increased—What they Produced—Where they Flow—III. The Efficacy of the Waters—What the Gospel can do—IV. The Lesson of the Waters.

EZEKIEL is robbed in dreadful tempest, and his whole book is "as the terrible crystal" for brightness and for mystery; yet he often gives us visions of exceeding comfort. The remarkable vision which lies open before us is exceedingly reassuring to those who are troubled by reason of the dreadful condition of the times—and which of us is not? The prophet bids us think of those waters, drear and dreadful, known by the suggestive name of the Dead Sea! This was of the land of Canaan. Travellers describe it as a place of utter desolation. Lying in a deep hollow, some thirteen hundred feet below any other sea, the Dead Sea may be described as deep sunken into the earth, like the mouth of the abyss. Masses of bitumen float upon its surface and line its shores. Sulphurous exhalations abound, and on its banks are hot sulphuric springs. Bathing in its thick brine is not pleasant, for it causes the skin to tingle with its acrid salts long afterward. It is not desirable to linger upon the brink of it, neither is there anything to attract you so to do.

Very scanty is the vegetation, few are the birds, and rare the living things. It is the domain of destruction. The sea is so salt that no fish can live in it; and though it has been asserted that smaller organisms exist in it, these have seldom been found; but, on the contrary, the fish that come down into it from the Jordan die at once, and dried tish-shell-fish are washed up dead upon the bank. Nothing of life loves the brine, the sulphur, and the bitumen of the Dead Sea. The slimy lake is, at seasons, dangerous to health, and even to life. Travellers have of late crossed it safely at the right season; but formerly those who made a voyage upon it scarce returned to tell the tale, and before long sickened and died.

HIDES DARK MYSTERIES.

The doomed lake bears dark mysteries in its bosom; down deep in its depths lie the drowned cities of the plain, whose infamies provoked the wrath of heaven, and brought upon them a fire-shower such as earth has never known before or since. The world is a veritable Dead Sea upon a gigantic scale. Such also is the city in which we live: must I call it "modern Sodom?" Every wave that breaks upon the shore of this human lake now seems to wash up remains of monstrous things, unearthly, inhuman, beastly, devilish. Fair islands, here and there, rise out of its dark depths, the bright creations of God's grace; but all around them the waters cast up mire and dirt. God is at work creating new heavens and a new earth, and in the process forms of beauty are developed; but to this day the old unrenewed city remains a reeking copy of the hell which burns below. Those who have dared to look into its depths return with horror upon their faces to say that it were not lawful for a man to utter what they have seen. London is a simmering cauldron of vice and crime. O God! how long shall it be?

In certain respects, such is every man's natural heart until he is renewed by grace. The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, and may be well typified by the Sea of Death. If we could but look into it with such eyes as God hath, what should we not see? No man knoweth what villainy he is capable of: he only needs to be placed under certain circumstances, and he will develop into a very fiend

Thus the world, the city, the heart, are each symbolized by the Dead Sea. Can they ever be purged? Can these waters be healed? According to our text, the Lord saith expressly, "the waters shall be healed." Let us believe His promise, and take heart of hope from this good hour.

I. And, first, to encourage your faith, I bid you to consider

THE PROMISE.

The place wherein the promise is written, in plain black and white, upon the sacred page, is opened before your eyes. Put your finger on it, and let it rest there. Thus saith Jehovah: "The waters shall be healed." We feel sure that this word of prophecy shall be accomplished to the letter in due time, because he that made the promise is able to fulfil it. Apart from us and all our weakness, apart from man and all his wickedness, God, who hath spoken the word, will perform it without fail.

The Lord will fulfil this word thoroughly. This promise shall not be kept to the ear only, but it shall be fulfilled in the largest conceivable sense. The prophet, in vision, saw the waters of the Dead Sea so completely healed that there were fish in it; yes, swarms of fish, and these fish so many that there was occupation for all those who cast the net, so that they stood from one shore to the other. Where there had been no life aforesaid, living things literally swarmed and teemed, as in the great main ocean itself. Brethren, when God speaks of what He is about to do in the world, by way of grace, interpret it very largely: get no narrow ideas into your minds concerning the grace of the Infinite. When our Lord Jesus sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied, He will not have seen a handful of men here and there gathered to Him, but He will have seen a multitude that no man can number worshipping the Father, each one of whom shall eternally bless His name for deliverance from sin.

Observe that when God makes the promise on which my finger is still resting—for I love to press the very words, "The waters shall be healed."—He gives us an idea of how He will do it. He will fulfil this word in connection with the present dispensation. We believe that He means to win His ultimate triumphs by the preaching of the Gospel. Whenever the coming of our Lord shall be—and oh, that it were today, for we never wanted Him more than now!—whenever His second advent shall take place, yet it shall not be a dishonor to the Church, but it will be her glory to triumph with the King at her head. It may be that by she shall win the victory. If our Lord delayeth His coming, He will send the wondrous influences of the Divine Spirit in much greater abundance than to-day, and then His church shall work marvels in the land, and salvation shall adorn her. Hold the fort, because your Lord is coming. Do not abandon it under some idea that He will work after a novel fashion and dispense with the Gospel and the testimony of His saints. Till Jesus comes, gird yourselves and fight His battles; your rest remaineth, and it will be a full reward to you, but ye have not yet come unto it. By the river of God, which flows this day, the waters shall be healed.

Note carefully that this divine promise, "the waters shall be healed." will not put aside instrumentality, but when it is fulfilled it will call forth more abundant agencies. The waters run into the Dead Sea, and purify its waters; then fish begin to multiply, and then man's part comes in: "The fishers shall stand upon it from En-gedi even unto En-gehim." Rest assured that there will be plenty of fishers when by His healing process the Lord makes plenty of fish: we shall be fishers of men in right earnest when the times of refreshing shall come from His presence. The Lord does not intend to put the fishers on one side, any more than He will dismiss the reapers in the time of harvest. Oh, for the day when every believer will be fishing for the souls of men! God send us that blessed time right speedily! On the strength of the promise now before us, if there were nothing else, let us look for such a consummation. "The waters shall be healed." Purity shall prevail; the kingdom of God shall come. Our daily prayer shall not go up to heaven in vain. Let us again cry—"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

II. Having asked you to consider the promise, I invite you, next, to consider the wonder of that we may be helped thereby to believe that healing will come even to the Dead Sea of this present evil world, this present sinful Babylon, this present deceitful heart. The wonders of the waters which Ezekiel saw lay in many things. First, consider whence they came? These waters sprang from the midst of Jerusalem, from the secret place of God's throne; and this was why they were so potent. The twelfth verse ascribes the fruit-producing power of the river-waters to this—"because they issued out of the sanctuary." In that sanctuary was the throne of Jehovah: eternal sovereignty is the fountain-head of those gracious decrees in which the Lord hath purposed to do good to the sons of men.

These waters flowed in the vision hard by the altar of burnt-offering. Learn, hence, that the one channel of mercy to the sons of men is by the sacrifice of Christ. By that altar, where our great High Priest offered up Himself once for all, there flows the river of life. Since Christ hath died, the world must yet be blessed. These waters, though they flowed unseen across the temple-area, presently bubbled up from under the threshold of the door of the house. You know who is the Door of the temple of God: by Him we enter in unto God, and by Him God cometh forth in blessing unto us. The waters flowed from below, welling up from "the deep that lieth under," in the person and work of our Lord.

Note next, as a wonder in connection with these waters, how they increased. They deepened so fast that, although there was but a little streamlet at the beginning, within less than a mile there were waters to swim in; yea, they had become so deep and broad that the prophet had to use an expression in the dual, signifying a double stream: the flood had become too deep and wide to be passed over. You and I have waded into these waters, have we not? If so, we know how they have increased upon us. Do you not remember when you rejoiced to have received a little grace, so that it washed your feet, and your life was cleansed? Very soon, perhaps within four-and-twenty hours, you were swimming in streams of heavenly love, as you found that Christ was yours, your God, your heaven, your all. Do you not see that the God who has done all this for you can do as much for others? Can He not heal the waters of the Dead Sea of our day? Let us hope on, work on, and believe in God to the end. Putting our finger again upon that promise, let us rest assured that "the waters shall be healed."

THE PRODUCT.

Rapidly—for I have to be brief where there is so much to be said—notice what these waters produced. They began to flow, and very soon vegetation came into the wilderness. They flowed into the desert, and into the Acacia Vale, as Joel calls it; and soon, on both sides of the river, there were trees, and, on a sudden, the trees were bearing fruit. Wherever the Gospel goes it carries life, and growth, and fruit with it. The leaves of the trees of life contained medicine, full of mystic virtue; they were for the healing of the people. Whatever diseases afflict men, they have but to pluck these leaves, and apply them, and health follows. Oh, that blessed Gospel; it has had a double effect for our good, for it has fed our souls and healed our infirmities! Well might its waters be called a double stream!

As a further wonder, note whither the stream flowed. One would have thought that such a clear crystal stream as this, proceeding from the throne of God and of the Lamb, would have sought a pure channel for itself among the gardens of the Lord; but instead thereof, we are told, "These waters issue out toward the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea: which, being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed." What a mercy it is that the Gospel does go into the desert! I do not know what may happen here yet, but I do know this: that when the Gospel comes, the images, the idols, the filthy things, the cruel things, the horrible things, must go. The Gospel is still sent to sinners, and it will save sinners.

THE COURSE.

The waters ran down into the horrible sea. You would have said, as you stood there: "No, do not waste these pure floods in that hell-lake! Do not let them disappear in pollution! Jordan for many years has been lavishing her silver streams upon this Dead Sea, and it has absorbed them all, but it has not been made a whiter purer; and every fish that has drifted down the Jordan has died as soon as it has touched this detestable lake. Do not pour the heavenly river into such a Pandemonium." Many speak thus nowadays: "Do not meddle with this vice and wickedness. Do not even hear about it, for it will pollute you. Forget its foul flow; it is sulphurous as Tophet: the smell of such iniquity will choke you!" This avoidance of evil is natural and safe; but what is to become of this Dead Sea if the precious crystal stream does not flow into it? Will God abandon our race to the devil? Would he have His church abandon her function of salting the earth? I do not believe it. I tell you there is to be a link made by Almighty grace between the temple at Jerusalem and the very site of Sodom and Gomorrah: a silver stream is yet to traverse the space between the throne of the Most High and the foul Dead Sea: mercy is to triumph over judgment, and righteousness is to conquer sin.

III. Thirdly, for a moment or two I want you to consider

THE EFFICACY OF THE WATERS.

I will quit the figure in some measure in order to explain how the Gospel is adapted to heal the wickedness of men. What does the Gospel do?" saith one. I answer—In the Gospel we set before men the horrible nature of sin, and thus we lead them to turn from it. The Gospel gives man a hope; and that is a grand thing for the degraded and self-condemned. To have a hope that you can be a better man is a great help in escaping from sin. To hope that you can be renewed, and become like the angels of God, though now you are like the devils in hell, is a great encouragement to turn to God. My gospel bids me go to the very vilest of the vile and bid him hope. I count no man so loathsome that God may not look upon him in love. What a Gospel this is, for hope is the beginning of amendment, the first letter of the alphabet of reform! Where there is no hope, the sinner gives the reins to his lusts, and thinks it wise to enjoy his sin while he may.

The Gospel purifies men because it gives them Christ Himself to be their Saviour. It brings them the Son of God to be their salvation. It says, "Poor souls, you cannot help yourselves! Here is One on whom help has been laid, even a mighty One! Here is One that took your sin and put it away. Here is One that will be a Friend to you in your worst times of need. Come, huckle on your harness to war against your sins, for He will give you power to overcome them."

Moreover, the Gospel does not merely tell men certain truths, but it gives life, and power, and grace to them. I heard it said the other day, "We do not want more preachers, for the supply is more than equal to the demand." But, then, the Gospel creates its own demand. Wherever the Gospel comes, it makes men thirsty for itself, it makes men hungry for itself, it does its own work without aid from any foregoing human preparedness. It does not even ask to be let alone: it will effect its purpose even though it be tampered with. Its own essential omnipotence secures its own preservation, enlargement, and success. How I marvel at those who quit the heavenly stream for their own little brooks and freshets!

A certain divine has lately made a discovery by which he is going to pour a flood of light upon the Bible. The Bible, it seems, has been a dark, mysterious Book to our forefathers: though martyrs died for it, and saints were comforted by it, yet these poor beings were in the dark for want of nineteenth century discoveries! At length the hour has come, and the man with it; a great genius has arisen, who has found light with which to illuminate the Bible. We used to sing

"A glory gilds the sacred page,
Majestic like the sun;
It gives a light to every age,
It gives, but borrows none."

Are we to alter our tune, and cheerfully accept the contributions of this uncommon person? I trow not. This Book is clear enough of itself, and this Gospel is mighty enough of itself, without the aid of human wisdom. It will not be cleared, but clouded, by modern dotings upon evolution. The river of the Gospel will force its own way despite modern thought: it will win and conquer, whoever may oppose.

IV. I must close by noticing, fourthly, THE LESSON OF THE WATERS.

What is their voice to us to-day? I think the first lesson is that God works in very unexpected ways. There is that Dead Sea. We look down upon it with horror. Can it ever be healed? It never would have occurred to you or to me that yonder temple, so pure and sacred, would have a spring welling up from under its threshold, so little and tiny that you might cover it with your hand at first, and yet out of that spring should come a sufficient purgation even for Sodom's sea. The Lord knows how to do His own work, and He does it by apparently slender means. Who hath despised the day of small things?" Mark the little rill at Jerusalem, when the number of the men was about one hundred and twenty: that stream grew within a few days, till we read that "the same day there were added unto them about three thousands souls"—till another day or so after we read, "And the number of the men was about five thousand." That small beginning most rapidly increased, is increasing, and will increase. The Gospel has the same potency and force about it to-day that it has had in ages past.

What else ought we to learn? As the Dead Sea has to be cleansed by that stream of water, all that we can do is, first of all, to pray.

When we have done that, what next have we to do? Why, begin fishing. Wherever this stream rushes along, there will be fish: in this London there are fish now. Go and fish in the streets, fish in the street-corners, fish in any little room you can open, fish in the great crowds, if they will come to you. The stream is breeding swarms of life; be ye fishers of men. God says to His church to-day, "I have much people in this city." Do not despair: God has an elect company in every parish of London.

Above all, we must not come to be the marshes of which we read just now. Certain spots of land were overflowed by the river and the sea, but afterward they were left high and dry as the stream retired; so that they were neither sea nor dry ground, but marshes. Beware of this! The most abominable beings out of hell are Christians without Christianity; and there are plenty of them. They have a name to live, and are dead." Oh, that you and I may be true-born children of God! May we never be among those mongrels who are neither heathen nor Jews, neither Christians nor outsiders! May we be one thing or the other! Let us heed the voice of the prophet—"If the Lord be God, follow Him: but if Baal, then follow him." All the blessing that ever comes from heaven will never save neutrals; for "the marshes thereof shall not be healed; they shall be given to salt." God deliver us from such a curse, for Jesus Christ's sake! Amen.

NEW BOOKS.

THE first number of the third volume of CHRISTIAN THOUGHT, edited by Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., has not been surpassed by any of the predecessors of a periodical which, as Joseph Cook says, has published "so many brilliant and powerful pages." It is the organ of the Institute of Christian Philosophy, and every thinking man will be interested in what it issues. The July-August number opens with a paper by Professor Davis, of the University of Virginia: it is full of clear thinking clearly expressed. It is followed by a paper from the Right Rev. Bishop Harris, of Michigan, on "Capital and Labor." It is generally supposed that bishops are conservative, but some parts of Bishop Harris's article will sound very radical to some people. "The Vicarious Principle in the Universe," by Rev. Dr. Bradford, does not discuss the atonement, but is a very interesting presentation of the truth that the basis of the atonement as a rule of grace may be found in nature. The miscellaneous articles are of varied and great interest. There is a list of members of the Institute showing a noble growth of a noble institution. Price, 40 cents; $2 a volume of six numbers. Published at 4 Winthrop Place, New York.

CHRIST IN THE GOSPELS, or the Life of our Lord in the words of the Evangelists. With self-interpreting Scripture, maps of Jesus' Travels, and a Dictionary of Proper Names. By James P. Cadman, A.M. This is another attempt to weave into one connected narrative the four separate lives of Christ given us in the Gospels. In many respects it is an improvement on all the "Harmonies" yet issued. Mr. Cadman has been careful not to interpolate words of his own, but rather to present simply the complete history as given individually by the evangelists, the fuller account in one supplying what is omitted in another, and all common language being given but once. This method has the advantage of bringing out the successive points of the record with graphic power. For example, in the agony in the garden, "He kneeled down—and fell on his face—on the ground," where two evangelists are shown as disclosing what we should not learn from either alone, that our Lord first knelt, but then, by the crushing anguish that burdened him, was forced down prostrate on the ground. And not only has this harmonizing been thus completed, but the way in which it has been done has, by an ingenious use of numerals representing the several Gospels, been clearly shown, and by this device the individuality of the several evangelists is preserved.

While the agreements between the sacred historians are shown, the differences also between them—both those of thought and of phraseology—are pointed out and reduced to the minimum, and are, as they occur, conveniently indicated by smaller type within brackets. Thus, for the purpose of instituting a close comparison between the Gospels, this volume is a unique help.

The text of the book has convenient topical divisions, with section headings, well adapted for use in family and private readings. A minor feature of this volume, and yet one which commends it to many, especially to Sunday-school teachers, is that, at the bottom of each page, the most important Scripture references, both from other portions of the Gospels and from other books of the Bible, are given in full, thus carrying out still further the underlying principle of the main work, and forming a commentary wholly Biblical. A map and four diagrams, illustrating with much clearness the Saviour's journeys, contribute to the value of the work. The Index of subjects, places, and persons mentioned in the Gospels is very copious, as are also the other reference tables and summaries. We earnestly hope that this work, of which a second edition has already been called for, will lead to a deeper study of the life and words of Christ Himself. After all, that is the centre about which all Scripture turns, a fact that preachers and Sunday-school teachers seem sometimes to forget. The more Christ Himself is preached and taught, the more life there will be in the Church, and the more conversions we shall witness. Pp. 382; price, $1.50. REV. RICHARD ROBERTS.

THE President of the Conference of Wesleyan Methodists in England for the ensuing year is the Rev. Richard Roberts, whose portrait appears on this page. His chief rival for the honor was the Rev. Robert N. Young, of Birmingham. The competition was vigorous, and the chances were supposed to be even, but when the poll was taken Mr. Roberts was ahead by a considerable majority. Mr. Roberts is a Welchman. He is sixty-two years of age, having been born at Machynlleth, on May 30th, 1823. He began preaching at the age of sixteen, when engaged in commercial pursuits. Four years later he entered the ministry, and while still a young man became one of the most popular preachers of his denomination. His first charge was in Wales; thence he was removed to Gloucester, and after receiving appointments in various parts of England, he was located in London, where he now is. As a preacher, he is noted for his oratorical gifts rather than as a teacher. His services are much in request for celebrations, such as church dedications, anniversaries, and other services which are followed by collections. He was one of the leaders in the movement for holding religious services in theatres.

THE LATE BISHOP OF SALISBURY.

DR. GEORGE MOBERLY, whose portrait appears on this page, and who died on July 6th of this year, was the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Salisbury. He was nearly eighty-two years of age when he died, having been born in 1803. He was the son of a merchant. Educated at Winchester school, and afterward at Oxford University, he became a college tutor, and was subsequently made headmaster of his old school at Winchester. In 1869, when Mr. Gladstone was looking around for a successor to the late Dr. Hamilton in the bishopric of Salisbury, he selected Dr. Moberly. It is remarkable how many English bishops were schoolmasters. The statesmen whose duty it is to select the bishops appear to think that a man who has been occupied in keeping a lot of unruly boys in order is likely to succeed in governing the clergy of a diocese. Sometimes they are right, though even bishops who have had a long experience at the head of a large school have been heard to say, as they contemplated their new duties, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Dr. Moberly, however, succeeded admirably. He was a moderate high churchman, in whose wisdom and impartiality the clergy had confidence. The bishop was a voluminous author, and was one of the "five clergymen" who published revised versions of the Epistle to the Romans (1858), Epistle to the Galatians, Epistle of St. James (1870), the Gospel according to St. John (1857), the Epistle to the Corinthians, and other books of the New Testament. He was a member of the New Testament company of Revisers of the Bible.

AN EVENTFUL COACH-RIDE.

IN the year 1835 the Rev. Ernest Gifford, a clergyman from Virginia, was seeking rest and recuperation in England after many years of ministerial labor. He had never visited the country before, and found much to interest him. He was a well-read man, and the old streets and buildings of London were eloquent to him of a period long gone by, and were full of historical associations more familiar to him than to the busy crowds hurrying along careless of history, and intent only on the things of the present. He passed under Temple Bar and gazed up curiously at the place where the traitors' heads used to be stuck as a warning to evil-doers. He wandered slowly on down Fleet Street, thinking of the great Dr. Johnson, who loved that thoroughfare, and on up Ludgate Hill to the great Cathedral where so many of the famous dead lie buried, and whose smoke-begrimed walls have formed the background to many a strange spectacle. Then he turned out to his left to visit Smithfield, consecrated by the blood of the martyrs. A coach was to start from that place for the north that morning, and the good clergyman intended travelling by it to a village a few miles from Birmingham, where, a hundred years ago, his progenitors were born and lived and died. Some of the family were there yet, he believed, but many years before his time, all correspondence between them and the American branch of the house had ceased, and Mr. Gifford did not know whom he would find as relatives in the cradle of the family.

Mounting the box of the heavy vehicle, which, before the introduction of railroads into that part of the country was the only means of travelling between the two places, he took his seat beside the rubicund driver. Mr. Gifford looked at him with wonder. An enormously fat fellow he was, with a face that exposure to the air in all weathers, and numerous fiery potations had dyed in tints of red and purple. His corpulence, which in any dress would have looked remarkable, was so swathed in overcoats that it seemed monstrous. The American gentleman, who had not an ounce of spare flesh about him, and whose face was pale and intellectual, presented a curious contrast to him as they sat side by side.

The coachman had nothing to say to his companions, being occupied, so long as he was driving through the London streets, in guiding his horses and exchanging greetings with other coachmen as obese and ruddy as himself. Two hours' travel, however, carried them out of London into a broad highway, where vehicles were less numerous, and where the road lay between fragrant hedges instead of high houses. Then the coachman volunteered the remark that the crops looked well. Mr. Gifford, to whom the remark was addressed, acquiesced, and the driver, having broken the ice, inquired, "Going far, sir?" The clergyman told him his destination.

"I know it, sir," he said. "We go within six miles of it. It's a dead-alive, God-forsaken place."

"What a dreadful place it must be," said Mr. Gifford. "Does no one live there?"

"Oh, yes, there are about ten thousand inhabitants. But they're all asleep, sir. No theatre, not a decent tavern in it, no races, nothing to make it lively; nothing going on but churches, and chapels, and prayer-meetings."

"And you say God has forsaken it. That is a horrible calamity. It makes one's blood run cold to think of any man or any town being so forsaken. No wonder they are having prayer-meetings."

"Oh, that's only a common saying, sir," said the driver, with a broad grin; "it ain't meant the way you take it. I fancy there's as much religion there as anywhere — perhaps a little more; but it's awful dull."

"I am glad you did not mean it literally," said the clergyman. "I have been in many places where men have forsaken God, but that is not so sad; for they may return, and God is so loving that He is always ready to receive the penitent wanderers; but if He were to forsake them, their fate would be appalling."

Just then the conductor's quaint, three-cornered hat appeared at the other side of the coach, and the facetious driver said to him: "Look here, Tom; don't let me hear any o' your bad language on this trip; we've got a parson on board." The conductor looked reproachfully, for certainly his profanity had not been noticed, while the driver had let slip several oaths at his horses and the drivers of vehicles who in the crowded London streets had annoyed him by their clumsiness. The man, however, had a rough idea of courtesy, and during the remainder of the journey chatted pleasantly with his neighbor on the box, pointing out objects of interest and keeping a guard over his lips, to which several abrupt pauses in his flow of language proved that he was unaccustomed.

"This is your place, sir," he said at last, as the sun was nearing its setting. "You'll strike your turning a little farther on. Any one will show you. You'll have about six miles to walk, but it's a straight, good road. Wish you good-day, sir."

The clergyman descended, and he noticed that a man who had occupied the corresponding seat on the other side of the driver got down too. He had been very taciturn all the way, had sat with downcast face, paying no attention to anything, and seemingly lost in thoughts, evidently sad ones. Only once he had looked up, when the clergyman had spoken of God's love for the penitent, but he had said nothing. He did not speak now, but walked sharply away into the town, while the clergyman strolled along the bank of the river in the direction pointed out by the driver. The peaceful scene pleased him, and he would have willingly remained enjoying it had not the sun's place in the sky reminded him of his long walk.

He had nearly reached his destination when he heard footsteps behind him, and looking around he saw the taciturn passenger approaching. "Excuse my speaking to you, sir," he said, as he overtook Mr. Gifford. "I do not know whether it is my good angel urging me, but I have had a struggle whether I should speak or not since we left the coach together, and this is the way it has ended. I am in deep trouble, and I am inclined to think you would give me help."

"Don't apologize, my dear sir," said the clergyman. "I shall be thankful if I can be of service to you."

"You said on the coach that God was always ready to receive penitent wanderers. I should like to ask you whether that applies to a man who has wandered a long way in very miry places after having once started on the clean road?"

"Assuredly," said the clergyman.

"Then I will tell you my story. My father is vicar down there," he said, pointing to the little church nestling among the trees. "I was to have been a clergyman, too. That was ten years ago. I went to the University, and there I was ruined. I was expelled for misconduct, and I have never seen my father or mother since. I never communicated with them, but just hid myself in London. I got work and was well paid, and I have led a dissolute life ever since. I became disgusted with it—never mind how—a few months ago, and to-day the longing to look once more on the old spot became irresistible. I thought I would come down and see the church and the parsonage, and one glimpse of my dear mother, if I could without her seeing me, and then go back and put an end to my wretched life. Somehow your words touched my heart. I have had no hope for a long time, but I have a feeling now that is like it, though I scarcely dare call it by that name. Tell me what you think of my case."

"You remember the parable of the Prodigal Son?"

"Yes, but I have lost faith in the Bible."

"Well, sit down on this bank by me, and I'll read it over." Mr. Gifford produced a pocket Bible and read the familiar story. "Don't you think," he asked, "apart from the truth of the Bible, that there are fathers who would act like that? It is conceivable, is it not?"

"I have known some who would."

"And the son took a wise course at last in going to his father and trusting his much-abused love; don't you think so?"

"Yes, as it turned out; but it might have ended differently. The father would have been justified in turning him away."

"But he did not, you see, and you admit that there are fathers who would have done the same thing. Now I know—I have seen it—that God does act so when His children come back to Him. I know they were received, by the way they lived afterward. Now I want you to try."

The two sat and talked until darkness fell and a full moon rose, shedding a serene light over the country. By that time a prayer had been offered by the roadside, and the prodigal had consented to go home, stipulating, however, that Mr. Gifford should go first to prepare his way. They descended the hill and walked through the village lying still in the moonlight. "This is the parsonage, sir. I will wait for you at the inn—there where you see the light."

"Stay," said the clergyman; "you have not told me your father's name."

"No, to be sure, Gifford, the Reverend Edward Gifford."

The clergyman was startled, but that was no time for explanations, so he passed on through the trim garden to the parsonage door.

Half an hour later the two clergymen, kindred in blood, but with a closer kinship in Christ, were on their way to the inn, arm-in-arm, to bring the prodigal to his home, while at the door of the parsonage a white-haired lady stood eager to fold her long-lost son in her arms. The family party that night was a scene never to be forgotten by any there. When, after a happy stay with his newly-found relatives, the American clergyman returned to his own land, he was accompanied by his repentant kinsman, who, at his own desire and that of his parents, was going in Christ's strength to commence amid new scenes a life of service for his Master.

UNDER FIRE.

A STORY OF THE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR.

The White Flag.

ON the following day, late in the evening, when it was almost too late to see it, save for a few minutes, the white flag floated once more from the Cathedral tower, and no one threw it down again. In a few minutes after the dreadful booming of the cannon ceased.

The Germans entered Strasburg the next morning, bringing with them wagon-loads of provisions, which had been prepared in readiness against the surrender of the city. You should have seen the crowds of all sorts of people thronging round the wagons, with glistening eyes, eager to snatch away the first thing put into their hands.

I staid for more than an hour watching the distribution of the food. To me it was a sight full of suggestiveness. Where, now, I thought, was the deadly animosity which had trained and fired the guns which had wrought all this havoc?

I noticed one man especially. He was a tall, swarthy soldier of some thirty years of age. He looked a splendid specimen of vigorous manhood. There was a look of triumph on his face which suggested the thought that he had done his part in the siege, and was enjoying the spectacle of the surrender. I almost hated him for that smile of conscious victory. He seemed to be some sort of inferior officer, for he was superintending the distribution, and did not take part in it. His eye, however, was quick to see all that happened. Glancing over the crowd, he saw an old woman sitting on the curb with her face buried in her hands. I suppose she was too weak to go in the crowd around the wagons, hungry as she was. I noticed the German sergeant, or whatever he was, looking at her. Then he strode across the street to her side. Laying his hand gently on her shoulder, he spoke to her kindly. I was not near enough to hear what he said, but he must have asked her if she wanted food, for directly she answered he went to the wagon and returned with a large loaf and some potatoes. He stooped and kissed her forehead as she looked up and thanked him. I thought, as I watched that token of respect, that the big sergeant must have a mother at home of whom he was thinking.

I watched until the wagons were emptied, and then turned homeward, thankful that the long struggle was ended, although it had ended in a way that was a grief to me and to thousands beside me. But who that had seen the suffering I had witnessed would not have been glad that in some way—in any way—it had ended, and all the death, and terror, and hunger, and misery were over at last.

But it was not all over for me. One more great terror awaited me. I had left Lisbeth with my grandmother, who was too agitated and shaken to stay alone, while Gretchen and I went to get some fresh food from the wagons. Gretchen had gone home a few minutes before me, and I was following with some bread in my hands, when I saw Lisbeth coming up the steps of our cellar, with Elsie in her arms. Just above them hung the heavy lintel of a doorway, which had been nearly shaken down during the last day of the bombardment. They had just reached the level of the street, and saw me running toward them. Elsie clapped her hands, and Lisbeth's face was bright with smiles, when, in a moment, before I could do anything to warn or save them, the timber fell, and struck down both their dear faces out of my sight.

How I reached the place I do not know; but there Lisbeth lay, with Elsie's little head pressed down upon her bosom, her arms clasped about the child, and the black lintel lying across them both. Lisbeth's face was white and still, with a half-smile upon it; but Elsie's face I could not see.

I sat down beside them, without power to move, in an agony of grief and terror, such as I had never felt before.

But before many minutes had passed by, Elsie's sweet, clear voice rang in my ears, sounding to me for a moment like a voice from the dead. She was trying to move, and lift her hands to Lisbeth's face; and then I saw that the lintel, though it had knocked them down, had not crushed them, for the end of it had caught upon a projecting stone on the other side of the arch. Lisbeth might be stunned, but she was not killed.

Still I had not strength enough to move the heavy timber, which was, besides, so entangled with other portions of the doorway that it would be dangerous to stir it yet. I laid my hand on Elsie's head to quiet her.

"Lie still, my Elsie," I said; "lie quite still, and do not wake your mother: I will wake her by and by. Be very quiet till I come back."

I had just turned away, wondering where I could get the help I needed—for everybody was so engrossed in their own wants—when I saw—but I could not believe it—I saw my father standing opposite the ruins of our house, and gazing at them as if they could tell him what had become of Sylvie, and his mother, and me.

Ah! you will never know, and you can never imagine, what it was to see him after all our peril and sorrow. I flung myself into his arms, and felt as if I was in heaven for a moment or two. But there were Lisbeth and Elsie to rescue; and not waiting to answer one of his questions, I dragged him across the street to the place where they lay. Lisbeth's eyes were open, and she quite smiled when I looked down upon her face.

It was almost an hour before we could get them safely out of the mass of fallen buildings; but I never left them, and I fed them by morsels with the bread I had brought. When the steps were clear, we all went down into the cellar to my grandmother and Gretchen, who were almost dead with fright, thinking they were buried alive, and cut off from the succor which had come at last to the citizens of Strasburg. But all was right now; there was no more pain or terror; and my father was there to take care of us all.

It had happened that my father's health had given way in his exploring expedition, and he had been compelled to return to Egypt, where, of course, he had heard of the war between France and Germany, and had hastened back at once, to come to our help. He had been outside the city at Appenweir, a few miles across the Rhine, for the last three days, watching, with many other people, the awful bombardment of the city, but unable to do anything. Last night the news had reached him of General Uhrich's surrender; and he had come as quickly as he could, prepared to remove us at once to Appenweir.

When all that was done, and my grandmother and Gretchen were settled in some pleasant lodgings, my father and I set about to trace Sylvie. The only chance was to find out where Madame Berthon had found refuge, but as her husband was now gone, with the other officers, as prisoners into Germany, we met with many difficulties.

At last we discovered that Madame Berthon was in Basle, just within the Swiss frontier, and we went down all the valley of the Rhine on our way thither—all through wide-spread meadows, green with pasture, and past rich fields of corn, and under the vineyards grown wild with untrained tendrils; a lovely valley, sheltered by mountains and filled with trees, just tinged here and there with autumn colors. It was very peaceful—so full of peace that I could hardly bear to look at it, and remember what we had been passing through in Strasburg, while out here the sun had been shining, and the birds singing, and the flowers blooming—like the Garden of Eden before men spoiled it. This was the Garden of Eden; yonder was the place of which God was saying, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the earth."

We found our Sylvie at last, very pale and delicate, nervous, too, ready to start and cry at any sudden noise. But I think that when I saw her folded in my father's arms, after all the great trouble we had undergone, my gladness was almost unendurable. I fancy, only I scarcely dare say it, that I caught a little glimpse—only a glimpse—of the great joy of our Lord when He went back to His Father's presence. As I sat on the ground at their feet, seeing both their faces, there came into my mind again and again those words, "Looking unto Jesus the Author and Finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

Even after all she had suffered, we could not persuade my grandmother to come and live with us in London. From her new home in Appenweir she could still see the Cathedral, which was now the dearest place on earth to her. There was a talk, too, that all the buildings which had been destroyed were to be restored as quickly as possible. All was quietness and order again in Strasburg. The shops and the markets were re-opened; and, as far as possible, every trace of the havoc had been cleared away. But the graves were there, and the ruined houses, and the households, almost like those of Egypt—"There was not a house where there was not one dead."

My father did all that was possible to make the short remnant of her life comfortable. He spent many days in going around collecting articles of furniture and hangings resembling those she was used to see around her. The little home in Appenweir was filled to overflowing before we left. The articles were not put in place, for we knew well that she would not think of that home as a permanent residence. She would never rest outside Strasburg. She would surely go back to the old city soon. To her every stone of the place seemed dear, and she would think little of the change in the flag that would wave over it. So the goods were stored so that she could remove them easily when the time came. My father, knowing her disposition, also provided her with means for indulging in what he knew would be her greatest luxury. She would assuredly want to help her old friends, some of whom the siege had ruined. She would see them trying to build again their old homes and gather around them their former comforts, and she would want to help them. So my father put some money in bank for her, which he called "the helping fund," and told her what it was for. The good old lady kissed him, and said he was ever her thoughtful boy.

I shall not easily forget my parting from her. To be together in a common danger will draw nearer the most discordant natures, and my grandmother and I were not discordant. She took me lovingly in her arms and wept over me. Then she held me at arms'-length while she told my father that I had been her greatest comfort during the time of trial. She said I had been good, and brave, and attentive to her, and that if I had not been there she believed she would have died of fright. That was very pleasing to me, the more so as my father was pleased. He laid his hand on my shoulder, and in a voice a little less steady than his usual firm tones, said that he was grateful to me. I had taken the place, he said, that should have been his, and he owed me thanks for filling it nobly. He was proud that his son should have been a comfort to his honored mother. Then my grandmother drew me again to her breast, and prayed that God would bless me. So we parted, the old lady tearfully watching us as we went our way.

My father, who knew many learned and influential men among the enemy, had no difficulty in obtaining a safe-conduct, which enabled us to go into the neighborhood of Pfulzburg, which was still suffering the horrors of a siege, as we had been. We went there in search of Sergeant Klein's little farm amongst the hills, where his children might be still hoping and watching for his return. But from all the country round, from lonely farm-houses, and little hamlets, and larger villages of the mountains, the inhabitants had fled before the army, perhaps with a faint hope of returning home some time, when peace came back, but oftener with breaking and despairing hearts. We could find no one who knew Sergeant Klein's farm or family; and as for the brother of poor Louise, he was still shut up in Pfulzburg, ignorant, no doubt, of his sister's death.

Lisbeth, whose home and property were altogether lost, promised gladly to come and live with us in London. Only a few days ago Elsie climbed on to my knee, as I was thinking over all these things, and drew my attention to her by patting my cheek. She held in her other hand a parcel wrapped in silver paper, which she opened gravely, and showed to me a little white vest, quite finished, and with every stain, either of her own work, or of the dust of falling walls, washed away. But the child's lips were quivering, and she was trying hard to keep back her tears.

"Max," she said, "there is no way for Elsie to give the Lord Christ His birthday present when Christmas comes."

"Why not, Elsie?" I asked.

"Because He is a long, long way off, up in heaven," she said.

"No, Elsie," I answered; "He is here with us. He said, 'I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you.' So He comes often, every day; only we cannot see His face or hear His voice yet."

"I'm glad He comes," she said, her face brightening; "but if we cannot see Him, how am I to give Him His little white vest?"

Then I opened my Bible, which Elsie was beginning to learn to read in, and I let her spell out, word for word, this verse: "Inasmuch as ye have done unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Elsie sat, still and thoughtful, with her head resting on her little hands, and then, clasping them together with gladness, as the meaning came into her mind,—

"Max," she said, "we must go and look for one of the least of the Lord Christ's little brothers, and see if the vest will do for him."

But my father would not hear of Elsie's little vest being given away; and he bade Lisbeth set great store by it, and keep it in remembrance of the six weeks' siege of Strasburg, saying Elsie would understand why it was kept when she grew older. I scarcely understood myself, till my father read these words to me, about the woman who brought her alabaster box of ointment, very precious, and poured it on His head, and the disciples called it a waste, and said the money it cost should have been given to the poor. "Ye have the poor with you always," said the Lord, "and whosoever ye will ye may do them good; but me ye have not always. She hath done what she could."

THE END.

THE COVETOUS KING.

S. S. Lesson for Aug. 30, 1 Kings 21: 1-19. Golden Text, Luke. 12: 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

What Life Consists in—Not in Abundance of Goods—Nor Abundance of Esteem—How Satan Entangles Christians—Ahab's Misguided Magnanimity—His Irresponsible Attitude—The Inevitable Disappointment—Naboth's Hereditary Possession—Refuses to Part with It—The Plot Against Him—His Downfall—The Judgment.

"TAKE heed, and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." And yet men cling with a desperate grasp to those things which they possess! Some men even lose their reason when a loss in business befalls them which makes them poorer than they were; they are under the delusion that their life consists in their possessions, their hearts are set on them, is in them. There are some who live for their reputation—their ears are quick to hear all which is said about them, they seek most ingloriously to turn the conversation round to themselves, that they may gauge the impressions of others about them. When anything unfavorable is said about them they are sure to hear of it, and they are in anguish of heart by day, and sleepless by night, if they think they have lost ground with other people—people who, perhaps, hardly give them a thought. Their life, they think, consists in the abundance of men's esteem which they possess. And, strange to say, Christians are often entangled in this snare of Satan's, the desire to stand well with some noted or advanced Christian teachers! Some stand on position, some on family, and attempt to draw their life from these sources. But there are some whose life consists in the abundance of Christ which they possess—Christ for spirit, soul and body; for present, past, and future; for family and for business—Christ Himself. Christ is their life, and they are satisfied.

King Ahab had not been left alone; God had been manifesting His love in delivering him twice from Ben-hadad, King of Syria, who had marshalled his entire army and come up against him. God had treated Ahab as though he had been His child, and yet there was no response on Ahab's part to God. It could not go on thus forever. God had delivered Ben-hadad into Ahab's hand, and instead of asking counsel of the Lord, or taking for granted that He would not have delivered him up to him for nothing, Ahab, with senseless conceit, acted the benefactor to God's enemy, and sent him away, making a covenant with him. And then came this message from the Lord: "Because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man whom I appointed to utter destruction, therefore thy life shall go for his life, and thy people for his people." Love had not won Ahab; would severity succeed? Alas, no! "The King of Israel went down to his house

HEAVY AND DISPLEASED."

All the time God had been seeking to win this man to intercourse with Himself, and all along Ahab had been completely irresponsible. He had listened to Elijah, had seen the fire fall from heaven, had heard and, perhaps, had joined in the shout, "The Lord, He is the God; The Lord, He is the God." He had received messages from God again and again through another prophet, whose name is not given us (1 Kings 20: 13, 14; 22, 28), and one of the sons of the prophets (vers. 35-41), yet we find no record whatever of his speaking one word to God all this time. His only relations with God were through a third party—he had no personal acquaintance with Him. When he was "heavy and displeased," it was with God rather than with himself; he kicked against the inevitable consequences of his own neglect of God.

A man who sets his heart on the things of earth is always disappointed. The curse of the broken law rests upon him: "It shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all His commandments and His statutes which I command thee this day . . . the Lord shall send upon thee in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do." The enemy of souls was at no loss to find some hobby on which Ahab should set his heart. Near by his palace, Naboth, the Jezreelite, possessed a vineyard; this the king coveted. It was most conveniently situated, it would have added much to the royal grounds as a vegetable garden, and Ahab offered Naboth to exchange it for a better, or to buy it of him. A very easy thing, some might think. But Naboth knew the mind of his God about this, and could not look upon it as a matter of convenience, whether to the king or to himself. "The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine" (Lev. 25: 23). In faithfulness to God he must deny the king at any cost. He answered, "The Lord forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee. And Ahab came into his house heavy and displeased because of the word which Naboth the Jezreelite had spoken to him: for he had said, I will not give thee the inheritance of my fathers."

Heavy and displeased! Those whose hearts are set on things which perish are liable to be always thus. God has created us to fit exactly into Him, that every need of our being shall be responded to by Him, and not by anything short of Him. All we get of earth, apart from God, proves it wears, and frets, and strains, and produces a thirst after something more of the same kind, just as unsatisfying. Those who see God in everything, and recognize His overruling hand in all things, cannot be thus disappointed; instead of heavy and displeased, "they are joyfully submissive, whatever happens, knowing that God can make no mistake. Ahab had lost chance after chance of making acquaintance with God; he had always acted as though he believed things were between him and man, in spite of the direct messages which had been sent him by God. Now in his disappointment over the bit of ground on which he had set his heart, the unkingly king, the unmanly man, went into a sulk like an ill-tempered child; "he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread."

In this mood he was open to further attacks of Satan. His wife, the wicked, idolatrous Jezebel, came to him, and said: "Why is thy spirit so sad, that thou eatest no bread?" And the king answered like a pettish child, putting all the right on his own side, and leaving out of his story entirely the principle which had actuated Naboth, quoting as the terms of his refusal, "I will not give thee my vineyard." Ahab never thought of giving up his will about it; yet, perhaps, the very conscientiousness of Naboth made him the more angry, because it put him in the position of fighting against God if he did not yield the point. No such feelings actuated Jezebel—she cared for neither God nor man. "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel?" she asked, ironically. "Arise, and eat bread, and let thine heart be merry: I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite." And the unprincipled woman wrote letters in Ahab's name, sealed with the royal seal, to command that Naboth should be arraigned for high treason, that witnesses should be procured to bear false witness against him, and then, to put a religious color on this infamous deed, a fast was to be proclaimed, the trial conducted with the utmost solemnity, and the righteous Naboth was to be stoned.

The awful deed was done: to all appearance the enemy triumphed against God. But Naboth found a rest in Abraham's bosom of which the wickedness of men or devil could not rob him. Jezebel, in triumph, returned to her husband, and said: "Arise, take possession of the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which he refused to give thee for money: for Naboth is not alive, but dead." Without inquiring how he came by his death, with, perhaps, a sense of relief that he personally had nothing to do with it, the covetous king "rose up to go down to the vineyard of Naboth, the Jezreelite, to take possession of it." But the followed him there—cursing, vexation, and rebuke. No sooner did he stand upon the coveted ground as its proprietor, than a voice which he well knew—the voice of all others upon earth which made him tremble—pronounced the words, "Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" The convenient arrangement of leaving the responsibility with Jezebel could not answer with the holy God; for "the husband is the head of the wife." And then, the king was responsible for the welfare of his subjects. The guilt of the national idolatry, the sin of his wife, the murder of Naboth—all came back upon him; he must be responsible.

"Thus saith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine." The unhappy king answered, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" He spoke to Elijah, but in his heart he said as much to God. "I have found thee," was the rejoinder, "because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord." And then he added the sad message from the Lord of the utter destruction of himself, his wife and family, which should follow.

What a mad thing it is for a man to have his treasure upon earth, where the moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal! what a fruitless thing to set our heart on plans which may be altered any moment, on friends which may change places from which we may be rooted up, Christian work which God may put into other hands? Our privilege is to sit loose with a will utterly yielded to the Lord, out of reach of disappointment and vexation, because He has taught us that He Himself provides against the consequences of all which He permits, and that He Himself has a will which is good, acceptable, and perfect, while our own will only leads to cursing, vexation, and rebuke in all to which we put our hand.

THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD.

PSALM XXXIII.

The Lord is my Shepherd, oh, words full of peace!
How sweetly they cause all desponding to cease;
For soul as it hears them, they lead into rest,
With kindness, and gladness, and glory possessed.

The Lord is my Shepherd, the God of all might,
Thou thought of my steps and my way;
He hears me, and carries me all the day long;
I love to be helpless, while life is my song.

The Lord is my Shepherd, my footsteps to guide,
From harm to protect me, for want to provide;
He is mine just as truly as though I alone
Were tended and cherished, and kept for His own.

He "goeth before," me to show me the way;
I have but to follow His steps and His way;
'Tis He who goes first, so it is not for me
To know what the way for to-morrow will be.

He "makes me lie down" with a tender constraint,
Which thoughts cannot picture, and words cannot paint;
He gently compels me to cease from all strife,
To rest on His love, and to live in His life.

He goes before who "restores my soul,"
Beside me, "the waters of quietness" roll;
Rich goodness and mercy are following nigh,
And all round about me the green pastures lie.

He "leadeth me" on where the calm waters flow,
He keeps me "beside" them wherever I go;
They stand and look on, but they cannot oppose,
He leads me alone, yet I'm lying at rest.

I fear not "the shadow of death" and the grave,
For He who is "with" me is mighty to save;
The terrible substance, O Lord, was for Thee,
Now only the "shadow" can fall upon me.

I have not within the dark vale to abide,
'Tis but a walk through to the opposite side;
And even the shadow, the darkness and gloom,
Since Thou, blessed Jesus, wilt shine on me there.

Thou spreadest my table in sight of my foes,
They stand and look on, but they cannot oppose;
My cup runneth over with joy and with praise,
Thy goodness and mercy shall crown all my days.

A king and a priest I am made unto Thee,
Thy house, O my Lord, shall my dwelling-place be;
There under Thy Shadow, my soul finds her rest;
And dwelling in Jesus, I know I am blest.

Encouragements to Faith.

210 pp. Cloth. Price, 65 cents.

This book has greatly helped many Christians to a stronger faith in the blessed Lord Jesus; we earnestly hope that many more may be benefited by it.

"This volume is simply a transcript of direct, affectionate conversational endeavors which the Lord deigned to use to help a troubled soul out of a sea of doubts. The difficulties dealt with are the difficulties of the human heart, and not unlike to trouble any one who is expected to bear the commands of God slighted, and His promises spoken of as not to be relied upon. There are to-day thousands in our week-day and Sabbath schools struggling with the same. . . . Here is a warm hand reaching out to lend you, in the name of the Lord, from one who harbors no doubts, and would gladly help you to break away from them."—Prof. J. E.

"About three years ago I first saw your 'Encouragements to Faith,' as the house of a friend; and being at that time under a cloud, spiritual, I beseeched of it. It was just what I needed. I was wrestling under my disability to be a Christian Worker. In my weakness I began to doubt God's notice of His creatures. Indeed notions crept in. I went to my Father in my distress, but He treated it lightly, having more faith in me than I had in myself. Then I came across your book, and its plainness cut me to the heart. I felt like saying with Job, 'I am vile,' etc. Then light burst in on my soul, and I felt as happy as a bird 'I went about singing instead of sighing.'"—E. A. S. C. Saratoga, N. Y.

"We are not surprised to see a new edition of this excellent manual. There are few better books to put into the hands of those who are stumbling over what may be called the elementary difficulties of conversion. It deals with these, not only freshly, but truthfully, tenderly, and very simply; and besides this, there are a few chapters at the end which even an advanced Christian may read with much profit."—The Christian Herald.

The Late SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE, the Jewish Philanthropist—Scenes in his Life.

THE LATE SIR MOSES MONTEFIORE.

Celebration of his Hundredth Year—His Famous Philanthropies—His Family—Marriage and Successful Business Career—First Visit to Palestine—A Jewish Rabbi's Admission in New York—A Memorable Journey—Honored by his Queen—Mission to Russia—Hopes of Jewish Nationality—Interest in President Garfield.

ON July 28th last died Sir Moses Montefiore, Baronet, the eminent Jewish philanthropist whose one hundredth birthday was celebrated last year by the Jews all over the world. On that occasion a sermon was preached at a special service, in the chief synagogue of New York, by Dr. Kohler, the learned Jewish Rabbi, a few passages from which will show why the Jews throughout the world had other reasons than that of his great age for being delighted to do honor to their venerable co-religionist. Dr. Kohler styled him the Peter Cooper of the Israelitic nation. This tribute is the more noteworthy because it came from a preacher of the Reformed school, against which Sir Moses Montefiore has waged relentless war. Sir Moses has no sympathy with the reformers, who have renounced the dietary and ceremonial laws of Moses, and who have neither the expectation nor the desire to return to Palestine. Yet, in spite of this divergence of theological views, Dr. Kohler was warm in his eulogy. He said: "What won him the esteem of all who knew him, Jew or Gentile, was, beside his utmost integrity, his genial courtesy and friendliness. Owning a beautiful estate at East Cliff Lodge, near Ramsgate, he frequently found the Duchess of Kent with her daughter, the present Queen of England, walking in his pleasant park grounds. So he at once begged her to accept of him to give her admittance at all times without ceremony. There was hardly any charitable object brought to the notice of the public to which he was not a large and regular contributor. Frequent shipwrecks having occurred on the cliff near his residence, which opens a wide view upon the wide ocean, he at once devoted large sums to the relief of the unfortunate deprived of their supporters. Like Abraham's house, the East Cliff mansion was, and still is, open to every suppliant. Denial of help is unknown."

Nor was it from Jews alone that the benevolent centenarian received tributes of esteem and congratulation. Messages poured in from all quarters of the world and from all classes. The Queen, who encourages all her subjects to contribute to benevolent purposes, telegraphed: "I wish to renew my sincere congratulations to you on this day, which marks the completion of a century of loyalty and philanthropy." The Prince of Wales and other distinguished personages also sent their congratulations. The day was celebrated as a public holiday in Ramsgate, a town of which Sir Moses often said, "Every boy and girl is dear to me." He was at that time in a very weak state, and it was feared that the excitement of the day might prove fatal. He rallied, however, and for a time was much stronger, but it was evident that his life could not be preserved much longer. He continued his beneficent labors without abatement. To Christians as well as Jews he gave freely, if only he was convinced that the object for which his gifts were asked was one tending to the amelioration of the condition of the poor, the sick, or the distressed.

Even at the very last, when the flame of life was flickering in its socket, his secretary records that he seemed to have but one anxiety. He was disturbed by a dread that some of his many benevolent enterprises might have been overlooked and might suffer by his death. Raising his hand, which for so many years had found its occupation in doling out gifts to those who were ready to perish, he moved his fingers easily, to convince his friend that he could still sign cheques if they were needed. It must have been a touching spectacle, that venerable centenarian, about to quit the world, yet eager still to continue to the very edge of the dark river the work to which his life had been devoted. His passage to the grave was calm and peaceful. He gradually sank, like a weary child falling asleep, and on July 28th his last breath was drawn, and his beneficent life on earth finally closed.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Moses Montefiore was born, the eldest son of a not very wealthy merchant, on the 24th of October, 1784. His ancestors had dwelt in Ancona and Leghorn, cities in which by special, and then exceptional legislation, Jews had been permitted to trade. His grandfather, Moses Haim Montefiore, had settled in England, where he had nine sons and eight daughters, and was a near neighbor and associate of Benjamin Disraeli, the grandfather of Lord Beaconsfield. He had seventeen children. Joseph Elias, his fourth son, was the father of the subject of this sketch. He married a daughter of the house of Mocatta, a family of Moorish or Spanish Jews, who had left their tombs in the Lido at Venice, and in the graveyard of Amsterdam. Joseph Montefiore's wife accompanied him to Leghorn, whither he went to buy for the English market, and there in the Via Reale she gave birth to Moses Haim, the first of her eight children, on October 24th (the eve of Heshvan 9th), 1784.

Returning to England, Moses Montefiore was educated privately, articulated to Mr. Robert Johnson, a wholesale tea-merchant in London, and afterward entered the Stock Exchange, where his uncle purchased for him for $6,000, the right to practise as one of the twelve Jewish brokers. No greater number than that was permitted by the City of London, although it was a more enlightened body than most of the English communities of that day. Moses Montefiore joined a Surrey volunteer regiment, and rose to the rank of captain. (A picture of him in his regimentals appears on the first page.) He became very popular on the Stock Exchange, and much consideration was shown for him when, in consequence of the default of another person, he had to ask for a few days' time, which was cheerfully accorded him, to deliver some Exchequer bills. He was joined in business by his brother Abraham, and became connected in business and by marriage with Nathan Mayer Rothschild, whose name is still signed on the cheques of the great house.

MARRIAGE.

The two friends, Nathan Rothschild and Moses Montefiore, married sisters, daughters of Levy Barent Cohen, a merchant of Dutch descent, greatly respected for his wealth and benevolence. Montefiore's wife was Judith, a lady of a singularly sweet, lovable disposition, whom he tenderly loved, and whose death in 1862 was the great sorrow of his life. His marriage, besides being a singularly happy one, showed his independence of mind and superiority to the prejudices which then prevailed. His family had joined, as immigrants from Italy usually did join, the Sephardim, or Spanish congregation. He, however, wedded an Ashkenazi, or German Jewess. The line of demarcation between the two "nations," as they were called, was then strongly marked; they had but recently agreed to meet together to assert their common interests as Jews in the Board of Deputies, and marriages between them were still infrequent.

Judith Montefiore entertained for her husband the deepest admiration and affection, accompanying him on all his journeys, and aiding him with her counsel and active labor in all his benevolent enterprises. When she died he erected over her remains a monument, the fac-simile of that erected in memory of Rachel "in the way of Ephraim which is Bethlehem;" he endowed a scholarship in her name at the Jews' Free School, and gave other generous testimony of his regret in the way she would herself have chosen.

The Montefiores prospered in business, their alliance with the Rothschilds assisting them materially in their enterprises. In 1840 Moses retired from the business, though his brother Abraham, continued and realized a much larger fortune. Henceforward he and his wife, having no children, devoted their lives exclusively to philanthropic labors. "Thank God, and b content," was Judith's answer, when Moses told her their financial position and his hesitation about retiring from business.

Prior to that, however—in the year 1827—they made their together, not merely from impulses of piety and love for the spots sacred to mankind, but a generous sympathy with its unfortunate inhabitants, whom they desired to offer assistance. Without distinction of creed or blood they lavished their charity in large measure upon the people there. (Their approach to the holy city is depicted on the first page, panel No. 3.) In 1837, when Syria was ravaged by earthquakes, pestilence, and famine, the noble pair started second time to the sacred land of their fathers to minister to the relief of the poor sufferer and to distribute money among whomsoever applied in the various towns and districts, to enable them to live through the crisis. Nor was Sir Moses satisfied with mere momentary relief. He spared no labor in examining into the condition of every household of the poor, and in collecting accurate statistics, being desirous to elevate the general, social and material position of the Jews of the Holy Land. He wanted to lift them from a state of pauperism and wretchedness to independence.

A SIGNIFICANT ADMISSION.

Dr. Kohler, referring to this period, says, "Already he had conceived the plan of a Jewish colonization in Palestine. He went to the Viceroy of Egypt, generously offering him on behalf of the Jews a sum worth $5,000,000 as fund to start a bank for the purpose of buying up the land and rendering the Jewish inhabitants a farming and industrial people. His offer was not accepted, but the hope that some such scheme might be realized was never given up by him or English Jews and their friends. You hear it re-echoed in 'Daniel Deronda.' Some say it formed the pet scheme of Lord Beaconsfield's 'Eastern politics.' It is again taken up and pursued by Lawrence Oliphant," and Dr. Kohler then made an admission, the force and significance of which, coming as it did from Jewish Rabbi of the Reformed school, cannot be overestimated. He said: "Surely, if the national hopes of the orthodox Jew for a restored Jewish kingdom will, under the pressure of constantly repeated persecutions and ostracisms, some shape or other be realized—and I am inclined to believe in its possibility—without infringing on the cosmopolitan Messianic mission of the Jewish people, Moses Montefiore was instrumental in laying the foundation."

On their way home the two travellers were able to render a service to the English Government. They touched at Malta, where they found Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, who had just fought the naval battle of Navarino, destroying the Turkish and Egyptian fleet. The Montefiores were proceeding homeward, with special facilities arranged beforehand with the advantage wealth gives, and would be in London long before the Admiral's messenger. There were no telegraphs in those days, and the Admiral was glad to avail himself of the opportunity to forward his despatches by them. Every hour was precious, and the Montefiores quickened their journey, and carried into London the first news of the great victory. (See picture first page, panel 2.)

THE BLOOD ACCUSATION.

Sir Moses undertook a journey to Damascus 1840. A Roman Catholic priest had suddenly disappeared from Damascus, and the Jews were accused of having murdered him to procure human blood for their Passover cakes. If Jews were arrested and were subjected to torture of the most revolting character, to force a confession of guilt from them. One or two of the their indescribable agony made a confession, at an investigation of their statements showed they were innocent, and had only accused themselves in the hope that they might be killed outright instead of enduring further suffering. Then sixty-four Jewish infants were seized, carried away from their mothers and kept on scanty fare, with the expectation that maternal love might wring from the distressed parents a confession. But it was useless—the Jews were innocent, and the authorities were devising other ingenious methods of torture, when Sir Moses Montefiore arrived in company with the distinguished French Jew, M. Crémieux, and by personal intercession induced the Pasha of Egypt to put an end to the horrible persecution. (See picture on first page, panel 4.)

On his return to London he was elected baronet of London and Middlesex, and in this capacity was knighted by the Queen on the occasion of her first visit to the city. He was subsequently raised to the rank of baronet, and the Queen, the more strongly to mark her regard for him, granted him a privilege in connection with which is regarded as exclusively the mark of the highest orders of the peerage. He chose as the motto of his coat-of-arms the words "Think and Thank," and on a banner borne by a lion is the word "Jerusalem."

Only two years afterward Montefiore was again in Palestine. A terrible epidemic had broken out and the death-rate was appalling. Sir Moses Montefiore found his brethren in abject misery without hospital or medical attendance. He immediately established a dispensary in Jerusalem with a supply of medicines, employed a physician and nurses to attend to the sick, and defrayed the entire cost out of his own pocket for three years, until the health of the community was restored.

The year 1836 found Sir Moses Montefiore and wife enduring the rigor of a Russian usually, it was the sufferings of his people that caused the journey. The semi-barbarous Nicholas was engaged in persecuting the Jews, and had issued an edict, the effect of which would have been fatal to thousands of them, and would have consigned many thousands besides to abject poverty. Sir Moses intervened for them, and the charm of his manner, his disinterested sympathy, and his appeals to the Czar's clemency (see panel No. 3), procured a withdrawal of the edict. On his way back to England he visited the Jewish settlements in several countries and cheered them by sympathy and counsel. In 1858 which has become historic, agitated the Jewish community. The Mortaras were a Jewish family living at Bologna, then under the misgovernment of the Pope. They had a Roman Catholic se girl who, incited by the priests, surreptitiously baptized one of the children who was only one year old. When she gave the information to the priests they obtained a company of soldiers from the Pope and carried off the infant to a convent. The distress of the parents was imagined, and Montefiore went to Rome to plead with the Pope for the restoration of the child. Pio Nono refused to see him, and his minister, Cardinal Antonelli, gave a refusal to his petition. Though Sir Moses was impelled to leave the child in the custody of the powerful Roman Catholic abductors, he so roughly aroused public opinion in Europe as to render further efforts of the Pope in the same direction, if not impossible.

Shortly after this journey Lady Montefiore, and the grief-stricken widower, then at an octogenarian, devoted himself, with rebellious energy, to the work of beneficence, so that only he could find relief from sorrow. He had not laid the beloved remains in the grave many months before he was again in the East, this time on a mission for the protection of persecuted Christians, to whom he gave lavishly of his money, and for whom he interceded successfully with the Sultan.

In October, 1863, at the age of seventy-nine, Sir Moses Montefiore undertook a JOURNEY TO MOROCCO.

The Spanish collector of the Port of Saafi had died suddenly, and the authorities had made the fact of his servant being a Jew a pretext for persecuting the Jews on the charge of having murdered him. Four Jews were arrested, two of them were hanged up by the feet, head downward, and beaten almost to death; then they were placed naked in casks, through the staves of which sharp nails projected, and the casks were rolled along the roads. Then they were taken out and their sufferings ended with a thrust from a dagger. The other two Jews remained in prison, and it was for their release that the venerable man undertook to plead. He was so far successful as to obtain an order liberating them, but was unable to have the monsters who had committed the outrage punished.

Still later, in 1870, and again in 1875, when he was ninety-one years old, Sir Moses Montefiore visited the East on missions of mercy.

THE HOPE OF A JEWISH EMPIRE

in Palestine was all through his life ardently cherished by Sir Moses Montefiore. He firmly believed in the ultimate return of the Jews to their own land, and only a short time before he died he said, with much emphasis, "Jerusalem is destined to become the seat of a Jewish Empire. It is the dream of my life, which will be fulfilled when I am no more." He purchased extensive plots of ground in Jerusalem, and in 1882 it was announced that he had given orders to prepare for cultivation the land in the front of what are known as the Judah Touro houses in Jerusalem. In his little book, which records his seventh visit to Palestine, in 1875, he pleaded with his co-religionists to assist their brethren in Palestine, beginning, "in the first instance, with the building of houses in Jerusalem," and shows his impatient earnestness by adding, "Commence at once, begin the work this day if you can."

We trust, at a no very distant period, that the Jews will be restored to the land of their fathers (Isaiah 51:3). We believe, according to the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, that the "Times of the Gentiles," during which the "treading down of Jerusalem" is to continue, are nearing their completion. They were to last for 2520 years, which, if they commenced, as is generally believed, in Nebuchadnezzar's era, will end about 1893; and that the political restoration of many Jews to Jerusalem and the rebuilding of their temple will commence about seven years before the end of those 2520 years—that is to say, about 1886.

OLD AGE.

Second only in Sir Moses Montefiore's mind to the reestablishment of the Jews at Jerusalem, and, indeed, forming part of that scheme, is the Jewish College, close to the baronet's residence, and attached to the synagogue. It provides for ten aged Hebrews proved and learned in Jewish laws and Talmudic literature. After 1875 Sir Moses travelled no more. The last years of his long life were passed in retirement, but not in seclusion. Every philanthropist seeking aid for any purpose connected with the welfare of mankind had ready access to him, and none were sent empty away. A stream of beneficence, widespread and deep, flowed from that apparently inexhaustible spring at Ramsgate; and though he was too feeble to engage personally in the work of distribution, his hands were busy aiding any who were engaged in the work. His heart was full of love for all the world and with sympathy for the suffering everywhere, and his interest in the affairs of the day was remarkable in one whose life had been so active in the past. It was noted as a significant trait of character that, four years ago, when President Garfield lay dying, Sir Moses sent off a request to the synagogues at Jerusalem and other places that the rabbis and congregations would offer prayers for the dying President.

Albeit the charity of Sir Moses was dispensed without regard to age, sex, religion, or country, he remained a Hebrew of the Hebrews. So powerful even over generous souls and highly cultivated intellects are the influences of association and early education that even this noble old man, whose life was spent in going about doing good, failed to see in Jesus of Nazareth Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write. It is also to be feared that the cruelty and injustice perpetrated by men calling themselves Christians may have had something to do with prejudicing him against the doctrines of Christianity, toward which, if he rightly understood them, his gentleness and charity would have been attracted.

It remains only to acknowledge that we are indebted for much of the material for this sketch to a communication which the venerable baronet himself sent to the editor of this journal not long before he died. His writing, though he was then in his hundredth year, was more firm and legible than that of many younger men.

Helen Fiske Hunt Jackson, the Famous author, died in San Francisco on August 14th. She was the daughter of Professor Nathan W. Fiske, and was born in Amherst, Mass., on October 18th, 1831. Her first husband was Major Edward B. Hunt, of the United States Engineer Corps, who died in Newport in 1863. Mrs. Hunt made her first appearance in print in the Atlantic and other publications as the writer of some charming verses, to which the initials "H. H." were appended. Then articles and modest volumes on travel and "home talk" from her pen made their appearance, and afterward she wrote several popular stories, one of which, entitled "Ramona," had a wide circulation. The well-remembered "Saxe Holm" stories in the Century were also attributed to her, although their authorship was never publicly acknowledged. In 1876 Mrs. Hunt married William S. Jackson, of Colorado, and took up her residence in the West. This brought her face to face with the Indian question, in which she became greatly interested. After careful study of the subject she published "A Century of Dishonor," in which the National Government's treatment of its aboriginal wards was severely criticized. Her latest literary work was a series of articles for the Century on the old California missions, one fruit of her recent residence on the Pacific coast.

An Appropriate Memorial to the Lamented General Gordon is to be raised in England. Lord Tennyson, the poet-laureate, who is at the head of the movement, described its origin to a newspaper correspondent recently. Lord Tennyson said: "Just before General Gordon left for the Sudan he came to lunch with me. He spoke very earnestly about his plans for training young boys. Almost his first words were, 'Something must be done for these boys, and you are the man to do it.'" When committees were organized after General Gordon's death to erect a statue or some other memorial of him, Lord Tennyson suggested that a Gordon home for boys would be the most suitable memorial to a man who had taken so warm an interest in their welfare. The suggestion was adopted, and The Gordon Boys' Home, as it is now called, will commence operations this autumn at Fareham Fort, on Portsdown Hill, and will move to its permanent quarters at Bagshot, where the Government has generously presented it with a site of fifty acres, whenever the necessary buildings shall be ready for its reception. These buildings will give accommodation for fifty boys, and contain gymnasiums, kitchens and workshops. They will be so constructed as to be capable of enlargement in proportion to the amount of funds at the disposal of the committee. Plans on a large scale have already been drawn up. Well-known and experienced officers have accepted posts as commandant and quartermaster, and a competent secretary has been engaged. The committees have already a fund of $110,000 in hand for the undertaking.

THE ROAD TO THE CITY.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; and the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there; and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."—ISAIAH 35: 8-10.

THERE are hundreds of people in this house this morning who want to find the right road. You sometimes see a person halting at cross roads, and you can tell by his looks that he wishes to ask a question as to what direction he had better take. And I stand in your presence this morning conscious of the fact that there are many of you here who realize that there are a thousand wrong roads, but only one right one; and I take it for granted that you have come in to ask which one it is. Here is one road that opens widely, but I have not much faith in it. There are a great many expensive toll-gates scattered all along that way. Indeed at every road you must pay in tears, or pay in genuflections, or pay in flagellations. On that road, if you get through it at all, you have to pay your own way; and since this differs so much from what I have heard in regard to the right way, I believe it is

THE WRONG WAY.

Here is another road. On either side of it are houses of sinful entertainment, and invitations to come in, and dine and rest; but, from the looks of the people who stand on the piazza I am very certain it is the wrong house and the wrong way. Here is another road. It is very beautiful and macadamized. The horses' hoofs clatter and ring, and they who ride over it spin along the highway, until suddenly they find that the road breaks over an embankment, and they try to halt, and they saw the bit in the mouth of the fiery steed, and cry "Ho! ho!" But it is too late, and—crash!—they go over the embankment. We shall turn, this morning, and see if we cannot find a different kind of a road.

You have heard of

THE APPIAN WAY.

It was three hundred and fifty miles long. It was twenty-four feet wide, and on either side the road was a path for foot passengers. It was made out of rocks cut in hexagonal shape and fitted together. What a road it must have been! Made of smooth, hard rock, three hundred and fifty miles long. No wonder that in the construction of it the treasures of a whole empire were exhausted. Because of invaders, and the elements, and Time—the old conqueror who tears up a road as he goes over it—there is nothing left of that structure excepting a ruin. But I have this morning to tell you of a road built before the Appian Way, and yet it is as good as when first constructed. Millions of souls have gone over it. Millions more will come.

"The prophets and apostles, too,

Pursued this road while here below;

We therefore will, without dismay,

Still walk in Christ, the good old way."

"An highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast shall go up thereon, it shall not be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there; and the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

I. First, this road of the text is
THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

In the diligence you dash on over the Bernard pass of the Alps, mile after mile, and there is not so much as a pebble to jar the wheels. You go over bridges which cross chasms that make you hold your breath; under projecting rock; along by dangerous precipices; through tunnels adrip with the meltings of the glaciers; and, perhaps, for the first time, learn the majesty of a road built and supported by governmental authority. Well, my Lord the King decided to build a highway from earth to heaven. It should span all the chasms of human wretchedness; it should tunnel all the mountains of earthly difficulty; it should be wide enough and strong enough to hold fifty thousand millions of the human race, if so many of them should ever be born. It should be blasted out of the "Rock of Ages," and cemented with the blood of the Cross, and be lifted amid the shouting of angels and the execration of devils.

BUILT BY HIS SON.

The King sent His Son to build that road. He put head, and hand, and heart to it, and, after the road was completed waved His blistered hand over the way, crying: "It is finished!" Napoleon paid fifteen millions francs for the building of the Simplon Road, that his cannon might go over for the devastation of Italy; but our King, at a greater expense, has built a road for a different purpose, that the banners of heavenly dominion might come down over it, and all the redeemed of earth travel up over it.

Being a King's highway, of course, it is well built. Bridges splendidly arched and buttressed have given way and crushed the passengers who attempted to cross them. But Christ, the King, would build no such thing as that. The work done, He mounts the chariot of His love, and multitudes mount with Him, and He drives on and up the steep of heaven amid the plaudits of gazing worlds! The work is done—well done—gloriously done—magnificently done.

II. Still further: this road spoken of is

A CLEAN ROAD.

Many a fine road has become miry and foul because it has not been properly cared for; but my text says the unclean shall not walk on this one. Rooms on either side to throw away your sins. Indeed, if you want to carry them along you are not on the right road. That bridge will break, those overhanging rocks will fall, the night will come down, leaving you at the mercy of the mountain bandits, and at the very next turn of the road you will perish. But if you are really on this clean road of which I have been speaking, then you will stop ever and anon to wash in the water that stands in the basin of the eternal rock. Aye, at almost every step of the journey you will be crying out: "Create within me a clean heart." If you have no such aspirations as that, it proves that you have mistaken your way; and if you will only look up and see the finger-board above your head, you may read upon it the words: "There is a way that seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof is death." Without holiness no man shall see the Lord; and if you have any idea that you can carry along your sins, your lusts, your worldliness, and yet get to the end of the Christian race, you are so awfully mistaken that, in the name of God, this morning, I shatter the delusion.

III. Still further: the road spoken of is

A PLAIN ROAD.

"The wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein." That is, if a man is three fourths an idiot, he can find this road just as well as if he were a philosopher. The imbecile boy, the laughing-stock of the street, and followed by a mob hooting at him, has only just to knock once at the gate of heaven, and it swings open; while there has been many a man who can lecture about pneumatics, and chemistry, and tell the story of Faraday's theory of electrical polarization, and yet has been shut out of heaven. There has been many a man who stood in an observatory and swept the heavens with his telescope, and yet has not been able to see the Morning Star. Many a man has been familiar with all the higher branches of mathematics, and yet could not do the simple sum: "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Many a man has been a fine reader of tragedies and poems, and yet could not "read his title clear to mansions in the skies." Many a man has botanized across the continent, and yet not known the "Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the Valley." But if one shall come in the right spirit, trying the way to heaven, he will find it a plain way. The pardon is plain. The peace is plain. Everything is plain.

He who tries to get on the road to heaven through the New Testament teaching will get on beautifully. He who goes through philosophical discussion will not get on at all. Christ says: "Come to Me, and I will take all your sins away, and I will take all your troubles away." Now what is the use of my discussing it any more? Is not that plain? If you wanted to go to Albany, and I pointed you out a highway thoroughly laid out, would I be wise in detaining you by a geological discussion about the gravel you will pass over, or a physiological discussion about the muscles you will have to bring into play? No. After this Bible has pointed you the way to heaven, is it wise for me to detain you with any discussion about the nature of the human will, or whether the atonement is limited or unlimited? There is the road—go on it. It is a plain way.

"This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." And that is you and that is me. Any little child here can understand this as well as I can. "Unless you become as a little child, you cannot see the kingdom of God." If you are saved, it will not be as a philosopher, it will be as a little child. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." Unless you get the spirit of little children, you will never come out at their glorious destiny.

IV. Still further: this road to heaven is

A SAFE ROAD.

Sometimes the traveller in those ancient highways would think himself perfectly secure, not knowing there was a lion by the way, burying his head deep between his paws, and then, when the right moment came, under the fearful spring the man's life was gone, and there was a mangled carcass by the roadside. But, says my text, "No lion shall be there." I wish I could make you feel, this morning, your entire security. I tell you plainly that one minute after a man has become a child of God, he is as safe as though he had been ten thousand years in heaven. He may slip, he may slide, he may stumble; but he cannot be destroyed. Kept by the power of God, through faith, unto complete salvation. Everlastingly safe.

The severest trial to which you can subject a Christian man is to kill him, and that is glory. In other words, the worst thing that can happen a child of God is heaven. The body is only the old slippers that he throws aside just before putting on the sandals of light. His soul, you cannot hurt it. No fires can consume it. No floods can drown it. No devils can capture it.

"Firm and unmoved are they
Who rest their souls on God;
Fixed as the ground where David stood,
Or where the ark abode."

His soul is safe. His reputation is safe. Everything is safe. "But," you say: "suppose his store burns up?" Why, then, it will be only a change of investments from earthly to heavenly securities. "But," you say: "suppose his name goes down under the hoof of scorn and contempt?" The name will be so much brighter

* Subscribers have written us inquiring about the sermon Dr. Talmage preached in London a week ago last Sunday. They have seen the reports of it published in the American newspapers the following morning, and imagine they were cabled over. The sermon was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Oct. 26th, 1882.

in glory. "Suppose his physical health fails?" God will pour into him the floods of everlasting health, and it will not make any difference. Earthly subtraction is heavenly addition. The tears of earth are the crystals of heaven. As they take rags and tatters and put them through the paper-mill, and they come out beautiful white sheets of paper, so, often, the rags of earthly destitution, under the cylinders of death, come out a white scroll upon which shall be written eternal emancipation.

There was one passage of Scripture, the force of which I never understood until one day at Chamounix, with Mont Blanc on one side, and Montanvert on the other, I opened my Bible and read: "As the mountains are around about Jerusalem, so the Lord is around about them that fear Him." The surroundings were an omnipotent commentary.

"Though troubles assail, and dangers affright;
Though friends should all fail, and foes all unite;
Yet one thing secures us, whatever betide,
The Scriptures assure us the Lord will provide."

V. Still further: the road spoken of is

A PLEASANT ROAD.

God gives a bond of indemnity against all evil to every man that treads it. "All things work together for good to those who love God." No weapon formed against him can prosper. That is the bond, signed, sealed, and delivered by the President of the whole universe. What is the use of your fretting, O child of God, about food? "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them." And will He take care of the sparrow, will He take care of the raven, will He take care of the hawk, and let you die? What is the use of your fretting about clothes? "Consider the lilies of the field. Shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" What is the use worrying for fear something will happen to your home? "He blesteth the habitation of the just." What is the use of your fretting lest you will be overcome of temptations? "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but with will the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it."

O this King's highway! Trees of life on either side, bending over until their branches interlock and drop midway their fruit and shade.

HOUSES OF ENTERTAINMENT

on either side the road for poor pilgrims. Tables spread with a feast of good things, and walls adorned with apples of gold in pictures of silver. I start out on this King's highway, and I find a harper, and I say: "What is your name?" The harper makes no response, but leaves me to guess, as, with his eyes toward heaven and his hand upon the trembling strings this tune comes rippling on the air: "The Lord is my light and my salvation. Whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?" I go a little farther on the same road and meet a trumpeter of heaven, and I say: "Haven't you got some music for a tired pilgrim?" And wiping his lip and taking a long breath, he puts his mouth to the trumpet and pours forth this strain: "They shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat, for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." I go a little distance farther on the same road, and I meet a maiden of Israel. She has no harp, but she has cymbals. They look as if they had rusted from sea-spray; and I say to the maiden of Israel: "Have you no

SONG FOR A TIRED PILGRIM?"

And like the clang of victors' shields the cymbals clap as Miriam begins to discourse: "Sing ye to the Lord, for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and the rider hath He thrown into the sea." And then I see a white-robed group. They come bounding toward me, and I say: "Who are they? The happiest, and the brightest, and the fairest in all heaven—who are they?" And the answer comes: "These are they who came out of great tribulations, and had their robes washed, and made white with the blood of the Lamb."

I pursue this subject only one step further.

WHAT IS THE TERMINUS?

I do not care how fine a road you may put me on, I want to know where it comes out. My text declares it: "The redeemed of the Lord come to Zion." You know what Zion was. That was the King's palace. It was a mountain fastness. It was impregnable. And so heaven is the fastness of the universe. No howitzer has long enough range to shell those towers. Let all the batteries of earth and hell blaze away; they cannot break in those gates. Gibraltar was taken, Sebastopol was taken, Babylon fell; but these walls of heaven shall never surrender either to human or Satanic besiegement. The Lord God Almighty is the defence of it. Great capital of the universe! Terminus of the King's highway!

Dr. Dick said that, among other things, he thought in heaven we would study chemistry, and geometry, and conic sections. Southey thought that in heaven he would have the pleasure of seeing Chaucer and Shakespeare. Now, Dr. Dick may have his mathematics for all eternity, and Southey his Shakespeare. Give me Christ and my old friends—that is that is heaven enough for me. O garden of light, whose leaves never wither, and whose fruits never fail! O banquet of God, whose sweetness never palls the taste and whose guests are kings forever! O city of light, whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise! O palace of rest, where God is the monarch and everlasting ages the length of His reign! O song louder than the surf-beat of many waters, yet soft as the whisper of cherubim!

O my heaven! When my last wound is healed, when the last heart-break is ended, when the last tear of earthly sorrow is wiped away, and when the redeemed of the Lord shall come to Zion, then let all the harpers take down their harps, and all the trumpeters take down their trumpets, and all across heaven there be chorus of morning stars, chorus of white-robed victors, chorus of martyrs from under the throne, chorus of ages, chorus of worlds, and there be but one song sung, and but one name spoken, and but one throne honored—that of Jesus only.

PRINCE HENRY OF BATTENBERG.

THE young man who, on July 23d, married the Princess Beatrice, the youngest daughter of Queen Victoria, is twenty-six years of age, having been born October 5th, 1858. He is a year and a half younger than his bride, who was born April 14th, 1857. A curious fact about the match is that, while Prince Henry has married the Queen's daughter, his eldest brother has married her grand-daughter. Thus his wife is aunt to his sister-in-law, and, by marriage, he is uncle to his own brother.

It must not be supposed that his title of "prince" implies a large principality. Battenberg itself does not contain more than one thousand inhabitants all told, and his eldest brother, not Prince Henry, is heir to that. The match does not appear to be popular in England. The bride's eldest brother, the Prince of Wales, refused point blank to give the bride away, and irreverently spoke of the bridegroom as "a German beggar." The nobility do not like him because the queen gave him the Order of the Garter, a distinction coveted by the proudest nobles, and will probably give him other things which might, but for him, have fallen to them. The people do not like him because he does not speak English and because his income from all sources being only $3250, there will be a large margin to be made up out of the taxes, directly and indirectly. It may be hoped that the Queen and the young couple are pleased, as every other party concerned seems dissatisfied. The young Prince, certainly, has cause to be thankful.

H. M. QUEEN VICTORIA.

THE Queen of England is now in her sixty-seventh year, having been born May 24th, 1819. She is the grand-daughter of King George III., the sovereign whose name used to figure so prominently in our Fourth of July orations. Freely as that King's name was execrated, and his life and policy ridiculed, it is seldom that his grand-daughter's name is mentioned before an American audience otherwise than respectfully.

She was the only daughter of the Duke of Kent, who was the fourth son of George III. There seemed little probability, when the old king died in 1820, that the little girl-baby, one year old, would ever wear the crown. Her father's three elder brothers and the children, any one of them, might have stood before her in the succession. But her father died, and then his brothers, none of the three leaving any legitimate children. So, when on June 19th, 1837, William IV., the third son of George III., died, the Princess Victoria, then in her nineteenth year, succeeded to the splendid heritage of the crown of England. She has now reigned forty-eight years—a longer period than any of her predecessors except three. During the past twenty-four years she has lived in comparative seclusion, attending to the business of her position, which mainly consists in affixing her signature to the enactments of Parliament, but seldom mixing in Court society. After the death of her husband, Prince Albert, in December, 1861, the gaieties of the court became distasteful to her, and she has since lived chiefly at her country palaces in Scotland and the Isle of Wight. She loved her husband devotedly, and his death was a shock she has never been able to recover from. Two years ago, on March 27th, 1883, she was again called to suffer. John Brown, a Scotch man-servant, to whom she was warmly attached, died suddenly. In the book she published shortly after his death, and which she dedicated to his memory, she said her "loss was irreparable," and that to say he was "daily, nay, hourly, missed" by her, "was a feeble expression of the truth," for he possessed her "entire confidence."

THE PRINCESS BEATRICE.

THE lady who was, on July 23d, married to Prince Henry of Battenberg, is over twenty-eight years of age, having been born April 14th, 1857. She was but little more than four years old when the dark shadow of bereavement fell on the royal household; her life, therefore, has been one of gloom. She has seen less gaiety than many ladies of her age. During all the twenty-four years of her mother's widowhood she has been with her, growing every year more of a companion, and, since 1871, when the Princess Louise was married, the Princess Beatrice has been the one upon whom the Queen has chiefly depended for affectionate attention. The Princess has gone hither and thither with the Queen, and seemed to have no care in life but to minister to her mother's comfort. It is probable that one reason why so poor a marriage has been arranged for her is that the husband's poverty would render him dependent on his mother-in-law, and more amenable to her control. Thus she would be able to keep the young couple constantly near her, and, instead of losing a daughter, would gain a son.

The Princess is a highly accomplished young lady. Her achievements in music and painting are well spoken of by competent judges, and in circumstances when the station of the lady did not bias the judgment. The Parliament voted her an annuity for life of $30,000, and it is probable that, when the Queen divides her vast wealth by her will, the many years of devotion, which the Princess Beatrice has rendered, will be considered by Her Majesty. The grant to the Princess is probably the last for some years that Parliament will be asked to vote, as all the Queen's children are now married.

THE COMING KINGDOM.

By Pastor Joshua Denovan.

FROM AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE RECENT

The Kingdom Universal—Government Local and Central—I. Personal Government—Present Results of Gospel Preaching—Christianized Civilization—II. Jerusalem the Metropolis—The Failure of Political Schemes—The World's Needs—I. United Empire—2. Wise Legislation and Strong Executive—3. Permanent Rule—4. Universal Peace.

THE local and central government which Christ will establish when He comes with power, bringing with Him that great company of angels and raptured saints is distinctly predicted by Isaiah (9: 6, 7). "Of the increase of His government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David and over His kingdom, to order it and establish it, with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even forever."

This prediction might be explained, expanded, and confirmed by numerous others that could be quoted from Moses and the Psalms, from the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Daniel, from the minor prophets and from the plain statements of Jesus Christ, but time forbids. This prediction tells us:

I. That the Lord Christ's government on this earth will be personal, and that His kingdom will be a real, actual, visible, physical fact as human experience and mundane history. As surely as Victoria is reigning in England, Jesus Christ will in Judea.

Without dwelling on the fact that when the Gospel of the kingdom has been preached in all the world to all nations for a witness that then shall come the end, what do we now actually see as the result of the Gospel? Not Christianity, but merely Christianized civilization—nations and cities brought from a condition of heathen barbarism as in the Pacific Islands, or heathen civilization, as in ancient Rome and Greece, into a Christianized civilization which is only nominal Christianity, having but a comparatively small number of its professors truly regenerate—a centre of light and salt surrounded by, and almost buried beneath a vast mass of formality and

REFINED VICE.

Paris, Marseilles, Florence, Naples, and Rome are Christian, but where can you find more rampant the world and the flesh, selfishness and frivolity, superstition and vice? Berlin is Protestant and Christian, but there you find flourishing scientific atheism, intense earthliness and godless militarism. Cincinnati, Chicago, and San Francisco, with all their Sabbath desecration and unutterable social abominations are Christian—that is, they are now in the state of Christianized civilization. Can we say—can we even imagine that these are specimens of the kingdom of Christ in progress?

In God's sight, was the old sensual worship of heathenism more abominable than that lust of the flesh, lust of the eyes, and pride of life which fester under London refinements, which go dressed and jewelled to our theatres on Saturday, and to our sanctuaries on Sunday, which rise from the Lord's table and go away to the ball-room and the race-course, which hesitate not to gamble in stocks and wade through bankruptcy in the laudable effort of keeping up appearances and maintaining the social position of the girls at home! This is Christian civilization; but who dares to call it the kingdom of Jesus Christ, either over the conscience or the outward life? It is vile sin—all the more exceeding sinful, because perpetrated under the guise of Christianity.

Something more, and something different is wanted than this proclamation of the Gospel, and the use of ordinances. Jesus Christ in person is needed in government.

II. The sphere of Christ's personal and local government shall be this earth, and

ITS METROPOLITAN SEAT

Jerusalem. "Of the increase (i.e., the extension and spread of His government and peace), there shall be no end"—from Jerusalem over Africa, then northward and eastward and westward. In these days we have been hearing not a little about the "Federation of England with her colonies" so that there may be created (by including a close international treaty with the United States), a grand world-wide empire of the English-speaking races, and thus secure permanent and universal peace. This is a grand Anglo-Saxon mythical vision; but ambitious, selfish human nature would not long be contented with such splendid cosmopolitan imperialism.

This sentiment is only a confession of, and a longing for, something we want. And here it is—The kingdom of Jesus Christ shall be far more than English-speaking; it shall be polyglot—"All kindreds, and nations, and tongues, and peoples," and "of its increase there shall be no end"—no boundary lines, no international territorial posts or limits shall define it, but "increase" and increase it shall until the one margin shall run into, and overlap the other. This is the blessed solution of the political and governmental problem of the ages.

Certainly one of the most interesting subjects of study at the present juncture of our world's history is i.e., government by which may be secured to the greatest number all the world over the greatest amount of blessing. Since the days of Nimrod, perhaps, every possible state form has been fairly tried and has failed. With the accumulated historical experience of long centuries and all nationalities, we are now trying by legislation to improve upon every known form and method. Results: Russia tortured between her autocratic Czar and her Nihilists, and their doctrine of dynamite. Germany and her Parliament controlled by one great man. France recently revolutionized into a republic, and ready for something newer still—some coup d'état still more brilliant any day. England seething politically like the witch's caldron Macbeth saw; Conservatives vying with Liberals as to who shall pitch into the heaving, hissing mass the largest concessions to the mob. America in the grasp of millionaires and rings of monopoly, of Rome and rum. Canada struggling to soothe her recent sorrows by giving the franchise to heathen Red Indians, and taking it from persons who believe in God, and can read and write.

What need I say more? All human methods of human government seem to be hopelessly wrong. The very best are mere makeshifts—schemes to keep people from mobbing and devouring each other. Aristocracy is, perhaps, better than autocracy; but aristocracy is not government—it is only one favored class manipulating all other classes for self.

MODERN REPUBLICANISM

is, perhaps, sometimes better than aristocracy, and very often worse, but at best it is not government, but only the rule by the multitude, led and hoodwinked by rings, caucuses and demagogues, by secret societies and priests.

What, then, are we to do? There appears to be but one reply: One Supreme Ruler, perfect in wisdom and power, truth, and honesty is alone sound government. This at least is God's ideal of right government; and this is just the government this precious prediction promises, viz.:

1. Our world one great united empire, under One Infallible Emperor; and Jerusalem the metropolitan city.

2. A method of legislation which will be perfect, and administration irresistible. This Christ's will be; He is the "Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God."

3. His dominion shall be permanent—lasting as long as our world; for "of the increase—the extension of His government and peace there shall be no end." . . . And there was given unto Him dominion and glory and a kingdom that all peoples, nations, and languages should see Him; His dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

4. Universal peace. This is promised. "the increase of His peace," etc. At His advent the angels sang, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace." This has never yet been realized. Peace of heart in individual cases has, peace of conscience, peace with God but not "peace on earth." To-day the military and naval instrumentalities for destruction are more terribly effective than ever. The machinery of modern warfare is simply enormous, a palling, diabolic. But when it comes to pass the last days, that "the mountain of the Lord house" shall be established, and exalted, then men shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks, and people shall learn war no more."

And not upon mankind only shall this marvelous, miraculous transformation be wrought, but upon the very brute creation the peace-reign Christ shall work like a charm, for "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fating together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones should lie down together, and the lion should eat straw like the ox."

I believe the 11th chapter of Isaiah literally and these 6th and 7th verses of this 9th chapter literally. Indeed if we believe that the Incarnation, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection the Son of God were the literal fulfilment ancient prophecy, we must also believe that the prophecy of His reign on earth can and shall literally fulfilled.

DR. CUYLER IN MR. SPURGEON'S PULPIT.

MR. SPURGEON being absent in Scotland, on July 26th, his pulpit was occupied on that day by Rev. Dr. Cuyler, of Brooklyn, N. Y. Personally, Dr. Cuyler is not altogether a stranger to Mr. Spurgeon's people, he having on the occasion of a former visit addressed an audience in the Tabernacle. His name is, however, familiar to the religious community on the other side of the Atlantic from the frequency with which his writings are quoted in English journals. Dr. Cuyler, as our readers are aware, celebrated recently the fortieth year of his ministry and the twenty-fifth of his pastorate in Brooklyn, and his congregation, in honor of the event sent him to Europe at their expense. He set out with the intention of not preaching while abroad, but his resolve broke down on reaching England. Already he has preached more than once for the Rev. Newman Hall, whose guest he has been since his arrival. His voice has now been heard in the Metropolitan Tabernacle and while in Glasgow he will occupy Dr. Bonar's pulpit.

During his prayer on Sunday, July 26th, Dr. Cuyler invoked the Divine blessing on "the beloved pastor," thanked God for "his wise loving and his perpetual harvest," and pleaded that Mr. Spurgeon might long "be spared to his flock, to the Church of God, and the world. Then, turning his thoughts to America, he rendered thanks for the "unity of these twin peoples—the mother and child," and might the be one in Christ. "Remember America to-day," he went on, his voice tremulous with emotion "when her head droops in national bereavement. She mourns the removal of her illustrious son, who led her armies to battle in the great conflict for the life and liberty of the oppressed."

Before giving out his texts—for he selected three—Dr. Cuyler said he counted it a great pleasure to be able to render that small service to Mr. Spurgeon, so many years his personal friend and benefactor, as he was also the benefactor of the American people. He counted it a privilege to stand in that pulpit, which threw its electric light across the ocean until its rays penetrated even the lowly cabins of the prairies. "Your joys are our joys," added Dr. Cuyler. When you celebrated your pastor's fiftieth year, we in America also joined in that jubilee. Our sorrows are your sorrows, and I thank my British kinsfolk this morning for their sympathy with us in our great national bereavement." Dr. Cuyler's sermon was based on the triplet of texts: "Every man shall bear his own burden" (Gal. 6: 5); "Bear ye one another's burdens" (Gal. 6: 2); "Cast thy burden upon the Lord" (Psalm 55: 22). Mr. Spurgeon returned in time to occupy his pulpit on Sunday, August 2d.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Dying Confession in Writing.—At One of Mr. E. Payson Hammond's meetings he said: "A little girl lay on her deathbed, and as her friends stood around her they asked her if she was resting in Jesus. Her life was fast ebbing away, and with great difficulty with a pencil she wrote the word 'Unworthy,' but again she wrote 'Christ Jesus,' meaning by this that although she was unworthy, Christ Jesus was her Saviour. This is the unvarying experience of all who have been truly born again of the Holy Spirit. They see only deformity and demerit in themselves, but beauty and perfection and Heaven in Jesus."

A Thirty Years' Prayer Answered.—At a recent meeting an evangelist in the North said: "The other winter we were conducting meetings at Lossiemouth among the fishermen. At one of these meetings a young woman said, 'I never saw myself so great a sinner before; I see myself as the greatest sinner in Lossiemouth.' That night she saw such a sight of herself that with many repenting tears she gave herself to the Lord. She had a sister in London who had been praying for her for over thirty years, and now this young woman sent a letter telling her that her prayer was answered. Soon she got a letter rejoicing with her in having found the Saviour."

Mary Wilson's Mistake.—Mr. Porter Related that, "A little girl, not long ago, entered a large meeting in New York. Her father came in search of her, and, failing to find her, he went to the superintendent, and said: 'I have lost my little girl; will you kindly ask if there is a little girl named Mary Wilson in the meeting?' The superintendent readily complying with the request, called from the platform, 'There is a little girl of the name of Mary Wilson lost, and her father is searching for her; if there is such a little girl in the meeting will she stand?' The question was repeated, but without result. When the meeting was over, and the people had dispersed, a little girl sat still in one of the benches. The superintendent going up to the child, asked, 'Why are you not going home?' 'I am waiting till somebody comes to fetch me,' was the reply. 'What is your name?' asked the superintendent. 'Mary Wilson,' she promptly replied. 'Well, Mary,' said her questioner, 'why did you not answer to your name when it was called?' 'I did not think it could mean me, because I am not lost.' This story fitly applies to many persons. They will not take the preaching of the Gospel to themselves because, like the little girl, they think they are not lost."

Converted in a Well.—Professor Lindsay said: "There was a lady in Cambridgeshire who labored among the men in a brick-field, trying to lead them to Christ. Among them was a man of fifty-six years of age who had a very bad reputation. So notoriously wicked was that people who were trying to do well shrink in fear from him. He was a well-sinker by trade, and I am told that the last bit of work about the well is the most dangerous part of it, for the newly-finished walls are apt to fall down and kill the one who is working, therefore most men shrink from this part of it. But this old man, who said he did not fear anything, offered to go down and finish it, and down he went to complete the perilous task. The walls were sixty feet high, and as he looked upwards he felt a strange fear steal over him for the first time in his life. There was danger all around him; he seemed to be facing a fearful death, and the whole of his past life came before his mind. Not one good deed could he remember doing. While he was standing there alone, trembling for fear that the next moment his soul should be in hell, all at once the truth flashed upon him that salvation by Jesus was freely offered him. A strange calmness came over him, and he went on quietly with his work. Ah, what a change had taken place in him; he went down an aged, hardened sinner, but was saved through believing in Christ, and trusting in the precious blood shed for him, and was drawn out of the well a new man in Christ Jesus."

A Cause of Joy on the Border-Land.—Mr. George Ross said: "A young lady lay dying in the west end of Glasgow, while her mother sat by her side. The dying girl broke the silence of the border-land of time and eternity by saying, 'Dear Mother, is it not a blessed thing to know that your sins are all forgiven? I have just been thinking how they make the beautiful white paper. It goes into the makers' hands dirty, filthy rags, and they bring it out beautiful and pure paper. I was like these rags, defiled and unclean, but I came to Jesus, and He has washed me in His blood, and clothed me with the pure robe of righteousness, and since I was taken through the blood of Jesus I have come out, like the paper, pure and white. "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth from all sin."'"

Why the Prayer was Omitted.—The Rev. Mr. Gullan observed: "A father one day told his child to add the following petition at the end of her customary prayer: 'O Father, do not take me away until thou hast given me a new heart!' The little girl continued to add these words to her prayer until one night she omitted them. Thinking that she had forgotten them, her parents did not make any remark, but doing the same thing the following night, they asked her the reason of this, and the child said: 'I have got it.' A few months later she was lying upon a deathbed, and as her end drew near, not being able to speak, she signed to them to sing something. They took one hymn after another, but nothing seemed to please her. 'Perhaps it is the Doxology she wants,' suggested one. The little one now looked pleased, and while they were singing it she went into the presence of Him whom she loved."

A Scoffer Becomes a Missionary.—"In the year 1861, when speaking at a meeting in Aberdeen, the church was packed to the door, and word was sent me that there were more people standing outside than there were in the church, and that I must preach on the steps outside. I did so, and notwithstanding a thick drizzling rain that was falling, the people stood to listen to the Gospel. A company of young men not far from us, who were scoffing at the meeting, began to sing a song. I gave out my text, 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned.' One of the young men who had come to mock, named John M'Gregor, was struck by the text; he turned away and went home, but still the words of the text rang in his ears. 'He that believeth not shall be damned.' He went to bed, but not to rest; he tossed about from one side to the other. Finally he got up, dressed himself, and went out. It was long past midnight, and the streets were all quiet. He went to the minister's house and rang the bell. Dr. Smith's son put his head out of a window, and called: 'Who is there?' 'It is I; I wish to see Dr. Smith.' 'You cannot see him to-night; he has already been in bed several hours.' I must see him; I will lie down on the doorstep in the rain until I can see him.' There was no help for it but to let him in. Soon the doctor was with him in the drawing-room. John M'Gregor told his story. Dr. Smith explained to him the way of life, and he found peace through believing in the Lord Jesus Christ before leaving the house. Some time ago I was telling this incident when some one said, 'Oh, that is John M'Gregor; he is now missionary in Canada, preaching Christ to others!'"

CONVENTION ON CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK.

As announced in these columns last week, a convention of unusual interest will be held in New York in October next. Many readers of this journal will be anxious to attend it, and as some of them reside at a long distance from this city, they will need early information respecting the arrangements. The following details, for which we are indebted to the kindness of the Rev. A. B. Simpson, will therefore be of service:

The Second Annual Convention for the Promotion of Deeper Spiritual Life, Divine Healing and Christian Evangelization, will be held in the Twenty-third Street Gospel Tabernacle, for five days, from October 5th to 9th. The time chosen this year is nearly a month later than last year, to secure cooler weather and the return to the city of the many who are absent for the summer. The objects of this convention are:

1. To gather together Christians of common faith and spirit for mutual fellowship and encouragement in life and testimony.
2. To study together the Word of God, and learn to know better His message and testimony to His people, and the testimony He expects from His people for this day and time.
3. To promote a deeper spiritual life among Christians, and help all who are seeking such a life to enter into complete union with Jesus as their life, sanctification and victory over the world, self and sin.
4. To seek to understand better the teaching of the Scriptures respecting our physical life in Christ, and confer regarding His Word and His mighty working respecting divine healing, and to enable those who will to receive Him as their Healer.
5. To hear reports of the progress of God's work, and promote the work of evangelization at home and missions abroad, and take measures to strengthen the hands of Christian brethren of common faith and spirit in this and other lands.

6. To wait upon the Lord for a special baptism of the Holy Ghost for life and service.

7. To look forward with fresh hope, and encourage each other's hearts in the prospect of the glorious appearing of the Lord.

Among those expected from abroad, one of the most prominent names is that of Mrs. Baxter, of Bethshan, England, whose writings in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and elsewhere have made her already widely known in this country. Mrs. Baxter has been for nearly twenty years one of the most widely useful of female Christian teachers and workers in England. She is remarkably gifted as a teacher of the Word of God, and her manner and address are marked by a most winning modesty, unction and power.

Mrs. Stroud Smith, of Liverpool, who has already visited this country and spoken in various cities with much acceptance, will be present. Both of these workers will probably remain some months in America. Many other workers and public teachers of God's Word from this land, both men and women, are expected. Three sessions will be held each day, the morning for teaching, the afternoon for testimony, and the evening for addresses and inquiry meetings. The arrangements are under the direction of Rev. A. B. Simpson, pastor of the Tabernacle, and a committee of conference and correspondence from various parts of the country. Arrangements will be made as far as possible for reasonable board for all who apply in time to him.

Any persons desiring to secure the services of Mrs. Baxter or Mrs. Smith after the convention had better also communicate with Mr. Simpson. It is expected that the convention in New York will be followed by other conferences in other cities and centres of Christian life and work.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Effort is Being Made to Force Silver Dollars into circulation. Last week, United States Treasurer, Conrad N. Jordan, sent an order to the Treasury in New York, directing the Assistant-Treasurer to send to Washington all the one and two-dollar bills in his keeping. Accordingly, about $100,000 in bills of those denominations were forwarded. It is understood to be Mr. Jordan's policy to force silver upon the country by withholding from circulation all of the small bills that come into the possession of the United States Treasury. The New York banks have repeatedly represented to the Treasury authorities that the people did not want the standard silver dollars, and would not take them if they could possibly avoid it. It is not likely that the scarcity of one and two dollar bills will be immediately felt in New York, as many of the banks have taken the precaution, during the past year, to accumulate as much of that kind of currency as they could. Nevertheless, there will be a scarcity before December when Congressional action may be expected. The man who tries to force the people to do what they do not wish to do will earn for himself and his superiors in office a rather dangerous unpopularity. Mr. Manning is doubtless aware of that fact, and of the insurmountable aversion the people have to the big, heavy coins.

The Ohio State Democratic Convention, on Thursday, nominated Governor Hoadly for a second term, by acclamation. The only dissentients appear to have been the delegates from Hamilton County. Thus the leaders in the approaching struggle will be the same men who have already contended for the prize. It is, however, by no means certain that the issue will be the same. Governor Hoadly has lost considerable popularity during his term as every Governor does through disappointing office-seekers, and he has, besides, made some serious blunders, of which he will doubtless be reminded during the campaign. On the other hand, Judge Foraker, the Republican candidate, has lost a large part of the colored vote, if not the whole of it, and will also be a more serious sufferer than Governor Hoadly by the growth of the Prohibition party. The indications are that Dr. Leonard, the Prohibition candidate for Governor, will poll a larger vote than Schumacker did in 1883. In that year 8363 Prohibition votes were cast, while in the Presidential election last year, St. John received 11,069 votes in Ohio. Most of these votes, probably, came from the Republican party. The platform adopted by the Convention on Thursday indorses the President's policy, is silent or vague on other national issues, but is outspoken on the liquor question. It pledges the party to work for the submission of a Constitutional Amendment establishing a license system. Governor Hoadly also in his speech, accepting the nomination, denounced Prohibition in strong terms. The Prohibitionists of the State know precisely how he and his party stand on that question.

One Million Dollars is the Sum Fixed Upon as the cost of the memorial to be erected over the remains of General Grant. The Monument Committee at its meeting on Thursday last discussed various plans for raising that amount, and deputed members to wait on the various trades and solicit subscriptions. Up to that date only $50,000 had been received. Ex-Governor Cornell in his explanation of the situation, said: "We have already accomplished a great deal. Every national bank in the country is an office for the collection of contributions to the fund. Every office of the Western Union Telegraph Company is also at our service. We are placing ourselves in communication with responsible persons in every State in the Union and the principal cities." He expressed his confidence in the certainty of the required amount being raised.

Another Evidence of the Disappearance of sectional feeling in the South is afforded by the platform of the Mississippi Democratic Convention. The planks declare "fidelity to the Constitution of the United States," and demand the "protection of equal rights for all classes," and "no discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude or birthplace." There is scarcely anything in the platform suggestive, even, of party differences, and the co-operation of all citizens is invited, "without regard to past differences." The spirit of progress is indicated in the pledge for the maintenance of free schools, the encouragement of immigration, and the demand for a "prompt, vigorous, and impartial administration of the criminal laws."

A Public Demonstration Evoked by the Exposures of the Pall Mall Gazette caused intense excitement in London on Saturday. A procession marched through the streets to Hyde Park, where a mass-meeting was held. The procession was an hour and a half passing a given point. Twenty heavily draped four-horse wagons were filled with women dressed in the deepest mourning, and in one wagon were twenty-four girls, all under thirteen years of age, dressed in white and bearing a banner inscribed, "Shall the Innocents be Slain?" An enlarged facsimile of Queen Victoria's letter to Mrs. Booth approving the Salvation Army's work in rescuing young girls occupied a wagon by itself in the centre of the procession. All the wide routes occupied by the detachments of the procession, which started from ten points, were blocked for nearly an hour. The crowds which lined the streets showed an extraordinary sympathy with the participants in the demonstration, all of whom seemed to have both heart and soul in the business in hand. As the procession moved a "purity anthem" was distributed. In the park fully one hundred and fifty thousand people listened to speeches delivered from the twelve platforms which had been erected for the accommodation of the speakers. One of these platforms was for the exclusive use of ladies, whose declamations against man's immorality and appeals for aid in preventing the fall of their younger sisters were loudly applauded by the surrounding throng. The resolutions pledging the meeting to assist in executing the criminal law amendment were put simultaneously from all the platforms at the sound of the bugle, and were carried amid the wildest enthusiasm. The Pall Mall Gazette had recently aroused public opinion to a point which would render any further operations of the v. scoundrels in high places a perilous business.

A Fatal Scourge is Ravaging More Early last week it was noticed that the reports showed an unusual number of deaths from small-pox, and before the end of the the number had increased with such rapidity to produce general alarm. In five days hundred and thirteen new cases and thirty deaths were reported. On August 20, Mayor issued an order forbidding Barnum to enter the city, as the small-pox outbreak with increased fury after every large gathering of people. The theatres have been closed to open until further notice. At a meeting of the Finance Committee it was decided to disinfectants in the watering-carts used on the streets. The Provincial Government was petitioned for the use of the Exhibition buildings for a small-pox hospital. The manufacturers have petitioned the City Council to prohibit public meetings and everything that tend to draw crowds together while the small-pox epidemic lasts. The merchants say that the orders are being cancelled, and that commercial travellers can do no business outside the city. Many poor people are in great distress bread-winner of the family being obliged to stay at home to nurse his children. To help the Mayor had devoted the balance of the unexpended reception fund to a relief fund, and the Council will be asked to vote a sum of money for the same purpose.

The Emancipation of the Slaves in Brazil a prospect which appears likely to be realized in the near future without ill-feeling or resentment on the part of the owners. The Chamber of Deputies is engaged in discussing the details of the scheme with a practical good sense and augurs success. The king has already emancipated all Government slaves, so the question now only concerns those held by private owners. The bill now under debate, proposes the immediate liberation of all slaves over sixty years of age. It is believed that this provision alone will free more than one hundred thousand slaves freedmen. But since to many worn out in old age self-support might be anything but a blessing it is provided that the masters must take care of the sick and infirm among them, and provide for the labor of those still able to work. A new registration is to be made of all slaves under sixty years, with an exact valuation of them, according to ages. It is provided that certain payments from the emancipation fund shall be made by preference for the liberation of the slaves of those planters who will free their slaves after five years' service, on receiving right half the valuation of them as compensation. Another clause which has done much to satisfy the planters, is the one that imports labor for plantations at the Government's expense. Thus it is probable that the plan will so far accept the plan for five years' service and half compensation that the years 1890 and 1891, should the present bill be passed, witness almost universal emancipation.

A Difficulty has Arisen Between Spain and Germany. The latter Power has seized the Caroline Islands, which are in the Pacific Ocean on the east of the Philippines, over which Spain claims sovereignty, but which have not been occupied by her. Public feeling in Spain is aroused to a dangerous pitch, and the press is demanding that diplomatic relations with Germany shall cease. Fears are entertained that the hostile demonstration will be made against the German Embassy, and, in consequence, a body of policemen has been detailed to guard that building. Count Von Solms-Sonnenwalde, the German Ambassador, now abstains from attending theatres, and avoids the public promenades and places of amusement. It is semi-officially stated that the Government intends to rupture commercial and diplomatic relations existing between Spain and Germany unless Germany abandons her claim to the Carolines.

The American Medical Foreign Missionary Society is a new association, organized to educate worthy young men in the profession of medicine who are willing to devote their time to mission work. It is the intention of the projectors of the society to establish sub-agencies in different parts of the United States. The society will depend altogether on voluntary contributions. Dr. H. M. Scudder, pastor of Plymouth Church, of Chicago, is the secretary.

The Year Book of the Young Men's Christian Associations for 1885, together with the official report of the Twenty-sixth International Convention of these Associations, held at Atlanta last May, making in all a pamphlet of three hundred pages, has just been published by the International Committee, at Twenty-third Street and Fourth Avenue, New York. The proceedings of the Convention, including the practical and valuable addresses and papers by experienced men upon topics of interest connected with the work of these societies, are given in full. The Year Book contains very complete reports from the nine hundred American Associations, and lists and reports of the two thousand Associations in Europe and other parts of the old world. The reports show that eighty-two American Associations own the buildings they occupy, which are valued at over three and a half millions of dollars. This, with the other real estate, building funds, furniture, etc., makes the total net property $4,353,090. A comparison of the summaries for several years past shows a gratifying and steady increase in the work done in these Associations by young men for young men.

The Advice of a Prominent Clergyman on the Prohibition question was given at Chataqua, on August 14th, and is likely to have some influence with Methodists in the approaching elections. Dr. J. M. Buckley, speaking on the question, "Is a Christian man under obligation to identify himself with the Prohibition party?" said: "No man is under obligation to identify himself with either party, unless he thinks the cause is to be advanced by one of them, and then he is. A man is not obliged to support any particular party. Do not allow any man to use your church relation to tell you how to vote. Vote according to your judgment as honest men. The man who undertakes to use your church relations to compel you to vote according to his views has the spirit of Rome. You stand or fall to your own conscience. Vote to promote Prohibition according to your honest opinion of the best way to do it, regardless of the opinions of others."

Dr. Judson's Missionary Tour in Africa is abandoned. The Examiner states that "Messrs. Judson and Loughbridge, having learned from persons well acquainted with the Congo country that it would require from six months to a year to make the tour of inspection required by their appointment, have advised that the expedition be abandoned. Their stay in England has afforded very exceptional means of information, and they have industriously improved their opportunities. Besides the missionaries of the Livingstone Island Mission, they have seen Messrs. Comber and Bentley, two veteran members of the English Baptist Mission, and had long and very full interviews with them in reference to the country as a missionary field. Mr. Stanley is also in London, and they had arranged to see him. Dr. Judson was under a positive pledge to return to his people (the Berean Baptist Church) by Christmas, so that the most he would be able to do would be to make a fruitless voyage to the mouth of the Congo and return. It is expected, therefore, after they have seen Dr. Sims, who returns to England from the Upper Congo early this month, and obtained all the information they can from him, that they will return to this country."

A New System of Electric Lighting was Described to a Convention of the National Electric Light Association at its meeting in New York on August 19th. Mr. W. W. Leggett, of Detroit, Mich., said that his Electric Light Company having secured the contract for lighting that city, found that even if they put an arc at every street corner, the rear yards and alleys where light was most needed, would be left in darkness. The company, therefore, built ninety skeleton towers, some of which were nearly two hundred feet high, and placed them in triangles all over the city. In the central district, where the houses were high and there was more shade, the towers were placed comparatively near together, while in the outskirts they were farther apart. Each tower supports four lights of two-thousand candle power. The result is that the entire city was lighted as if by an artificial moon, and the rear yards and alleys were made as light as the street. That is a particularly gratifying feature of the system. The poorer classes of the people who live there, though needing the light as badly as the rich, are usually forgotten in such arrangements. Happily for them in the far more important matter of spiritual light, no such partiality is manifested. The true Light lightens every man that comes into the world (John 1:9).

A Bible is Wanted by the Claimants to a large fortune in Cleveland, Ohio. They inserted an advertisement in the Ohio journals last week offering a large reward for the recovery of a Bible on the fly-leaf of which is a family record. It originally belonged to George Seechman, who came to America from Switzerland during the latter part of the seventeenth century. He bought land about the Blue Mountain, fifteen miles from Cleveland. He died in 1806. A gap in the line of descent can be filled only from the record in his Bible, which is now necessary to establish the family claim to a fortune amounting to some $20,000,000. After the death of George Seechman the Bible passed into the hands of Frederick Mayer, a near relative, who moved to Benz Valley, near Williamsport, many years ago. Mayer is also dead, and the Seechmans are now advertising with a view of tracing up the precious Book. It may be hoped that they will recover it, and that the fly-leaf will not be the only part they will read. Large as is the fortune which the record on that page may enable them to acquire, it is worth less than nothing in comparison with the possession which the Book itself tells them the way to secure (Ps. 19: 8-10).

A Perilous Playground was Chosen by a child in New York on August 21st. About six o'clock in the evening a little bare-headed girl about six years old was seen on the roof of the lofty building at the corner of Broadway and Chambers Street. She ran up and down the edges of the roof apparently unconscious of danger. Once she stumbled while on the edge of the Broadway side, but quickly recovering her balance ran to the extreme corner of the building and leaned so far over that the great crowd below, whose members had been yelling and motioning for her to go back, turned their heads or closed their eyes, so certain were they that she would lose her balance and fall into the street. Several gentlemen went into the building, but could find only an eight-year-old sister of the child on the roof. The sister ran upstairs, and, without showing herself on the roof, called from the trap-door for the other to come to her. The infant obeyed the call, and the trap-door was shut and locked. The little one whose antics produced such a sensation in the crowded streets said that she had run about and leaned over "because a big lot of people looked at me." The child is not the first by many thousands who has been led into a perilous position by the delight of being the subject of public interest (Prov. 29: 25).

Is a Physician Justified in Shortening the life of a patient? is a serious question which has arisen out of the published reports of General Grant's illness. It will be remembered that the General feared that he would die in terrible agony, and that the physicians promised him that he should not suffer. There was no need for them to do for their patient what their promise implied, but the question is being discussed in medical journals, whether, if there had been need, they would have been justified in administering the narcotics which would have ended the struggle painlessly. Dr. Amick, in his article in the current number of the Cincinnati Medical Journal, states the question clearly. He says: "Some approach death with a calm countenance and a serene mind, others are racked with pain and suffering. For hours, and even days, they writhe and groan between life and death. It is in this class of cases in which it is proposed to give the hopeless sufferer respite from his agony. An injection of morphia in such cases would result in general and lasting sleep, and as the irritation that existed in the body became lessened, the mind would gradually relax its hold upon the system, and its departure would be so easy and quiet that a spectator would scarcely recognize it was going until it was gone." Whatever the decision of the physicians may be as to their duty in the circumstances, their right to shorten life will not be conceded by the public without reluctance. The Christian sufferer especially will prefer to wait his heavenly Father's will, no matter how much agony the waiting may entail (Job 14: 14).

A Tax on Bachelors will be Imposed in Georgia, if a bill becomes law which has been introduced in the Legislature of that State by Mr. Connell, of Decatur County. The bill, which is entitled "An act to prohibit the evil of too many old bachelors in the State of Georgia, and for other purposes," provides that every unmarried man of thirty years old and upward, shall pay a tax of $2.50 annually, so long as he remains single, the money to be appropriated to the school fund of the county in which he resides, toward paying for the tuition of children who have no fathers. It was at first supposed in this section that the proposal was intended as a joke, but the Times of Savannah, Ga., says that Mr. Connell is in dead earnest, and, if this bill fails, will press for legislation on the same line until he succeeds. It does not appear what is the principle on which the legislator bases his proposal, but it is probable that, loving his State and desiring its growth in population, wealth, and influence, he is impatient at seeing any of its citizens living lives of unproductive ease, avoiding the toil and trouble incident to marrying and rearing families. A similar feeling often disturbs the earnest Christian worker as he sees so many of his brethren inactive, who, if they were zealous in the cause of Christ, might become the spiritual fathers of many souls (1 Cor. 4: 15).

An Opportunity to Gain Nine Dollars was rejected by ten men consecutively at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, recently. A contemporary states that during a conversation between the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior, while the Cabinet was in this city two weeks ago, Mr. Whitney advanced the theory that, though some men were easily deceived, the majority were over-cautious. As a test it was decided that a young friend of the Secretary should offer to give a ten-dollar bill for one dollar to any one in the corridor. Mr. Whitney produced a new bill and sent his friend on his commission. General Sickles was the first guest he met. "I beg your pardon, sir," he remarked politely to the general, "but will you please give me one dollar for this ten?" and he held the note so close to Sickles's eyes that its genuineness ought to have been visible. A half-sarcastic, half-angry grin came over the general's face, but he deigned no reply, and contemptuously turned away. The proffer was soberly made to nine other men, none being a witness of the others' refusal, and every time with the same result. Nobody would buy ten dollars with one dollar, and the endangered note returned safely to Mr. Whitney's pocket. Unhappily, in an infinitely more important matter there is, as every Christian worker knows, the same doubt manifested about an offer absolutely free. Almost every anxious sinner thinks salvation must be purchased by good works or merit of some kind (Eph. 2: 8, 9).

THE CONSCRIPT CROSS-BEARER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear his cross."—MARK 15: 21.

Jesus Carrying the Cross—The Fact Narrated by John alone—Its Importance—Partakers in the Burden—I. Unexpected Persons Called—Simon an Unknown Man—A Stranger from the Country—A Lady at an Evening Party—Simon a mere Passer-by—Enlisted for Life—II. How the Cross may be Carried—By Becoming a Christian—In Commencing Christian Work—In Denouncing Popular Sin—In Home Life—III. Noble Compulsion—IV. A Blessed Occupation—How to See Jesus most.

JOHN tells us that our Saviour went forth bearing His cross (John 19: 17). We are much indebted to John for inserting that fact. The other evangelists mention Simon the Cyrenian as bearing the cross of Christ; but John, who often fills up gaps which are left by the other three, tells us that Jesus set out to Calvary carrying His own cross. Our Lord Jesus came out from Pilate's palace laden with His cross, but he was so extremely emaciated and so greatly worn by the night of the bloody sweat, that the procession moved too slowly for the rough soldiers, and therefore they took the cross from their prisoner and laid it upon Simon; or possibly they laid the long end upon the shoulder of the strong countryman, while the Saviour still continued to bear in part His cross till He came to the place of doom.

PARTAKERS IN THE BURDEN.

But it was equally instructive that some one else should be made a partaker of the burden; for it has always been part of the divine counsel that for the salvation of men from sin the Lord should be associated with His Church. So far as atonement is concerned, the Lord hath trodden the winneps alone, and of the people there was none with Him; but as far as the conversion of the world is concerned, and its rescue from the power of error and wickedness, Christ is not alone. We are workers together with God. Hence it became important that in the bearing of the cross, though not in the death upon it, there should be yoked with the Christ one who should follow close behind Him. To bear the cross after Jesus is the office of the faithful. Simon the Cyrenian is the representative of the whole Church of God, and of each believer in particular. Often had Jesus said, "Except a man take up His cross daily, and follow Me, he cannot be My disciple;" and now at last He embodies that sermon in an actual person. The lesson to each one of us is to take up our Lord's cross without delay, and go with Him, without the camp, bearing His reproach. That many among this vast and mixed congregation may imitate Simon is the anxious desire of my heart.

I. I will begin with this first remark, that unexpected persons are often CALLED TO CROSS-BEARING.

Like Simon, they are impressed into the service of Christ. Our text says: "They compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear His cross." Simon did not volunteer, but was forced into this work of cross-bearing. It would seem from another evangelist that he speedily yielded to the impressment, and lifted the burden heartily; but at first he was compelled. A rude authority was exercised by the guard; who, being upon the Governor's business acted with high-handed rigor, and forced whomsoever they pleased to do their bidding. By the exercise of such irresponsible power they compelled a passing stranger to carry Christ's cross.

Notice, first, that he was an unknown man. He was spoken of "as one Simon." Simon was a very common name among the Jews, almost as common as John in our own country. This man was just "one Simon"—an individual who need not be further described. But the providence of God had determined that this obscure individual, this certain man, or I might better say, this uncertain man, should be selected to the high office of cross-bearer to the Son of God. I have an impression upon my mind that there is "one Simon" here this morning, who has to bear Christ's cross from this time forward. Friend, nobody knows you save our Father who is in heaven, and He has appointed you to have fellowship with His Son. I shall roughly describe you as "one Simon," and leave the Holy Spirit to bring you into your place and service.

A STRANGER.

It did not seem likely that Simon should bear the cross of Christ, for he was a stranger who had newly come up from the country. He probably knew little or nothing of what had been taking place in Jerusalem, for he had come from another continent. He was "one Simon a Cyrenian;" and I suppose that Cyrene could not have been less than eight hundred miles from Jerusalem. It was situated in what is now called Tripoli, in Northern Africa, in which place a colony of Jews had been formed long before. Very likely he had come in a Roman galley from Alexandria to Joppa, and there had been rowed through the surf, and landed in time to reach Jerusalem for the Passover. He had travelled all those miles, he had hardly yet got the motion of the ship out of his brain, and it had never entered into his head that he should be impressed by the Roman guard, and made to assist at an execution. I cannot tell how many providences had worked together to bring him there at the nick of time, but so the Lord would have it, and so it came about. Ah, my dear friend, I do not know what providences have been at work to bring you here to-day; perhaps very strange ones! If a little something had occurred you had not taken this journey; it only needed a small dust to turn the scale, and you would have been hundreds of miles from this spot, in quite another scene from this. Why you are here you do not yet know, except that you have come to listen to the preacher, and join the throng. But God knoweth why He hath brought you here. I trust it will be read in the annals of the future:

"Thus the eternal mandate ran,
Almighty grace arrest that man."

God has brought you here, that on this spot, by the preaching of the Gospel, you may be compelled to bear the cross of Jesus. I pray it may be so.

Many and many a time with no desire for grace men have listened to the Gospel, and the Lord has been found of them that sought Him not. Men have stepped into places of worship even with evil designs, and yet the purpose of grace has been accomplished; they came to scoff, but they remained to pray. Some have been cast by the providence of God into positions where they have met with Christian men, and a word of admonition has been blessed to them. A lady was one day and there met with Caesar Malan, the famous divine of Geneva, who, in his usual manner, inquired of her whether she was a Christian. She was startled, surprised, and vexed, and made a short reply to the effect that it was not a question she cared to discuss; whereupon, Mr. Malan replied with great sweetness, that he would not persist in speaking of it, but he would pray that she might be led to give her heart to Christ, and become a useful worker for Him. Within a fortnight she met the minister again, and asked him how she must come to Jesus. Mr. Malan's reply was, "Come to Him just as you are." That lady gave herself up to Jesus; it was Charlotte Elliott, to whom we owe that precious hymn—

AT AN EVENING PARTY.

"Just as I am—without one plea
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bid'st me come to Thee—
O Lamb of God, I come."

It was a blessed thing for her that she was at that party, and that the servant of God from

Geneva should have been there, and should have spoken to her so faithfully. Oh for many a repetition of the story "of one Simon a Cyrenian," coming, not with the intent to bear the cross, but with quite another mind, and yet being enlisted in

THE CROSS-BEARING 'ARMY.

I would have you notice, once more, that this man was at this particular time not thinking upon the subject at all, for he was at that time merely passing by. He had come up to Jerusalem, and whatever occupied his mind he does not appear to have taken any notice of the trial of Jesus, or of the sad end of it. It is expressly said that he "passed by." He was not even sufficiently interested in the matter to stand in the crowd and look at the mournful procession. Women were weeping there right bitterly—the daughters of Jerusalem to whom the Master said, "Weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves and for your children;" but this man passed by. He was quietly making his way through the crowd, eager to go about his business, and he must have been greatly surprised and distressed when a rough hand was laid upon him, and a stern voice said: "Shoulder that cross." There was no resisting a Roman centurion when he gave command, and so the countryman meekly submitted, wishing, no doubt, that he were back in Cyrene tilling the ground. He must needs stoop his shoulder and take up a new burden, and tread in the footsteps of the mysterious personage to whom the cross belonged.

A TRUE CROSS-BEARER.

He was only passing by, and yet he was enlisted and impressed by the Romans, and, as I take it, impressed by the grace of God for life; for whereas Mark says he was the father of Alexander and Rufus, it would seem that his sons were well known to the Christian people to whom Mark was writing. If his son was the same Rufus that Paul mentions, then he calls her "his mother and mine;" and it would seem that Simon's wife and his sons became believers and partakers of the sufferings of Christ. His contact with the Lord in that strange compulsory way probably wrought out for him another and more spiritual contact which made him a true cross-bearer. O ye that pass by this day, draw nigh to Jesus! Though you only intended to slip into this tabernacle and slip out again, I pray that you may be arrested by a call from my Lord. I speak as my Lord's servant, and I would constrain you to come to Him. I would compel you, by my Lord's authority, to take up His cross and bear it after Him. It would be strange, say you. Ay, so it might be, but it would be a glorious event. May that divine impressment which is imaged in the text by the compulsion of the Roman soldier take place in your case at this very moment; and may it be seen in your instance that unexpected persons are often called to be cross-bearers!

II. My second observation is—cross-bearing can still be practised. Very briefly let me tell you in what ways

THE CROSS CAN STILL BE CARRIED.

First, and chiefly, by your becoming a Christian. If the cross shall take you up, you will take up the cross. Christ will be your hope. His death your trust, Himself the object of your love. You never become a cross-bearer truly till you lay your burdens down at His feet who bore the cross and curse for you. Next, you become a cross-bearer when you make an open avowal of the Lord Jesus Christ. Do not deceive yourselves—this is expected of each one of you if you are to be saved. Many people would like to go to heaven by an underground railway; secrecy suits them. They do not want to cross the channel; the sea is too rough; but when there is a tunnel made they will go to the fair country. My good people, you are cowardly, and I must quote to you a text which ought to sting your cowardice out of you: "But the fearful and unbelieving shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." I say no more, and make no personal applications; but, I beseech you, run no risks.

Be afraid to be afraid. Be ashamed of being ashamed of Christ. Do you not even now cry out, "Set down my name, sir?"

Further, some have to take up their cross by commencing Christian work. You live in a village where there is no Gospel preaching; preach yourself. You are in a backwoods town where the preaching is very far from being such as God approves of; begin to preach the truth yourself. "Alas!" say you, "I should make a fool of myself." Are you ashamed to be a fool for Christ? "Oh, but I should break down." Break down; it will do you good, and perhaps you may break somebody else down. There is no better preaching in the world than that of a man who breaks down under a sense of unworthiness; if that breakdown communicates itself to other people, it may begin a revival. Come, Simon, I see you shrink; but the cross has to be carried; therefore bow your back. It is only a wooden cross, after all, and not an iron one. You can bear it; you must bear it. God help you.

SOILED KID GLOVES.

Perhaps, too, some brother may have to take up his cross by bearing witness against the rampant sin which surrounds him. "Leave all those dirty matters alone; do not say a word about them. Let the people go to the devil, or else you will soil your white kid gloves." Sirs, we will spoil our hands as well as our gloves, and we will risk our characters, if need be; but we will put down the devil which now defiles London. Truly the flesh does shrink, and the purest part of our manhood shrinks with it, when we are compelled to bear open protest against sins which are done of men in secret. But, Simon, the Master may yet compel you to bear His cross in this respect, and if so, He will give you both courage and wisdom, and your labor shall not be in vain in the Lord.

Sometimes, however, the cross-bearing is of another and more quiet kind, and may be described as submission to providence. A young friend is saying, "For me to live at home I know to be my duty; but father is unkind, and the family generally impose upon me. I wish I could get away." Ah, dear sister, you must bear Christ's cross, and it may be the Lord would have you remain at home! Therefore bear the cross. A servant is saying, "I should like to be in a Christian family. I do not think I can stop where I am." Perhaps, good sister, the Lord has put you where you are to be a light in a dark place. All the lamps should not be in one street, or what will become of the courts and alleys? It is often the duty of a Christian man to say, "I shall stop where I am and fight this matter through. I mean by character and example, with kindness and courtesy and love, to win this place for Jesus."

EVADING THE CROSS.

Of course the easy way is to turn monk and live quietly in a cloister, and serve God by doing nothing; or to turn nun and dwell in a convent, and expect to win the battle of life by running out of it. Is not this absurd? If you shut yourself away from this poor world, what is to become of it? You men and women that are Christians must stand up and stand out for Jesus where the providence of God has cast you; if your calling is not a sinful one, and if the temptations around you are not too great for you, you must "hold the fort" and never dream of surrender. If your lot is hard, look upon it as Christ's cross, and bow your back to the load. Your shoulder may be raw at first, but you will grow stronger before long, for as your day your strength shall be. Now, Simon, where are you? Should the cross, man, in the name of God!

III. Thirdly, to cross-bearing there are

NOBLE COMPULSIONS.

Simon's compulsion was the rough hand of the Roman legionary, and the gruff voice in the Latin tongue, "Shoulder that cross;" but we hear gentler voices which compel us this day to take up Christ's cross. The first compulsion is this—the love of Christ constraineth us." He has done all this for you; therefore by sweet but irresistible compulsion you are made to render Him some return of love.

Some of you should bear the cross of Christ because the cause of Christ is at a discount where you dwell. I delight in a man in whom the lordly chivalry has found a congenial home. He loves to espouse the cause of truth in the cloudy and dark day. He never counts heads, but weighs arguments. When he settles down in a town he never inquires, "Where is the most respectable congregation? Where shall I meet with those who will advantage me in business?" No, he studies his conscience rather than his convenience. He will go where the Gospel is preached, and nowhere else. Fine architecture has scant charms for him, and grand music is no part of his religion; if these are substitutes for the Gospel, he abhors them. It is meanness itself for a man to forsake the truth for the sake of respectability. Multitudes who ought to be found maintaining the good old cause are recreant to their convictions, if, indeed, they ever had any. For this cause the true man resolves to stick to truth through thick and thin, and not to forsake her because her adherents are poor and despised.

CROSS-BEARERS NEEDED.

If ever we might temporize, that time is past and gone. I arrest yonder man this morning, who has long been a Christian, but has concealed half his Christianity in order to be thought respectable, or to escape the penalties of faithfulness. Come out from those with whom you are numbered, but with whom you are not united in heart. Be brave enough to defend a good cause against all comers; for the day shall come when he shall have honor for his guerdon who accepted dishonor that he might be true to his God, his Bible, and his conscience. Blessed be he that can be loyal to his Lord, cost him what it may—loyal even in those matters which traitors call little things. We would compel that Simon the Cyrenian this day to bear the cross, because there are so few to bear it in these degenerate days. There are many ways, then, of bearing the cross for Christ, and there are many reasons why some here present should begin at once to carry the load.

IV. To close: bear with me a minute or two while I say that cross-bearing is

A BLESSED OCCUPATION.

I feel sure that Simon found it so. Let me mention certain blessings which must have attended the special service of Simon. First, it brought him into Christ's company. When they compelled him to bear His cross, he was brought close to Jesus. If it had not been for that compulsion he might have gone his way, or might have been lost in the crowd; but now he is in the inner circle, near to Jesus. He had never seen that countenance so well, nor marked the whole form of the Son of man so clearly if he had not been called to bear that cross. It is wonderful how much we see of Jesus when we suffer or labor for Him. Believing souls, I pray that this day you may be so impressed into my Lord's service, that you may have nearer and dearer fellowship with Him than in the past. If any man will do His will He shall know of the doctrine. They see Jesus best who carry His cross most.

Then Simon had this honor, that he was linked with Christ's work. He could not put away sin, but he could assist weakness. Simon did not die on the cross to make expiation, but he did live under the cross to aid in the accomplishment of the divine purpose. You and I cannot interfere with Jesus in His passion, but we can share with Him in His compassion; we cannot purchase liberty for the enslaved, but we can tell them of their emancipation. To have a finger in Christ's work is glory. I invite the man that seeks honor and immortality, to seek it thus.

While Simon was carrying the cross through the crowd, I doubt not that the rough soldiery would deal him many a kick or buffet; but I feel equally sure that the dear Master sometimes stole a glance at him. Rufus and Alexander had a patent of nobility in being the sons of such a man. Mark recorded the fact that Simon carried the cross, and that such and such persons were his sons. Methinks when the old man came to lie upon his death-bed, he said: "My hope is in Him whose cross I carried. Blessed burden! Lay me down in my grave. This body of mine cannot perish, for it bore the cross which Jesus carried, and which carried Him. I shall rise again to see Him in His glory, for His cross has pressed me, and His love will surely raise me." Happy are we if we can while yet we live be co-workers together with Him, that when He cometh in His kingdom we may be partakers of His glory. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him." God bless you, and especially you who have come out of the country. God bless you. Amen and amen.

NEW BOOKS.

An elegantly-bound book containing two hundred and twenty-seven illustrations has been prepared by the chief of temperance orators, John B. Gough, entitled or, Leaves from my Note-book of Forty Years." It is appropriately opened by a sketch of Mr. Gough's life and work, by the Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D., who at the request of the publishers, and without Mr. Gough's supervision, prepared the sketch from his own knowledge, and a collection of newspaper cuttings and other records. Mr. Gough's own account of his reasons for publishing, after so many years, is in part as follows: "On several occasions, to oblige English friends I authorized the publication, and corrected the proofs of notes taken during some of my public utterances. With these exceptions, for more than thirty years my words have been reported, printed and sold with no regard to my wishes, without proper revision, and often with annoying and absurd mistakes. I have come to the conclusion that I have some personal right to their oversight, and also to the time and manner of their appearance. In addition, every year for a long time past requests from various quarters have been made for authorized copies of this or that public utterance."

Thus encouraged, for reasons before stated I offer this quiver of unpolished arrows in the hope that they may accomplish more in right and desirable directions than they could in any previous fragmentary appearance; only adding that though there must of necessity be repetition in the arguments, there is no repetition in the facts or incidents."

Though Mr. Gough calls his collection unpolished arrows, there is a good deal of point to them. This was to be expected from the man. Every one who has listened to him knows that anecdotes pour from his lips in a stream apparently inexhaustible. They are no idle tales told to amuse the audience, but every one has its moral and is intended to teach its lesson. Mr. Gough has been an industrious collector of anecdotes, and his long experience and extensive travels have been an original quarry which he has worked with remarkable skill and care. The result is this bulky volume, full of personal incidents and stories which have been related to him, and stored up for purposes of illustration. Mr. Gough tells a story with inimitable dramatic power, so that the incidents which his readers may have heard before, or seen badly reported in some newspaper, become fresh and original by the master's touch. His book is brimful of them, and every one is bright, humorous, or pathetic. One or two of these will serve as specimens of hundreds, and will probably produce an appetite for the whole generous bill of fare.

A STRUGGLE IN THE DARK.
[p. 431]. "Two students who occupied separate beds in one room came home very drunk one night, and groped their way to bed the best they could; but it so happened they both tumbled into one bed. 'How d'ye get on, Bill?' cried one, after a time. 'Why, there's another fellow in my bed. How are you getting along?' 'I've got a fellow in my bed, too.' 'Oh, then we'd better kick 'em both out!' And at it they went, when by-and-by one of them was launched into the middle of the floor. 'Well, Bill, how have you managed?' 'Why, I've kicked my man out. What have you done with yours?' 'Oh!' said he, 'my man has kicked me out!'"

A LOVER IN THE PIG-STY.
"I heard of one of those young men who would not sign away his liberty, who was paying particular attentions to a young lady. Occasionally he would call to see her when he was partially intoxicated; but when so far gone that he dared not ask for the young lady, he would content himself with the company of his prospective father-in-law, who was a moderate drinker, and was therefore a little short-sighted in reference to the habit. On one of these occasions the old gentleman told him there were a lot of sheep, some horses and some fine pigs that would be given to him, adding: 'I should like you to look at the pigs.' Arrived at the pen, the young man stooped to look into it, lost his balance, and over he went. The hogs resented the intrusion of a drunkard by loud grunts of dissatisfaction. The young man didn't like that, and raising himself as well as he could, he said: 'I'm as good as any of you.'"

HOW TO PASS A SALOON.
"A gentleman was so far enslaved that he was known to take a quart of brandy in a day. How he stood it no one knew. He was a fine business man, and yet, in the estimation of those who knew him well, he was ruining himself. One day, when in the house, he said: 'Wife, come and sit on my knee.' She sat there, and then she said: 'If my husband did not drink I should be the happiest woman in the world.' 'Well, my dear,' he replied, 'I married you to make you happy, and I ought to do so; and if that will make you happy I will never drink another drop as long as I live.' Now, that man cut it off 'as square as a piece of cheese,' no splinters, no splinters, and kept his word for years without any practical belief in Christianity. Walking down the street with him a little while ago, he said: 'Do you see that red-fronted drinking-saloon? Well, I have been for many years afraid to pass the door of that house, so I used to turn down another street and go around it; but, Mr. Gough, since I have had the grace of God in my heart, I go right by that saloon; and if I have the slightest desire for drink I breathe a prayer, "God keep me for Christ's sake," and I go by it safely.' Now, when a man abstains from drink, and endeavors to control an appetite in his own strength, he does it at daily risk; but when he puts forth all the energy God has given him, and trusts God for the result, he is safe, absolutely safe."

There must be five hundred such anecdotes as these in the book, and they are set in the pungent comments and forcible arguments Mr. Gough knows so well how to use. It is the best repertory of anecdote and illustration a temperance worker can have, and preachers will find in it many things that will be useful to them. Pp. 639; sold by subscription only. *A. D. TWO REJECTED INVITATIONS.

"I HOPE you will come to our Mission Services this week, Mrs. Brown"—the voice was the pleading voice of Miss Start, a lady who had often made the same request without avail.

"Thank you, miss," was the abrupt reply. "I make no promises, then I shan't break any." "But, Mrs. Brown, do just for once promise," and was it Mrs. Brown's fancy? but that good woman thought Miss Start's eyes suddenly filled with tears.

"Well, miss," she said, speaking a little confidentially, "it's all very well for hypocrites and deceivers to pretend to make much of religion—they only do it for what they can get by it. I'm not one of that sort myself."

Mrs. Brown paused, and getting no reply from the lady, went on again: "My brother died last week. He had led a hard life; always unruly from a boy; always drinking, swearing, fighting, ah! he had a life of it. Well, he was taken ill about a fortnight ago; and says he to his wife, 'Polly, lass, fetch the parson; I feel ve queer, and if it means death, I should not lil to die without a bit of religion.' The clergyman of the parish church came round that night, as read by Joe, and said a prayer; and next day Joe was worse, and he came again. That night Joe died. He went off as quiet as a lamb; I religion the parson gave him comforted him and put him all right. Now, that's what I say, if man like our Joe can live as he liked, and whe he's taken ill can send for the parson and mak things right, why shouldn't other people? don't mean to trouble myself about serio things until the right time comes!"

She was turning to go into her house as anxious to dismiss her visitor—this conversatio had taken place on the doorstep—when Miss Start said pleadingly, "Do listen a momen please, Mrs. Brown. If only you went to churc sometimes, instead of always staying away, yo would hear that religion is not a hard thing, t be put off as long as possible, but a good thin that is a comfort in life, and makes one happi all the time, as well as to die happily. Oh! yo cannot think—" Mrs. Brown was roused. Sh forgot her usually respectful manner when talk ing with a visitor, and spoke out as she migh have done to a neighbor.

"I tell you I'm very well just as I am; m life's happy enough, and it is honest and out spoken, and that's what a great many religio folks couldn't say for theirs!" and with an indignant toss of her head Mrs. Brown entere her house and closed the door.

The mission was very successful. Many weary heart—and there were many such in the locality—found rest in accepting the invitation of the Gospel, and among them was a neighb of Mrs. Brown. This woman one evening had some talk with her procrastinating neighbor Mrs. Brown herself had led the way to it by remarking that the other seemed to be "a good deal cheerfuller lately," and humorously in quired if she had found a three-cent piece. He neighbor told Mrs. Brown what she had found and speaking out of a full heart was so eloque about the happiness that had come to her since she "got religion" that Mrs. Brown guesse she'd go to meeting for once, and agreed to be dy that night if her friend could call for her. The friend sired nothing better, and it is so arranged.

As it turned out, that was the chance Mrs. Brown would ever have of hearing the Gospel. It was very near to her, but that she had no premonition. She had known, nothing would have prevented her going to the meeting, but as it was, several little annoyances "put her out," and she did not feel like going. Any time would do, so she put off for some other night, and when her friend called for her she found her at work as usual, with her mind fully made up not to go, and in no mood to be persuaded. Resolving to call for her every night until she did go, the friend went on to meeting, and, while there, silently offered a prayer for her neighbor.

But she never called again. Early the next morning she noticed a crowd collecting around Mrs. Brown's door, and, going to ascertain the cause, learned that Mrs. Brown was dead—had been found dead in her bedroom about an hour before. Her niece, who lived with her, and it was her habit, as she worked in a factory, to rise before her aunt and awake her just as she was going to work. She went to her bedroom as usual, but Mrs. Brown could never be awakened in this world; she was lying there undressed across the bed. She must have died the night before while she was undressing, and so suddenly that she had no time to arouse her niece to call for help. The doctor who gave evidence in the inquest said she had heart disease, and she must have had it for a long time, though without being aware of the fact.

Who among us can tell, when we say "another time will do," whether we may not be neglecting the last opportunity we shall ever have of becoming reconciled with God? To every one the last opportunity does come, but it is seldom that there is anything about it to indicate its indescribable importance. Happy are they who seize the first opportunity and let no moment pass until they have attended to the most vital of all concerns.

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Doctor's Home.

It is a common idea that the element of romance cannot be found in the lives of ordinary people. Soldiers and sailors, and explorers, and wealthy lords and ladies may lead romantic lives, but the physician, the lawyer, the clergyman, and the ordinary business man live humdrum lives, dull and uninteresting to the last degree. Yet keen observers and observers who are not particularly acute, yet have a gentle, affectionate nature which invites confidence, are aware that some of those dull people are heroes possessing courage and endurance of the finest order. It is surprising the difference there is in this respect in men. I have seen people enter a yard in which a big, powerful dog was kept securely chained. Perhaps in a whole day thirty strangers would pass through that yard, each of whom the dog would salute with a growl. By and by another person, equally unknown would enter, sometimes a man, sometimes a woman, but more likely to be a man than a woman, and that same Nero would look at with a friendly gleam in his eye, and sometimes would even leave his kennel to salute with a wag of his tail. There are some people whom men and women, and even beasts instinctively recognize as friends; the kindness and love in their hearts seem to pervade their presence, and they make friends everywhere. Utter strangers tell them their secrets, and lay bare their hearts before them. They are few in number, but God seems to have sent them into the world to bear other people's burdens, and to shed light into dark souls. It is those few who know that heroism is more common than the world thinks.

This introduction is necessary to my story, because it has to do with ordinary people, and with lives that some readers may consider commonplace. I have no murders, no wild hair-breadth escapes to describe, no misanthropic hero or heroine for readers to sympathize with. Tragedies enough there are in the world, and your neighbor's heart may be breaking under one, and yet he may go about his business with a genial manner and an unclouded brow, and you may never suspect it. The dark-haired, black-eyed hero of romance who calls heaven and earth to witness the gloom of his lot, and airs his sufferings through pages of type, is not to my mind half so grand a hero as he who suffers silently and fills his place in the world gallantly as if no fox were gnawing under his cloak.

Your physician listens attentively as you detail with minuteness your little aches and pains; he takes your wrist in his firm, gentle grasp, and counts the beats of your pulse with accuracy. He sits down and writes a prescription, as if the world held for him not another object in life so important as your restoration to health. He comes again in a day or two, and you find that he remembers all your symptoms and the medicine he prescribed. That man's mind, you think, must be lightly burdened or he could not so enter into your case and make it his study. Yet see that man at home. Watch him when the labors of the day are over. See him sit at his lonely hearth and open a miniature, and look at it lovingly, with tear-dimmed eyes. Or see him in the morning scan his mail, and eagerly select one letter from the rest, and read it with his breath held, so intense is his anxiety. Some loved one dearer to him than life may be at a distance in the crisis of disease, and he knows not any minute when a life dearer to him than his own may go out in death. Yet an hour later he may be in a patient's room, listening with unclouded brow to a recital of sufferings, half of which he knows to be imaginary. That man is a hero, bearing his part bravely in the battle of life, though to the outer world his life seems dull and commonplace. Let me introduce you to some such noble characters—men and women. It may be a valuable experience for you. You may learn that it is possible to sustain crushing sorrows, and yet never quit your place in the ranks of workers, and that with a heart bleeding from wounds that can never heal, you may minister to other sufferers—nay, may minister all the more effectively, because you are yourself groaning under a heavier burden. Better still, you may learn that there is no lot so dark, no agony so poignant as to be beyond the reach of God's grace, no pain so deep that He cannot soothe who is "touched by the feeling of our infirmities," having been "made perfect through suffering."

Our first visit shall be to a Christian home. It has been said that adversity is the promise of the New Testament, as prosperity was of the Old; but this home, at least outwardly, seems to be protected against trouble. Peace and love and the fear of God reign there, and in the hearts of young and old there is that faith and joy which the world cannot give or take away. We find it on the eve of a separation. One of the loved ones, a beautiful girl of seventeen, is to set out on the morrow for a holiday-trip, long expected and enjoyed in anticipation.

"Come, Grace, my child, it is time you were in bed; you have a long journey before you to-morrow." These were the mother's words as she fondly stroked the fair hair of her youngest daughter. Then two loving arms were thrown round the mother's neck and a bright face was raised to hers.

But soon big tears were coursing down the young girl's face. She hardly knew why they came, for was she not to-morrow to set off on her long-looked-for visit—would she not soon breathe the air of Scotland's hills and enjoy their wild rugged beauty?

Was she not leaving home for the first time, on a long visit to a distant place? But where is the English girl that has no sore heart, even in the midst of expected pleasure, as she goes away from the loved ones, so tried and true, at home?

And Grace had such a home to leave! Let us enter this home to-night and see what we find there.

It is an old-fashioned, rather squarely-built house, in the market-place of a town in one of the eastern counties of England. I think as you walked up the street you would say at once, "Surely that is the doctor's house." And so it is, for Dr. Arnold is the master. The house is built of stone, with the door in the centre and two windows on either side. Above are five windows, and above again another story with sloping roof. It is close upon the road, and you would at first say, What a dull-looking house it is! But the inmates would tell you a very different tale.

To this house Dr. and Mrs. Arnold had removed when their children were quite young; indeed, Grace, the darling of the family, had been born there shortly after they came. The furniture was not new nor the carpets bright, and perhaps strangers thought the doctor's house looked shabby; but the occupants were content, and troubled very little what outsiders thought about it.

As we go this evening into the study, which is at the back of the house, we find it lighted up, and a small fire burning in the grate. The doctor is there alone, and we see him as we look in seated in his easy-chair, apparently reading. But as we watch him a little more we see that his eyes are fixed on the fire, and his beautiful face (beautiful not so much from well-formed features as from expression) looks a little sad; he murmurs to himself, "My little Grace, my dear little Grace." Then he glances to something framed over his mantel-piece, and he reads: "Rest in the Lord." In a minute his face loses the sad look, and one of calm trustfulness comes over the many features, and soon he is once more absorbed in the medical work he was studying.

It is dark now, so that you cannot see the back of the house, but there is a garden stretching behind; and though at first it looks very short and narrow, I can tell you there is a door at the bottom which leads to a charming spot on the side of a hill which the doctor has had planted to his own fancy—for his garden is his hobby. It is laid out with great taste, and as the doctor throws his practical good sense into the matter it is also very productive. Down at the end is a viney, truly not a very large one, but the doctor always seems to have the first and richest grapes, and many a poor patient has been refreshed by a bunch sent by the kind, generous doctor.

There are five children belonging to this house, two sons and three daughters.

Frank, the eldest, is in London studying, that he may follow his father's profession.

Ralph, the next, sailed a few months since for Melbourne, where an excellent opening has been found for him.

Kate, the eldest daughter, is rather stately-looking and dignified, taller and darker than Grace, but with a kind, loving heart, ever ready and well able to assist her mother.

Helen, the second, is altogether more like the father, with an earnest, true face, which to look upon is to trust.

And what shall I say of the mother? Perhaps what she is would be best summed up in this: True woman and true Christian. She has had trials, and many of them, but they have been the fire purifying the gold, bringing out in her, each year with greater clearness, more of the Master's likeness. And is it to be wondered at, when we know that to become like Christ had been Marion Arnold's prayer from the day when she knelt as Ralph Arnold's bride? They had set forth on their journey together with this determination: "This one thing I do. I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Could it be otherwise, then, that with this desire the atmosphere of this house was felt to be more heavenly than most, and from the servants upward it was known that the master and mistress desired above all things to glorify God?

But we left Grace with her mother in the little room where her trunk stands ready packed, for she is to be off early the next morning.

The mother's tears too are almost welling up as she says, "My darling, our Father will watch between us, and you know no height nor depth can separate us from His love."

"No, mother, it is precious to know He will go with me, and will keep us both safely in His loving arms."

Then "good-nights" were said, and Grace was left alone. She knelt down by her little bed with a tender feeling toward it, as her resting-place from childhood, and committing herself and her loved ones in a few words to her Father in heaven, she rose, undressed, and was soon peacefully asleep.

Yes, though Grace Arnold was only seventeen, and in the full tide of youth and health, she had given her young heart to Christ. Her love to Him had seemed to grow up with her and become part of her very self. Her mother was a bright, happy Christian, getting her strength daily afresh from God, and her children had early seen that their father and mother could not do without their God. He was to them first a Saviour, then a Counsellor, a Friend, a Guide.

From their birth these children had been committed to God, and when their parents had dedicated them to Him they had done it believing, feeling sure that the promise was to them and to their children. Would that there were more such parents in our country, so living before their children as to show them that their love to God was something real and true, something to be carried into every transaction of life. But, alas! too many are seeking first the good things of this world for their children, and forgetting their Saviour's words, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness." Should they not rather follow His commands, feeling sure of the promise that follows, "And all these things shall be added unto you?"

The next morning all were astir early. It was a bright, fresh September morning, and at eight o'clock Dr. Arnold stood in the hall waiting for his daughter.

"Come, Grace," he called from the bottom of the stairs; "we must be off." And then downstairs she came, looking so bright and pretty, while a shower of loving kisses were given her with the hasty good-byes.

They were going to drive eight miles to a seaport town, where they were to meet Mrs. Campbell and her little daughter. Mrs. Campbell was the daughter of an old friend of Dr. Arnold's, who had married a clergyman in the far north of Scotland, and was now returning home after a visit to her southern relatives. Grace was to go under her care by sea as far as Aberdeen. At the hotel they found Mrs. Campbell waiting for them; and as time was short and Dr. Arnold's very precious, he quickly bade them farewell, and with a long kiss to his daughter took his departure.

We must here leave our travellers for a little time while we follow Dr. Arnold homeward. As he rode up to his own door he saw his wife anxiously looking out for him.

"Oh, Ralph! I am so glad you have come, for there is a message from Thornleigh begging you will go at once. Little Dora is ill, and I am afraid, from Mrs. Stevenson's hurried note, it must be something serious; but, Ralph dear, how did you leave our Grace?"

"I left her safely in Mrs. Campbell's keeping. Now tell me, where is the note? And as he spoke the doctor rang the bell.

"Jane, say I want my horse brought round at once," he said, as the servant obeyed the summons, "and tell John to be very quick."

"When did this note come?" he asked, turning to his wife.

"Almost directly after you had left," was the answer.

The doctor's face looked anxious. "Poor little Dora; I wish I could have gone at once. She must have needed me sadly, as her mother says she is delirious. Strange the attack should have come on so quickly."

"Dear Ralph, you must take something before you go; you have had such a long drive, and now have eight miles to go another way."

With some persuasion the doctor stayed a minute to swallow some soup his thoughtful wife had prepared for him, and then set off at a sharp trot.

It was a beautiful ride to Thornleigh, through a thickly wooded and undulating country; and had not the doctor been preoccupied he would have intensely enjoyed the scene this clear September day. But he felt depressed, and his thoughts were divided between his absent child and the little one he had been called so hastily to visit.

Mrs. Stevenson was one of the Arnolds' choicest friends. They had many, but perhaps none quite took the place that she did. She was a tried, true friend in joy or sorrow, and now the doctor's heart was quite ready to sympathize with her.

Mr. Stevenson was a most genial man and kind neighbor. His easy life was a very comfortable one, spent in farming his small estate of Thornleigh; but his own happy life—and certainly James Stevenson seemed to have had fewer trials than most—did not keep him from having warm sympathy and a tender heart toward others.

They had two sons. The eldest had just come of age; the youngest was fourteen when, to the great joy of the whole family, a little sister was added to the number. This was little Dora; and now, at four years of age, she was the darling and plaything of the household. She seemed born to love and be loved, though at times she was sadly perverse and wilful, so that her mother feared sometimes that her two big brothers would spoil her altogether. It was, then, to the idol of Thornleigh that Dr. Arnold had been summoned; and his kind heart sank at the bare thought that perhaps his friends might be called upon to part with their treasure.

As Dr. Arnold passed through the lodge gates, he thought the place had never looked more beautiful. A long drive through an avenue of stately trees led up to the house, which was built of stone, with gable roof and casement windows. A terrace ran round two sides of the house, from which an extensive view was seen, and the mossy lawn which sloped away from it was still gay with flowers.

To-day there was a peculiar quiet about the place which was most unusual, for generally it was surrounded by those indescribable marks of life which one sees about a cheerful family home. No one was to be seen, but as the doctor rode up to the door William (who had been on the look-out all the morning) ran up quickly to take his horse, and touching his hat said:

"I am right glad you've come, sir; we have wanted you sadly; the little lady's very ill, I fear, sir."

William was a faithful groom, who had been in Mr. Stevenson's service long before the little lady was born, and now was as anxious about Dora as he would have been for his own child.

At this moment Mr. Stevenson himself appeared on the doorstep, and ushered Dr. Arnold at once up the broad staircase, hung with pictures, till they came to a landing from which two long corridors branched off. Taking the one to the left, the two walked to the end and entered the usually bright nursery of Dora Stevenson. Here they found the mother anxiously watching her sick child. Then came inquiries about the illness, which seemed to have come so suddenly. Dora, it was true, had not been quite the thing for the last week, but the doctor had seen her only two days before and thought little was the matter.

Mrs. Stevenson said she feared the child was hurt by a fall she had the day before, though at the time, as she scarcely cried, the nurse had thought little of it.

Dr. Arnold laid his cool hand upon the little child's forehead, and she opened her eyes and gave a sweet smile of recognition to her old friend, then in a few minutes more was again wandering.

"You must keep up heart, my friends, though I cannot disguise that your child is very ill; but I trust the symptoms will soon yield to the remedies I shall give. I should like to have William go at once to the drug-store, and also to my house with a message to Mrs. Arnold. Nay, stop, I will go and speak to him myself."

After giving him the prescription for the drug-store he said: "William, go to my house and tell Mrs. Arnold I am sorry I shall not be home this evening until quite late, and that possibly I may not be able to get home at all before morning."

Going back to the sick child's room he watched by her side for some time, suggesting many little changes which might give her ease and comfort; then, promising to return later in the day, he set out once again to see other patients who needed him.

ELIJAH TRANSLATED.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 6, II Kings 2: 1-15. Golden Text, Heb. 11: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter. Elijah's Three Commissions—His Visit to Elisha—Elisha's Prompt Obedience to the Call—Resists Elijah's Attempt to Separate them—Their Journey through the Country—Significance of the Names—The Crossing of the Jordan—Elisha's Request—Elijah Taken.

OUT of the three commissions which God had given Elijah when he was in Horeb, the mount of God, the prophet fulfilled only one in his own person. In spite of his fall into discouragement through getting his eye on circumstances, the Lord had never changed one moment toward him, and so soon as Elijah's eyes were open to see what God was doing in the land he knew of the hidden seven thousand believers, he began again to see all things in God's light. God had told him to anoint Hazael to be King of Syria, Jehu, King of Israel; and Elisha, the son of Shaphat, to be prophet in his room. Which of these men was to affect most powerfully the interests of the cause of God in the land? Elijah had no hesitation about this matter; the power of a king was very limited in the eyes of this man of faith. Hazael or Jehu could neither do good unless God should use them, nor evil unless He permitted it. But how about the prophet? Was there, then, any intrinsic virtue in him? None whatever. But a man thoroughly yielded up to God, a man who sees God in everything, can be used of Him as other men are not.

So Elijah made for the farmstead of Elisha (doubtless one of the seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal). Elisha was quietly pursuing his ordinary course of labor, ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen—of those days. He was with the last, and so would see the progress of his servants with the other eleven. Without any previous intimation the rough prophet of the desert cast his mantle upon him. Elisha understood the sign, and recognized the call to be from God. He left the oxen and ran after Elijah, who did not stay to explain, and said: "Let me, I pray thee, kiss my father and mother, and then I will follow thee." He spoke no word about winding up his business. We may well believe he was not owing money, and as to the disposal of his property, if the Lord wanted him, he could well leave that to His care. He returned, slew a yoke of oxen (part of his farm stock), boiled their flesh with the instruments of the oxen—so clearly showing that he was cut loose from his life as a business man from that day forward—and then "he arose, and went after Elijah, and ministered unto him" (I Kings 19: 21).

The ministry of Elijah continued (I Kings 21: 1; II Kings 1) after the call of Elisha. But the time was approaching when the Lord would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind. No other but Enoch ever left the world except through the gate of death, and these two were men who walked singularly close to God. They are like finger-posts to point on to the time when Jesus shall come again, and the dead in Christ shall rise first, "then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord" (I Thes. 4: 17). As faith increases, and as we are brought to see things in the light of God, the coming of Jesus to take away His saints is hastened. "Elijah went with Elisha from Gilgal. And Elijah said unto Elisha, Tarry here, I pray thee; for the Lord hath sent me to Beth-el." Tarry! what could Elijah mean? Elisha's commission was to follow, not to tarry! God and man, even the best of men, were at variance. Elisha saw but one course, to follow the prophet at any cost, at any risk of his displeasure. And thus he said, "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee." God will not let us put man in His place. "Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men" (I Cor. 7: 23). God would have our walk

AN INDIVIDUAL WALK WITH HIM.

Very often it will involve condemnation from our dearest friends and God's dearest children, but if His Word and His Spirit make our way clear, we must not be stayed, even by an Elijah. The Lord may and does speak through His children, not only when our ear is turned to Him, not to them. They may be perfectly honest in the advice they give us, as, no doubt, Elijah was; but God never gives to a third party to see His mind absolutely about any one of His children. His object is always to draw each one separately to have more immediately to do with Himself, and if the whole world misunderstand, we must go on with God whenever His will is clearly revealed to us by His Word and His Spirit. But we must not think that when we have passed one such test there will necessarily be no other. The very conquest of Christ over our own natural tendencies, in any trial of faith or patience, of our submission to God or of the renunciation of our will, only makes way for a further trial. Elisha had stood the test, but it was applied a second time, and a third. "Elisha, tarry here, I pray thee, for the Lord hath sent me to Jericho." "Tarry, I pray thee here, for the Lord hath sent me to Jordan."

In addition to his difficulty that such a man as Elijah should not comprehend the Lord's distinct direction to him, which had come to him through Elijah, a whole company of believers, the sons of the prophets, attempted to withstand him. They came, and said to him, just as though they knew more of God than he did, "Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day?" Elisha betrayed no personal feeling that those who were comparatively such unripe believers should attempt to come in between him and his God. He only answered them, "Yea, I know it; hold ye your peace." They could not understand the necessity for this apparently mad march through the country; they would have preached prudence, regard for bodily strength, etc., and they had Elijah on their side. Elisha's trial was a desperately real one, but between him and God—above Elijah, and above the sons of the prophets—there was a complete and clear understanding. The prophet knew the perfect peace of those whose minds are stayed on God.

The course of their journey is very significant. The starting-place was Gilgal (turning), suggestive of conversion to God, the next stage Bethel (the house of God), fellowship with believers who are of the household of God. Jericho (the city of the moon) is a type of the Church of Christ, and Jordan, the last stage, means the river of judgment. Before we can know the real resurrection life of Christ, we must pass through Jordan. We must see ourselves judged, crucified with Christ, not simply in theory or doctrine, but by the hard test of actual experience. All must pass through death, that we may not trust to anything but God. "We had that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God which raiseth the dead" (II Cor. 1: 9). God, in His deep love, lets us find only death in all which is good in us, as well as all which is bad in us. He shows up our talents, our knowledge, our love, our judgment, our prudence, our energy, our plans, our zeal, our everything, as utterly incapable when applied to things divine. In all this we have to yield, to give up, to see our lovely flowers wither, that His power, His knowledge, love, judgment, wisdom, zeal, etc., may come into our utter emptiness, and then the excellency of the power is of God, and not of us. Then we may be "troubled on every side, yet not distressed," because we have ceased to take matters into our own hands; "perplexed, yet not in despair," because God sees where we see nothing; "persecuted" by man, "but not forsaken" by God; "cast down, but not destroyed" (II Cor. 4: 9), because the "everlasting arms" are ever holding us up.

Fifty men of the sons of the prophets stood near Jordan and looked on—just what thousands of believers are doing this day who are afraid to let self go, and to let God have all the place in their whole being. Once decided in the will of God, the passage of Jordan is no such great matter. To Elijah it was like a common pathway. He was living already in the divine, no longer in the human: he took his mantle, wrapped it together, and smote the waters, and they were divided higher and thither, so that they went through on dry land. Death had become life to them, the river of judgment was the way to heaven. It was there that Elijah said to Elisha, "Ask what I shall do for thee, before I be taken away from thee." The answer was ready: it was

THE RIGHT OF THE FIRST BORN.

But Elijah had no earthly goods to leave to Elisha; his riches were of another order: "A double portion of thy spirit." Elijah had put him into the position of son—he would claim all its privileges. "Thou hast asked a hard thing; nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so." Oh, how many of us are longing for more of Jesus! How can we get more of Him? By looking at ourselves to see how we are getting on? Never. By looking at others, and comparing ourselves? Oh no; but by looking at Him. Beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, [we] are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even by the Spirit of the Lord (II Cor. 3: 18). They still went on and talked. "What was this? How could Elisha talk at such a moment? It showed how perfectly at rest he was about the matter. There was no strain, nothing unnatural; the Lord Himself had in hand to grant his request, and he had nothing to do but to look up. The conversation was interrupted by the chariot and horses of God, which were come to escort Elijah. It was but a moment, and he was gone. But Elisha saw it, and he cried, My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof." Then he rent his own clothes; he saw by faith that he was to live his own life no more—he was to tread in the steps of another. But the mantle of Elijah, which had once before been cast upon him, was his by right; and without waiting to feel any great change had passed upon him, he went forward and acted as a man who had what he had asked. He stood by the bank of Jordan, took the mantle, and smote the waters, saying, "Where is

THE LORD GOD OF ELIJAH?"

He did not say, "Where is the power which was in Elijah?" His eyes were on his God. The waters parted. Elisha went over again on dry ground, and the sons of the prophets who had stood outside as simple spectators, not daring to put God to the test, like these men of faith, were impelled to say, "The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha." They knew nothing of all which had taken place, but the result was undeniable. And it was a double portion which Elisha had; the same fearless reckoning upon God which Elijah had before him, but also the very spirit of Christ Himself, the going about and doing good. And we are not shut out from the double portion; God yearns to fill us with Himself, to live His life in us, to repeat the life of Jesus in each one who wills, and to fill us with all the fullness of God. Where are we looking? Oh, let it be off "unto Jesus, who is the Author and Finisher of our faith!"

TEACH ME TO LIVE.

Teach me to live! 'Tis easier far to die—
Gently and silently to pass away—
On earth's long night to close the heavy eye,
And waken in the realms of glorious day.

Teach me that harder lesson—how to live,
To serve Thee in the darkest paths of life;
Arm me for conflict now—fresh vigor give,
And make me wiser than conqueror in the strife.

Teach me to live!—Thy purpose to fulfill:
Bright for Thy glory let my taper shine!
Each day renew, re-mould this stubborn will:
Closer round Thee my heart's affections twine.

Teach me to live for self and sin no more;
But use of time remaining to me yet,
Not mine own pleasure seeking, as before—
Wasting no precious hours in vain regret.

Teach me to live! No idler let me be,
But in Thy service hand and heart employ;
Prepared to do Thy bidding cheerfully—
Be this my highest and my holiest joy.

Teach me to live!—my daily cross to bear;
Nor murmur though I bend beneath its load.
Only be with me. Let me feel Thee near:
Thy smile sheds gladness on the darkest road.

Teach me to live! And find my life in Thee—
Looking from earth and earthly things away;
Let me not falter, but untiringly
Press on; and gain new strength and power each day.

Teach me to live!—with kindly words for all—
Waiting no calm, repulsive hour of gloom;
Waiting, with cheerful patience, till Thy call
Summons my spirit to her heavenly home.

A MORE deplorable condition of affairs than that existing in Italy in the year 1817 it would be difficult to imagine. It was described in a report which Prince Metternich, the chief statesman of Austria, submitted in November of that year to his master, the Emperor Francis. The Prince had sent agents through the country to investigate, and it was on the statements of these eye-witnesses that the Prince based his report. When we remember that Austria was mainly responsible for good government in Italy, and that every one of the rulers who misgoverned his subjects relied on the power of Austria to keep him from the vengeance of his people, we cannot suppose that the Austrian Chancellor would paint the picture in its darkest colors. Indeed, we have fair ground for believing that the Prince would represent the country in a better condition than it was, if he departed from the accurate truth at all. Yet the picture, as he drew it, was sufficiently dark.

POPULAR DISCONTENT.

There was discontent everywhere, and abundant cause for it. The part of Italy which the Pope governed was the most miserable. The people there had to support not only the Government, but 2436 convents, in which slothful, vicious people lived in iniquity. Neither did the Papal Government, expensive as it was, perform the functions incumbent upon it. Burglars, highwaymen, and murderers went unpunished, and there was security for neither person nor property. In a less degree every state in Italy was suffering, and everywhere, the Prince said, the people were misgoverned and ripe for rebellion.

A consolatory reflection, however, supported Prince Metternich, and he imparted it to his master. The people were helpless, he believed. Being without concerted action, having no foreign government to assist them, and, above all, having no leaders, the Prince said they could not rebel. He was right; but God was even then preparing instruments who would remove those obstacles. Three boys, who, at the time the astute statesman was encouraging himself and the Emperor, were all under thirteen years of age, were being raised up by the Friend of all oppressed peoples to deliver the down-trodden people of Italy. One of these, a boy of ten, was being educated for the army; his name was Camillo Cavour. A second, a boy of the same age, was running about on the sea-shore and begging his mother to let him go to sea; his name was Giuseppe Garibaldi. The third was the son of a Genoese physician, a boy just turned twelve years, and hoping to become a distinguished lawyer; he was Giuseppe Mazzini, "the dreamer, the fanatic, the impracticable theorist," but destined to see his dreams become hard facts, and some of his impracticable theories adopted as the principles of government. Three poor, insignificant lads, beneath the notice of the Emperor and the Prince, but bearing names that in a few years every despot in Europe learned to hate and fear, and every lover of freedom the world over held in reverence. It is with the third—Giuseppe Mazzini—that we are now concerned.

MAZZINI'S BOYHOOD.

He was born in Genoa, in 1805. His father, a physician of some eminence in the city, had at first little reason to be proud of him. A feeble, delicate child, his limbs so weak that he was unable to stand alone at an age when other children are running around sturdily. But the physician was kind to the afflicted little one, and contrived for his use a little invalid chair in which his frail frame could receive the support it needed. Necessarily, however, the boy was left much to his mother's care, and, happily for him, for Italy, and the world, she was one of nature's queens. She was singularly beautiful, but it was her mental and moral characteristics made her a fit mother for the great patriot. She united with acute perceptions and clear and vigorous thought all a woman's tenderness and ardent affection. Kind and sympathetic, yet firm and wise, the mother acquired an influence over the boy that grew with his growth, and lasted as long as he lived. In an exceedingly tender letter, written when he was nearly fifty years old, to a friend in deep distress, Mazzini spoke of this influence as of a power which had kept him in the right way amid sore discomfiture, and had prevented his sinking in despair.

A SYMPATHETIC HEART.

One incident of his early boyhood is so characteristic of his disposition throughout his life that it deserves mention. He was about six years old, and had just gained sufficient strength to walk out with his mother. The two ventured out into the city, and had gone but a short distance when the child suddenly stood still, gazing intently upon an old beggar seated upon the steps of a church. "So transfixed stood the boy that his mother, fearing he was frightened at the venerable white beard and picturesque rags and staff of the old man, stooped down to carry the child away, but he broke from her, and running impetuously forward, threw his arms around the poor man's neck (see picture on first page, panel No. 1), kissing him again and again, and crying out to her, "Give him something, mother; give him something." The aged mendicant was affected even to tears; he tenderly returned the child's caresses, and, addressing Signora Mazzini, said, "Love him well, lady; he is one who will love the people."

Mazzini's first tutor was a priest, who taught him Latin. At the age of thirteen he was sent to the University of Genoa. There he made considerable progress with his studies, thanks to his own industry and love of learning. It is not probable that his tutors helped him much. The Emperor of Austria desired professors in colleges to impart only one kind of learning, and that Mazzini's after-life showed that he had neglected. Speaking to the faculty of the University of Pavia, the Emperor explained of a good education. He said, "Know, gentlemen, that I do not desire cultured men, nor studious ones, but I wish you to form for me faithful subjects, devoted to me and to my house." That is the kind of education kings and emperors like young men to acquire, and as between the emperors and the people, it is certainly advantageous to one of the parties concerned, however it may suit the other. Francis knew exactly what he wanted, and he expressed it with more frankness than royal personages often use. But somehow Mazzini never became proficient in that department, which was an unfortunate thing—for the Emperor. However, Mazzini acquitted himself creditably in other branches, took his degree, and to the delight of his parents was admitted to the bar as a lawyer.

Mazzini's career at the bar was cut short in 1830 by incarceration. He was only twenty-five years of age, but the Government thought that its interests would be safer if the young lawyer were behind iron bars, and accordingly Mazzini made his first acquaintance with the interior of a prison. His offence was that he had joined

THE CARBONARI

(charcoal burners). That was a political association composed of elements almost as mixed as those that gathered around David in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. 22: 2)—men of generous hearts, high principles, pure motives, were members of the order, and, with them, turbulent and licentious men, thieves, and cut-throats, delighting in disorder which would give them opportunity for crime and plunder. They were not agreed among themselves about what they wanted nor the means of attaining it. Some wanted a Republic, some wanted constitutional monarchy, some urged self-dependence, others would make no movement until France or England assisted. The only bond that united them, the only feeling absolutely common to all, was discontent with the despotism of the Princes and the Pope and hatred of Austria, which protected the despots.

Of the power of the Carbonari there was no doubt. In 1820 there were, in Southern Italy alone, 800,000 men enrolled in its ranks, and when, in that year, the King of Spain granted his subjects a constitution, the Carbonari were sufficiently powerful to compel the King of Naples to do the same for his subjects. This made him take the oath publicly, and held him to his pledge until Austria came to his rescue and crushed them with its overwhelming force. Mazzini joined the order, as did nearly all the patriotic young men of Italy. When once initiated he found he had made a mistake, and that with many of his associates, he had no affinity. But the order had him, and held him by his oath, and at that time it was the only force in which there was any hope. Ten years after the Neapolitan outbreak, the Carbonari were again in insurrection. The French Revolution of July 1830, gave them hope, and they rose in Modena and in Rome itself. They were unsuccessful, and Mazzini was arrested, as a member of the order, and imprisoned in the fortress of Savona.

YOUNG ITALY.

It was during his solitary confinement there that he conceived the idea of founding a new order, purer and better than the Carbonari. This order he resolved to call "Young Italy." He had plenty of time for thought, and he thoroughly elaborated the plan of the order. At the end of six months a sentence of banishment was pronounced upon him, and Mazzini quitted Italy for France. He took up his residence at Marseille and commenced the issue of a journal which he named Young Italy. In this he explained his plans for the order and the objects to which he consecrated his life, calling upon all who sympathized with him to band themselves together for united action. The watchword of the party was to be "God and the people," and self-sacrifice was its vital principle. The grand object was the riddance from the whole of Italy of the petty despots and the deliverance of the country from the power and tyranny of Austria. The grandeur of the conception dazzled the youth of Italy, when, by a few trusty agents, Mazzini's new journal was distributed in the universities and the haunts of young men. Enrollment was at once commenced, and in little more than a year the order of Young Italy comprised more members than any order in Italy.

TREMBLING DESPOTISM.

The Italian Governments were stricken with terror, and Austria shared their alarm. Mazzini's avowed object was to unite all the Italian States in one great Republic, with Rome as its capital. As the order of Young Italy grew, Austria saw the necessity for action, lest not only might she lose her grip on Italy, but might have on her own borders a nation that would menace her own government. She appealed to France to stifle the voice of the exile, and Louis Philippe endeavored to comply with their request. Tracked from one place of concealment to another by the French police, Mazzini for two years eluded the search, and when his asylum was at last discovered, a friend who bore some personal resemblance to him substituted himself for him and was escorted to Switzerland in his stead, while he himself walked calmly through the whole row of police officers sent specially to arrest him (see panel No. 2 on first page). He then took refuge in Switzerland, where he organized the first armed attack made by the party of unity upon the party of princely sub-division in Italy. The attack failed through the treachery of the military leader, General Ramorino.

In 1836 the Swiss Diet realized the danger of harboring the exile whose name was becoming terror to tyrants. The independence of the nation could not be jeopardized for the sake of the foreigner, great and admirable as they knew him to be. He was therefore advised to seek a more powerful protector. As a matter of form, and as a cheap concession to Austria, the Diet decreed the exile of Mazzini. He fled to England, arriving there in January, 1837.

HIS PHILOSOPHY

As re-examined as he passed through a crisis of intense moral suffering, by which he was nearly overwhelmed. He set about the re-examination of himself and surrounding things. His route afterward of this time: "I rebuilt my entire edifice of moral philosophy. I came to rely better self alone, without aid from others, through the help of a religious conception, from the idea of God I descended to the conception of progress; from the conception of progress, to a true conception of life, to faith in a mission and its logical consequence—duty, the supreme rule of life; and, having reached that faith, I vowed to myself that nothing in this world should again make me doubt or forsake it. It was, as Dante says, passing through martyrdom to peace—a forced and desperate pace. I bade a long, sad farewell to all individual hopes for me on earth. Never since that time have I for an instant selfishly allowed myself to think of my own happiness or misery as a consideration which was to influence my actions." During the first year of Mazzini's life in England the loving tenderness toward the poor which had distinguished him from early childhood was called into exercise by successful attempts to mitigate the sufferings and improve the minds of his poorer fellow-countrymen. Until then, I had few opportunities of studying that precious element of our nation—the working-class. An opportunity was unexpectedly presented to me, and I eagerly embraced it, by conversing occasionally with some of the boys who wander the streets of the vast city, laying upon the organ (see panel No. 3 on first page) I learned with profound grief and astonishment the history and method of a traffic carried on by a few speculators only to be qualified a species of white slave-trade; a disgrace to Italy, to its Government, and to its clergy, who might—had they chosen to do so—have prevented it.

THE ORGAN-GRINDERS.

"I sought a method of alleviating the sufferings of those poor boys, and founded an association for their protection, and a gratuitous school wherein they might learn something of their duties and their rights, and be able to give good counsel to their fellow-countrymen on their return. They used to come between nine and ten o'clock at night, bringing their organs with them. We taught them reading, writing, arithmetic, simple geography, and the elements of drawing. As they progressed they were taught the principles of civil and religious liberty (see panel No. 4). On several occasions I brought those of the masters who had been guilty of violence to justice in the English courts; and when they found they were watched they gradually became less cruel and arbitrary in their conduct."

This school was kept open—Mazzini personally supplying the greater part of the funds, and haring in the labor of teaching the scholars—from 1841 till 1848, when he left England. Thus, as frequently happens, cruelty and wrong work their own retribution. The boys who were sent in ignorance to London to slave for the tyrants, returned to Italy educated young men, ardent disciples of their benefactor, Mazzini, and enthusiastic teachers and workers in the cause of Italian unity.

During *

THE REVOLUTIONARY YEAR,

1848, the continent of Europe palpitated like a volcano, and all thrones whose basis was despotism were shaken. The conflagration was not likely to pass by Italy, but, much to his grief, Mazzini discovered that the King of Piedmont, to whom he looked for help for the cause of the people, was a broken reed. But Garibaldi, who was a member of Young Italy almost from its foundation, was at the head of a brave little force, and Mazzini, quitting his safe asylum, proceeded with all speed to Italy, and joined Garibaldi's column at Bergamo.

Colonel Medici thus relates Mazzini's coming among the volunteers, rifle on shoulder (see panel No. 5), asking to join the ranks as a simple soldier of the legion he commanded. "A general acclamation saluted the great Italian, and the legion immediately confided its banner, which bore the device—God and the people—to his charge. The march was very fatiguing—rain fell in torrents—we were drenched to the skin. It happened that Mazzini, seeing one of our youngest volunteers clothed only in linen, and consequently with no protection against the rain and sudden cold, forced him to accept and wear his own cloak. That was a true Mazzinian act, characteristic of his whole life. Arrived at Monza, we heard the fatal news of the capitulation of Milan, and learned that a numerous body of Austrian cavalry had been sent against us. Garibaldi, not wishing to expose his small band to utter and useless destruction, gave orders to fall back. In this march, full of danger and difficulty, the strength of soul, intrepidity, and decision which Mazzini possessed in such a high degree never failed. His conduct was a proof that to the greatest qualities of the civilian he joined the courage and the intrepidity of the soldier."

ROME BESIEGED.

The Pope, meanwhile, terrified at the national feeling excited, fled from Rome in the disguise of a footman, and left the city free to govern herself. It appeared as if Venice might long hold out; a bloodless revolution had taken place in Tuscany—the Grand Duke had fled—the King of Piedmont's cowardice had cast discredit upon the monarchy, and Mazzini believed that the utterance of the word Republic by the Roman Assembly might in that moment of universal fermentation have morally united Italy. The Roman Assembly, however, like prisoners newly released from their fetters, appeared unable to advance. They hesitated, temporized, despatched messengers to the Pope asking instructions, and presented in those first moments of liberty, as Mazzini frankly wrote to them, "a sight half sorrowful, half ridiculous."

Every school-boy knows the history of the subsequent siege of Rome by Louis Napoleon's troops. He was at that time President of the French Republic—he had himself been a member of the Carbonari—but, "already meditating the enthronement of tyranny at home, he saw an opportunity of effecting two objects—accustoming the soldiery to fight against the Republican flag, and gaining over the Catholic clergy and that portion of the French people which derived its inspiration from them." After two months' siege, during which the Italians performed prodigies of valor, the French made themselves masters of the heights round Rome, and had the city at their mercy. On July 3d, 1849, the French entered Rome in triumph (see panel No. 6).

Mazzini at last left Rome without passport or papers of any kind, on a little steamer, commanded by a Corsican, who consented to run the risk of conveying him to Marseilles. He contrived to enter and to quit the city without detection, and took shelter in Switzerland, and from that asylum he directed the business of a vast secret association for the freedom and prosperity of his beloved land. It was a long and weary struggle, in which Mazzini contended against despots and against false and fickle friends. We have no space to follow it in detail, but proceed at once to the narrative of the last act in the drama of Mazzini's life.

The Sicilians had made frequent propositions to Mazzini to give the support of his approval to an insurrection having as its purpose the separation of the island from the rest of Italy, and the establishment of a Sicilian Republic; but this he had invariably opposed in the name of Italian unity. For a time his influence prevailed, but in 1870 the revolutionary party informed him that the date of the rising was fixed, and, while urging him to head the movement, declared that, with or without him, the attempt would be made. He replied, bidding them not to rise in the name of Sicily, but of Italy, and decided to go among them in order to throw the whole weight of his authority and influence in the scale of unity, at any cost. He had no belief in the success of the proposed insurrection, and some of those who were near him at the time believed that in yielding he cherished the hope that he would fall in the struggle, and that his death would give new life to the cause he loved better than life. He was by the order of General Medici, Governor of Palermo, and conveyed in a ship of war to Gaeta, to be once more imprisoned.

The insurrection of Palermo was prevented, and that danger being removed, the Government became greatly embarrassed with their prisoner, dreading any injury to his health, from the consciousness that should mischief happen to him it would assuredly be attributed to design. The opportunity of the birth of a prince—two months later—was therefore gladly seized to open the gates of Gaeta, and again "offer him pardon and oblivion, for having loved his country above all things."

Mazzini, weary and sick at heart, started from Gaeta at early dawn, crossed the Campagna of Rome, and made his way to his native city, where he remained for a few days secluded in the house of a friend in Genoa, and having visited he returned to England to spend a few months with early friends, whose "affection was the best consolation for the loss of a home denied to him in his native Italy. But he shortly after renounced the consolations of age, as he had formerly renounced the joys of youth, in the service of his country, and left England for Lugano, in order to conduct the publication of a journal to be called La Roma del Popolo (the Rome of the People).

DEATH.

After a year of unwearied literary labor in this capacity, in defiance of incessant illness and ever-recurring attacks of intense physical pain, Mazzini, in an unwonted interval of ease, wrote to his friends in England announcing his intention of spending with them a cherished anniversary, which it had been his custom to pass among them whenever the dangers and difficulties of his troubled life allowed. His desire to accomplish this induced him to cross the Alps (see panel No. 7) at a season extremely dangerous to a delicate person. He was seized with acute pleurisy, of which he died, at Pisa, on March 10th, 1872.

His last words were of God's goodness to him, and of his country, as he yielded up a life that had been governed by what he himself called "the sacred, inexorable, dominant idea of duty." His body was carried across the Apennines to Genoa in triumphal procession, and eighty thousand of his countrymen followed the beloved remains to the grave, where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." Let the world deal as it may with Mazzini's life and work; those who know most of it are convinced that but for his untiring, self-sacrificing devotion; but for the ability and industry with which he labored to propagate his noble principles of self-forgetfulness in the cause of patriotism; but for his skill in organizing the order of Young Italy, Garibaldi could not have gathered followers to his flag, Cavour could not have won his diplomatic victories, and Victor Emmanuel could not have reigned over free and united Italy. The end for which Mazzini labored is achieved, and he would be the first to say, as he looked on his beloved Italy strong and free, that he did well to "Work and wait and watch out all his years."

THE LACHRYMAL.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"Put thou my tears into thy bottle."—Psa. 56: 8.

A Long-vanished Custom—The World Full of Pang—Catherine Rheinfeldt's Lifeboat—The Tears God Saves—I. Tears of Repentance—Revised Story of Paradise and the Peri—II. Tears of Sickness—The Sufferings of the Only Nervous—III. Tears of Poverty—A City Missionary Reproved—IV. Parents' Tears—The Secret of Illogical Conversions—V. Tears of the Bereaved—Home Troubles—Their Victim Ruthlessly Followed—The Lachrymatory Emptied—Transmuted Tears—Gems Sparkling on the Coronets—The Treasured Empty Vase.

WITHIN the past century travellers and antiquarians have explored the ruins of ancient cities, and from the very heart of the buried splendor they have brought up evidence of customs long ago vanished from the earth. From some of these tombs they have brought up lachrymatories or lachrymals which are vials made of earthenware. The tears wept over the dead were caught and kept in this vial or lachrymatory, or lachrymal, or bottle, and then the bottle was placed in the tomb of the dead. There are in our museums to-day, if you will search for them, many specimens of these.

TEAR BOTTLES OF OLDEN TIMES.

Now, my text intimates that God has an intimate acquaintance with and a tender remembrance of all our griefs—a vial, a lachrymatory, a lachrymal, a bottle in which He keeps all our tears.

"But," say you, "why talk about grief on a bright Sabbath day like this? Why preach about grief? Ah!

THE WORLD IS FULL OF PANG.

There are great darkenesses of soul that need this morning to be lifted. I stand before some who are about to break under temptation or trouble, and unless some encouraging word this day be uttered they perish forever. I come on no fool's errand. I do not put upon your wounds any salve compounded by human quackery, but I press straight to the mark, and as one vessel on the sea hails another vessel, so I cry to you to-day, "Ship ahoy!" and I invite you on board a craft which has Faith for a rudder, and Prayer for sails, and Christ for Captain, and Heaven for harbor.

CATHERINE RHEINFELDT,

the Prussian, has saved a great many from drowning. When the storm comes down on the sea and on the beach, and others retire to their couches at night to rest, Catherine Rheinfeldt puts out in a lifeboat, going up and down the beach to see if there are any sailors in distress; and it is said that literally she has brought hundreds and hundreds out of shipwreck to the shore of safety. So to-day I put out in this Gospel lifeboat, and ask that God may help me while I try to bring some of you who may be sinking in the waves of trouble, or sin, or darkness, to the Rock of Ages and the shore of safety.

THE TEARS GOD SAVES.

The tears that were brought up in the lachrymals of Herculaneum and Pompeii have all gone, and those bottles are as dry as the scorched of the volcano that submerged them; but not so with the bottle in which God gathers all our tears. So it is not a mere soft sentiment, it is not only a poetic idea, but it is a deep and an earnest expression of hundreds of people here who have had misfortune, or trial, or loss, or bereavement, when they cry out, saying: "Put thou my tears into thy bottle."

I. First, I remark that God has an intimate acquaintance with and a tender remembrance of all

TEARS OF REPENTANCE.

This morning many a man awaked wretched from the night's debauch, and he wept, and he sobbed—pains in the head, aching in the eye, sick at heart, unfit to step out into the sunlight; but all that weeping gets no record in heaven.

He does not weep because of his misdoing, but because of the consequences of his misdoing. Of all the millions of tears that have rushed forth under such circumstances, not one ever got into God's bottle; but when a man is sorry for his evil way and tries to do better, and out of the lacerations of an aroused conscience cries to God for mercy, then God listens, then Heaven bows down, then sceptres of pardon are extended from the throne, then the bitter cry rends the heart of heavenly compassion, then the tears are gathered into God's bottle.

You have all heard the story of

PARADISE AND THE PERI.

I think it might come to a better adaptation. An angel went forth from heaven and searched all the earth to find some beautiful thing worthy of celestial transportation. The angel went down to the gold and silver mines of the earth, yet found nothing worthy of carrying back to God and to heaven. And then the angel went down to the depths of the sea and examined all the pearls that lay there, but not one of them was fit to take to heaven; and the angel, utterly discouraged and despairing, stood at the foot of a mountain and folded its wing, when, looking a little way off, it saw a wanderer weeping over his evil ways; and as the tears were falling down the cheek of that wanderer the angel thrust its wing under the falling tear and captured it, and then sped away toward the sky; and as God saw the angel flying heavenward with that tear upon the wing, God cried out, "Behold the brightest jewel of heaven, the tear of a sinner's repentance."

Oh, when I see the shepherd bringing a lost sheep back from the wilderness, when I hear the quick tread of a ragged prodigal coming to his father's house, when I see the sin burned and the passion blasted and the wretched and the vile appealing for God's compassion, then I break forth into ecstasy and triumph, and I cry: "More tears for God's bottle!" I remember only one or two lines of the old hymn which says:

"Or sins like mountains for their size,
The seas of sovereign grace expand;
The seas of sovereign grace arise."

O wanderer, come back to thy God. That falling tear will not drop on the cheek, it will not drop on your hand; it will drop into the bottle where God keeps all our tears. Blessed be His glorious name forever.

TEARS OF SICKNESS.

II. Again, God has an intimate acquaintance with and a tender remembrance of all sicknesses. How many of you are perfectly well? Not one out of ten. The whole race is smitten with ailments—troubles to which you are particularly subjected, distress of head, or aching of the side, or trepidation of the heart. There is a weariness and a weakness sometimes to which all are subjected. There is not more than one person out of ten that is perfectly well. Perhaps you get no sympathy for your sufferings. Perhaps you look stout and well, and they say you are a hypochondriac, or they try to explain it by saying you are nervous.

God help the man or woman who is nervous. You have not very great physical strength perhaps. You have been borne down by sufferings of other days, and you feel that one stout blow would shatter the golden bowl of life and break the pitcher at the fountain. Well, sometimes you sit sick and lonely and think no one cares for you. Ah! God does. God knows all the sleepless nights, God has measured all the pangs, God is fully aware of all your distresses, and God sympathizes, and God cares, and God comforts, and God compassionates. Though when you take up the vial of medicine and try to pour it out and to count the drops in your weakness, your hand may be so tremulous you cannot get just the right number of drops, God counts all your falling tears. There is not one tear too many; not one tear too few. And looking up on the shelves of nauseous draughts and distasteful tonics, I want you to remember that there is a larger vial, a larger bottle—not filled with mixture of earthly apothecary, but the bottle in which God gathers all our tears. Ah! blessed is that sick pillow over which Jesus hovers.

TEARS OF POVERTY.

III. Again, I remark, that God has an intimate acquaintance with and a tender remembrance of all poverty. Much of the world's woe does not come to inspection. Deacons of the church do not see it, controllers of alms-houses never report it. People who prefer to suffer ar to die in silence rather than to display their poverty and their bitterness. Parents who fail to get a livelihood, so that they, with their children, dwell in perpetual privation. Sewing women who cannot ply the needle fast enough to earn shelter and bread.

Sorrow and privation and woe huger than camel going through the eye of their needle. Be whether reported or uncomplaining, whether it seemeth comfortable parlor or in damp cellar or in hot garret, the angels of God watch. A those griefs are being collected. Down on the back street, away off amid shanties and log huts angels of God are watching. Tears of want seething in summer's heat, tears of want freezing in winter's cold, fall not unheeded. They are jewels in heaven's casket. They are pledges of divine sympathy. They are tears for God's bottle.

When some years ago a city missionary was crossing one of the parks in New York on the Sabbath day, he said to a lad, "What are you doing here, breaking the Lord's day? You ought to be at church and worshipping God in stead of breaking the Sabbath in this way." Then the poor lad in his rags looked up at the city missionary, and said: "Oh, sir, it's very easy for you to talk that way, but God knows that we poor chaps ain't got no chance!" Oh that the tears of all the poor might drop into God's bottle!

PARENTS' TEARS.

IV. My subject also leads me to say that God has an intimate acquaintance with and a tender remembrance of all our parental anxiety. You sometimes see a man step right out from the most infamous surroundings into the kingdom of God. You say: "That is not logical; that man has not heard a sermon in twenty years; that man has not had any alarming providence; why is it he steps right out from the most debased surroundings into the kingdom of God?" This is the secret: God one day looks at the bottle in which He keeps the tears of His dear children, and He finds there a parental tear which for forty years has been unanswered, and He says, "Go to now, and I will answer that tear." Quick as lightning to the heart of that debased and wandering man comes the influence of the Holy Ghost, and he steps out of his sin into the light of the Gospel.

Oh, this work of training children for God and for heaven is a tremendous work! I know there are a great many people who have not been called to parental responsibility who have a very complete idea about domestic discipline. They know how children ought to be trained! But to every intelligent parent it is a tremendous question.

Now, there is a little child, and it is a beautiful plaything. It lies in the mother's arms. She looks down into its bright eyes, and she examines the dimples on its feet, and she says, "What an exquisite organism!" Beautiful plaything that child is. But one night while that mother is rocking that child to sleep, a voice drops straight from the throne of God, saying: "Do you know what you are rocking? That is an immortal." Stars shall die, but that is an immortal. The sun will die of old age, but that is immortal.

With some of you this is the chief anxiety. You try to train your children aright. You correct this folly, you chide that worldliness, and your midnight pillow is wet with weeping in parental anxiety; and you ask me to day, you ask me in silence, but I hear the question coming from hundreds of souls, "Is all this wasted?

re my prayers going to be heard? is all this multitude for nothing?" I answer, No. God has counted all the sleepless nights, God has heard all the counsels you ever gave to that boy—that girl in your household; God knows it all, and He has kept a record, and in lachrymal not such as is taken up from ancient sepulchre, but in a lachrymal that stands on His eternal throne, He has gathered all those exhausting tears.

The grass may be rank on your grave, and the waters may have faded from the tombstone under the dash of the elements, but He who has said, "I will be a God to thee and to thy seed after thee" will not forget, and some day in heaven, while you are ranging the fields of light, the gates of pearl will open, and garlanded with glory that wanderer will rush into your outstretched arms of welcome and triumph. The hills may depart, and the stars may fall, and the world may burn, and time may perish, but God will break His oath—never, never!

TEARS OF THE BEREAVED.

V. Once more I remark that God has an intimate acquaintance with and a tender remembrance of all bereavements. Now, that is a double which takes the red hearts and throws them like clusters into the winneps. Trouble at the store you can leave at the store; misrepresentation and abuse you can leave in the street where you find them; the lawsuit that damages your estate you can leave in the court-room; but bereavements are home trouble—you cannot get away from them. Your eye will see the vacant chair, will see the suggestive picture. You try to fly away from the ills, from the remembrance of bereavements. You go to Switzerland, but are sure-footed than the mule that carries you to the Alps, they climb to the tip-top and sit diving on the glaciers. You plunge into the amoth Cave, and you find them like stalactes hanging from the top of the great cavern. They come up behind you with skeleton fingers if they push you forward. They charge on you with glittering spear. They seem to come at a phazard, scattering shots from the gun of a reckless sportsman. Ah! no, no. It is good in that sends them in the right way, for God the archer.

ALL OBSERVED.

You have your grief fresh stirred by going into places where your loved ones once were with you; but they are gone now. Your grief will come quick as lightning express train as you go to the seashore or to the mountains. And I want to tell you once for all, that God knows your weeping. You come along by some hill and say: "This is the hill up which our boy used to run with great glee, waving his cap at the top." "Ah! you will say, this is the place where our girl gathered flowers out of the meadow and wove them into her sunny locks. Ah, who was it that broke that chalice? Who was it that froze the fountain of my heart?"

Perhaps during the past few months some of you have lost your aged parents. They will never pray for you again. Oh, how you would like to have that kindness again which used to look out from their old wrinkled faces, and speak to you in tremulous tones! You take up picture of them, and say it is a good picture; it, after all, it does not satisfy. You would like to hear once again the tones of the parental voice which always talked to you as though you were child, though for a long time you yourself had been a parent. God knows it all.

There is not a tear dropping in all these cities is moment but God knows it—God knows it. He sees the empty cradle. He sees the desolated earth, and I hear Him saying, "This is the way thresh the wheat, this is the way I scour my wells. Cast thy burden on my arm, and I will sustain thee. All those tears I am gathering to my bottle."

TEARS TURNED INTO PEARLS.

But you say, "Why keep in heaven the tears of earth? why that great lachrymatory on the throne of God? Well, my friends, I do not know that the tears will always stay there. I do not know but that after awhile some angel passing along will look at that great lachrymatory of heaven and find it empty. What sprite of hell hath broken into the gates and robbed that place of its jewels? This is the secret: those were sanctified sorrows, and those tears have been changed into pearls, and now they adorn the coronets and the robes of the ransomed.

I take up some coronet of light and I see gems sparkling in it, and say, "From what river depth of heaven did these jewels come?" And a thousand voices answer: "These are the transmuted tears from God's bottle." Then I see a sceptre stretched down from the throne of men who were trodden on by earth, and I see on every sceptre point, and I see inlaid in the ivory stair of the golden throne some very bright jewels, and I say, "Whence came they? whence came they?" and the elders from before the throne, and the martyrs under the altar coming up and standing on the sea of glass, cry in ecstasy, "These are the transmuted tears from God's bottle."

Let the ages of heaven roll on. All the pomp and pride of earth forgotten; the Koh-i-noor diamonds that were the pride of kings forgotten; precious stones that adorned Persian tiara or flamed in the robes of Babylonian processions forgotten; the Golconda mines charred in the last conflagration; but firm as the everlasting hills, and pure as the light that streams from the throne, and bright as the river that flows from under the eternal rocks are the transmuted tears of God's bottle. Let stand forever on the steps of heaven, on the steps of the throne. Let no hand touch it. Let no wing strike it. Let no collision crack it. Purer than beryl or chrysopterus, let it stand on the step of Jehovah's throne, and under the arch of the unfading rainbow. Passing down the corridors of the palace, the redeemed of earth will look at it, and think of their earthly sorrows sanctified, and say, "Why, that is what we heard of on earth; that is what the Psalmist spoke of; there is where our tears were kept; that is God's bottle." And while the redeemed of heaven are gazing on this richest inlaid vase in glory, all the towers of heaven will strike this silvery chime: "God hath wiped away all tears from all faces. God hath wiped away all tears from all faces!"

THE CRUSADE AGAINST VICE.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette, August 17.)

DR. TALMAGE, the great American Boanerges, the eloquent and popular pulpiteer, whose thunder is heard throughout the States, whose fiery anathemas and fearless denunciations rouse the good citizens of Brooklyn twice every Sunday, week in and week out, arrived in London a few days ago. When it became generally known that he was again on a visit to this country, he was, of course, soon deluged with invitations to occupy the London pulpits; but unfortunately for his admirers, perhaps, Dr. Talmage soon made it known that he was not open for any engagements, and his visit being solely for the purpose of obtaining rest and quiet, he decided only to preach on one occasion. Being asked which was to be the favored pulpit, he replied that he preferred to stand once more in the memorable Wesleyan chapel at City Road, famous for its associations with John Wesley, the founder of Methodism. Thither went thousands of people last night to hear the doctor, and the Cathedral of Methodism was the scene of

A REMARKABLE GATHERING.

Long before the time for opening the doors the quadrangle leading to the chapel entrance was crowded with an excited throng of people from all parts of London, determined at all cost to hear the opponent of Ingersoll and American infidelity. When the doors were opened, so great was the rush for admission that something like a panic ensued. Women and children were screaming and battling to get back again, while the surging crowd behind pressed closer and ever closer to the front. Those who did gain admission were literally carried en masse up the staircase, and reached the top in a state of frenzy, with hats and umbrellas left behind, never to be recovered. But worse was to follow. Instead of closing the doors the crowds outside were still allowed to fight their way inside, and it was not until an announcement was made that Dr. Talmage would preach to an overflow congregation in the open air that the almost indescribable excitement was allayed and the service commenced.

Speaking of the recent disclosures in this journal of the vicious traffic in innocent girls, in the course of an interview with the representative of the Pall Mall Gazette, Dr. Talmage said:

"In my opinion you have done enormous good. Your revelations have been read in every corner of the universe, and have set men thinking. In the States they are, I am told, the common subject of conversation (for I was away when they appeared), but I have read them carefully, and have discussed them from every point of view with many people, fellow-travellers by land and sea, who generally approve of the course that has been taken. Do I believe in their truth? Why, I have only been in London for a few days, and since my last visit, some years ago, I am absolutely appalled at the increase of alone. You say that obloquy has been heaped upon you. Notice it not. Agitate! agitate! agitate! Shall you stay your hand now that you have done this thing? No! no! no! Send forth your preachers into the public places, and tell your people the truth. You want six John Knoxes and six John Wesleys to sow the good seed in the barren places of the world. Agitate, and go on agitating. Good seed bears fruit slowly. You have shaken the world—sown the seed of a moral revolution. Agitate! agitate! agitate! Heed not the cries, the oburgations, and the anathemas. Let the clubmen and the aristocrats talk." "It has been said, Dr. Talmage, that we have pandered to pruriency by the plain language that has been used in setting forth these horrors, that much might have been suppressed." "There are only two methods, I take it, of dealing with such matters—the Byronic and the Biblical. Had you employed the first, the accusations levelled against the paper would have been just; but you employed the right, the only straightforward and proper method of stating your facts in the most telling manner, and the only manner to drive the horrible truths home to the community. That, at any rate, is my opinion, which you asked for."

"Another good," continued Dr. Talmage. "You have sounded in every family—sounded alarm in the bosom of every good mother, and brought the blood to the face of every right-thinking man. You say that some declined to allow your paper to lie in their parlors and their drawing-rooms for fear of contaminating their young sons and daughters. But how else are you to warn them? You cannot say to your children, 'There's a great evil of which you must beware, but I cannot tell you what the evil is.' If you warn them against gambling, you point out to them the evils of gambling and the ruin which follows. So I take it you must deal with this horrible sin. This is no time for shamefaced delicacy.

"You ask for a parallel. Take the case of Boss Tweed. He stole millions from the public exchequer, to common knowledge. For a time no one spoke. It was not until the scandal became too notorious that action was taken. There were many Boss Tweeds. Tweedism grew by force of example, until the evil had to be grappled with, not in one town alone, but many. Vigilance committees were formed, and it became known that Tweedism was not to be condoned. So it is with the question of vice. It flourishes for a time, and grows by flourishing. But a time comes at last when some man, bolder than his fellows, takes the matter in hand, and Publicity and agitation are two mighty swords."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Gospel Arrow Through the Window.—At a recent meeting Mr. Jack said: "When we were holding meetings in Finnieston a man lived close to the Church who was a great sinner, and do what we could we could not get him out to the meetings. But although he would not go to hear the Gospel the Gospel went to him. One evening he was sitting by the fireplace with the window open when some one was speaking at our open-air meeting. The words reached his ear, and the arrow of Gospel truth reached his heart, for while sitting there he saw himself as a lost sinner and gave himself to Jesus as his Saviour. He came over to the meeting shortly afterward and told us, with a beaming face, how the Lord had almost compelled him to be a Christian."

Nearly Drowned by Whiskey.—Mr. Morrison related the following: "One beautiful afternoon on the Atlantic Ocean on our way from Glasgow to New York, and while I was down in my cabin, suddenly the steamer stopped. I sprang on deck and found all the passengers looking in one direction. A man had fallen overboard, and now all eyes were eagerly watching the efforts of those who had gone to the rescue. Then the signal came that he was safe. How all those pale anxious faces brightened! But how had the man come by his accident? He had several bottles of whiskey, which he said had been given to him by friends, and of which he had partaken all too freely. His reason was affected, and when in this state he deliberately jumped overboard. For three days he remained unconscious, but when he recovered I spoke seriously of his soul's salvation, and now his feet are upon the Rock of Ages."

An American Belle's Conversion.—Mr. E. Payson Hammond said: "A young lady from a Southern State came to the North to visit her relations; and we have seldom seen one more thoughtless and gay. She had been trained in a home where religion held no place, and was a beautiful worldling—a worldling only. She seemed almost as regardless of religion as if she had never heard the sound of the Gospel. Among other friends, Miss Lena visited an aged lady who showed forth in her daily life the beauty of holiness. While in this Christian home, thoughtless and pleasure-loving as before, the aged friend did not directly address her upon the all-important subject, but she lived and talked Christ daily—yes, and hourly—and no doubt implored help from on high for the beautiful girl. After the lapse of several months Miss Lena went back to her Southern home, and by-and-by a letter came from her to one of her friends, in which she told of her conversion to Jesus. She said it was no sermon or religious conversation that had brought her to the Saviour, but the influence of the lovely Christian life led by her aged friend. It was to her so attractive and beautiful that she longed to imitate it, and, studying it, found that its beauty lay in the fact that it was like the life of Jesus Christ."

Willing to Face Six Deaths for Father.—"Some years ago a minister was called to see a little girl, seven years old, who was dying. She lived in a back street. When the minister got there a woman showed him where the child was, and he sat down to talk with her. 'What do you want, darling?' 'Well, sir, I wanted to see you before I died.' 'Are you dying?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Would you not like to get well again?' 'I hope not, sir.' 'Why not?' 'Oh, sir, ever since I became a Christian I have been trying to bring father to church, and he won't come; and I think if I die you will bury me, won't you?' 'Yes, darling.' 'Well, I have been thinking if I die father must come to the funeral; then you will be able to preach the Gospel to him, and I should be willing to die six times over for him to hear the Gospel once.' She died, as she had expected, and just before the time she was to be buried the minister was himself taken ill, and could not attend the funeral. But some time afterward a rough-looking man called upon him and held out his hand. 'You don't know me?' 'No, I don't.' 'I am the father of Mary—the father she died for. I heard as how she said she would die for me six times if I could only hear the Gospel once. It nearly broke my heart. Now I want to join the Church. He did join, and showed himself to be a true follower of Christ. That little girl was truly walking in the footsteps of Jesus, because she was willing even to die, in order that her father might be saved from his sins. If we do not need to die for others we should at least try to be like Jesus in living for them, and in doing all that we possibly can to lead them to be Christians.'

JEWISH NATIONALITY.

THE INDICATIONS OF ITS APPROACH.

By the Rev. Theodore F. Meyer, a Jewish Convert.

The Ancient Expectation—Never Abandoned—Revival in these Days—The Nests Stirred Up—In the Wilderness—Present Number of Converts—The Mission of the Jews.

THE one hope and expectation of the Jews from the very commencement of their national existence has been the coming of Messiah. Moses prophesied that He would come: "The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me: unto him ye shall hearken" (Deut. 18:15). Succeeding prophets described yet more fully the person and work of the expected Messiah. The Jews knew this, and was awakened in the latter centuries of the Jewish era. There was a spirit of expectancy, and when Jesus came they gave Him a hearing—at least, the common people—while a few faithful ones gave their avowed allegiance, and gave themselves to Him. After His resurrection and ascension, when He had been declared with power to be the Son of God, and while there was still a spirit of expectancy, we find three thousand on the day of Pentecost willingly receiving Him, and on the succeeding day about five thousand. We are told a great multitude, both of men and women, believed on Him, and then went forth and preached Him boldly. And Paul himself went forth preaching Jesus, the Son of God, to the scattered Jews, who were in expectancy of the Messiah, and there were some everywhere who believed.

The Judæo-Christian element was the most important element in the history of the Primitive Church, although we are apt now to forget that. Still, after all, He was rejected by the nation to whom He was sent, but the election obtained mercy. But we find this spirit of expectancy continued, notwithstanding the building up of the Talmudical system, which arose to take the place of the Messiah, who had not come, and to account for His absence.

This expectancy has continued. In the second century arose, and drew many into rebellion against the Romans, who with great difficulty subdued him. Others followed at various times, and even in the seventeenth century one found adherents in all parts of Europe, Africa, and Asia.

Consider for a moment how much this spirit of expectancy had to do with the basis of the Christian Church. It was prevalent when Christ came, and His disciples were drawn from the people who were looking for Messiah. After His death and resurrection the Apostle Paul, who was a Pharisee, went everywhere preaching the same message that Jesus was the expected One, and in all places some were convinced. In the miserable condition in which Jews now are—in many countries, scattered, scorned, hated, persecuted, and tormented, you will find burning in their hearts the hope of the Messiah affording them consolation and comfort. There are numbers of Jewish men and women who, forgetting everything else, are rejoicing in it, hope, and finding in it a balm for all their wounds.

In these times there are expectant ones in lands; and even in the darkest times of the Talmudical system, when it pressed heavily on the Jews, squeezing out their faith, and in the rationalistic days, there were and there are Jews who have been led to acknowledge Christ, not by the labors of the Church, but by the Spirit of God. The Church of the Middle Ages did all could to make Christianity hateful to the Jew even then many, from the study of Scripture, were led to accept Christ as their Messiah. And this

EXPECTANCY HAS BEEN GROWING.

Since the beginning of this century, since the French Revolution, things have changed more or less concerning their outward condition; Jews, even in the East, are no more shut up Ghettos, but take part in the social and political life, and in the arts of civilization and culture among the nations among whom they dwell. And a change has also come over the Rabbinic system. That system was the product of the isolation of the early ages, but the moment that isolation ceased Rabbinism lost its vitality although the form still exists. Being gradually emancipated from the Rabbinical system mar went to Atheism, some to Pantheism, and others adopted certain forms of the Christian Church in the synagogue, so that very much which distinguished our ancestors from the Gentiles began to disappear.

And here we come to see that, while modern Judaism and Rabbinism are diametrically opposed in many things, they have this in common—no Christ, no Christianity; while all the time there is still, as there has been in the past, a spirit of expectancy. Always in prosperity it dwindled away; in adversity it revived. So we see the strange fulfilment of the old words: "I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness and speak comfortably to her." The alluring to proceed by leading her into the wilderness we have seen this wilderness in these days Israel has been prosperous, and she forgot her hope. But there is

A TURNING OF THE TIDE.

We were startled some years ago by the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe—the bloody persecutions in Russia. Blood lies at the door of those who enacted these persecutions, and there are many things which may well make the Christian Church ashamed. I would speak more strongly if it were not I were myself a Jew—but for a that these things mark the turn of the tide Israel is being allured into the wilderness by the anti-Semitic movement, and notwithstanding the unbelieving spirit beginning to prevail thousands of hearts have been turned to the hope of Israel, and more Jews have been brought into the Christian Church than in the preceding fifteen hundred years. And not merely individuals, but numbers, for we have now, it is estimated, in the Christian Church somewhere between sixty and seventy thousand Jews, and among these many distinguished for learning, Christian zeal, Christian love, and Christian works, which give us a little sample and foretaste of what will be the case when "all Israel shall be saved" and be recognized as the people of the Messiah, and be known everywhere as His messengers and missionaries.

ISOLATION ENFORCED.

Now here the anti-Semitic movement has occurred, marking the turning of the tide nationally. There were many who were striving to throw off their nationality—they would be Jew no longer; or, at all events, only Jewish Germans or Jewish Russians, not German Jews and Russian Jews. They wanted to throw off their Jewish nationality, and especially was this the case in Russia. But they have been made again to feel there is a deep chasm between them and the Gentiles, and that they cannot throw off their peculiarities, for, as it is written: "Lo! Thy people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." They shall dwelt alone; they were not doing so when the persecution broke out, but they saw their error, many of them, and now the special hope of Israel has revived, and many are talking of

GOING BACK TO PALESTINE.

Ever since the persecutions in Russia and the social ostracism in Germany, the longing of the nation to return to Palestine has been growing, and it is still gaining in intensity and extent, notwithstanding all the difficulties that meet them. Their eyes are being directed anew toward Jerusalem. I wish you believers would take that view. There is much spoken against Jewish missions, but they are accomplishing the grand purpose of God; and, besides, you are bound by the noblest motives of gratitude to give back to the Jew what you received of him. You received mercy through their unbelief, that through your mercy they may obtain mercy.

DR. TALMAGE AT BETHSHAN.

At the usual afternoon meeting at Bethshan, on Drayton Park, Holloway Road, London, on Wednesday, August 12th, 1885, the Rev. Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, said:

"I did not expect to be called upon to say anything in these meetings. I did not come here in the spirit of idle curiosity, but as an earnest learner. On the other side of the Atlantic Ocean we have heard of Bethshan. Before leaving my home in Brooklyn I said: 'If I live to get across the ocean I will go and learn about the faith-cure,' and I am here to-day listening.

"Now, I have said for years that if the day of miracles is past it is because the faith of miracles is past. We hear the cry in America, The day of miracles is past; you must not look for extraordinary things. Well, if we do not look for extraordinary things we shall certainly not have them. When we cease to withhold the faith of miracles we shall have miracles. Divine healing is becoming the great question of all the earth. I am listening and watching. I do not know but the chief hope of the church's advancement is intimately bound up in this question. In my own church I have had this subject powerfully brought before me. And every minister of the Gospel will either have to accept this or point blank reject it. It has got to pass out of the region of surmise or conjecture into one of positive belief or denial. Now, it seems to me, in the face of all the testimony given here and in other parts of the earth, that if a man takes the responsibility of saying anything against it he takes a responsibility that I will not assume. Now, in my church I have had this thing presented with a power that is irresistible, the story of which has not been told because the man who has been wrought upon by the power of the Holy Ghost has not seemed to have quite the courage to speak out and tell it. He is modest and unpretending, and is somewhat afraid his account would not be fully accepted.

A SEA-CAPTAIN

came and sat down one night in the gallery of my church. He hated God and religious things. He had no faith in churches, ministers, or religion, or in anything that is good. He came because his wife asked him to come. During the progress of the service he saw there was a reality in religion, and gave his heart to the Lord Jesus Christ, was baptized, and received as a member of the church, and from that day to this he has given almost his entire time to the cause of God; for although he is employed by the shipping interest, his duties permit of the greater portion of his time being appropriated as he may see fit. This is the testimony he gave to me: 'I was telling you the other day of a lady who for twelve years had not walked. She was perfectly incapacitated for work, and had given up all idea of returning health. I told you she was restored to health, and is moving about in the duties of life, and has been to this church.' I said, 'Yes.' He replied, 'Here she is!' I said to her, 'Is this true?' She said, 'It is all true!' I said, 'Were you so thoroughly sick, and so thoroughly invalided as Captain Pennington has told me?' She said, 'Yes.' 'Are you well now?' 'Yes, thoroughly.'

"Another case came under my observation through the same process. A woman who for twelve years at the close of Captain Pennington's prayer saw, and took up a Bible and read. I said, 'Captain Pennington, why don't you go and tell the story—tell it abroad?' 'Well,' he said, 'I don't want to seem to be boasting, but it is marvellous how the Lord is with me.' Captain Pennington is a man who has the entire confidence of everybody who knows him. He has the entire confidence of the membership of my church; every word he says on any subject would be believed by the people of the church and by people of the world.

He went on to say, 'I was called to a house in such a street,' giving the number, 'to pray for a woman who was in paroxysms of suffering perfectly unendurable, and these paroxysms had been going on until there were very few persons who had the nerve to look upon them. As I entered the house I heard her cry from the bedroom. The physicians were there. I was invited to pray. Although I have seen many exciting things, having been a sea-captain for many years, I could not stand it. I returned to the hall to wait until the physicians came out. Then I went in. That particular paroxysm was over. I said to her, 'Do you believe that the Lord Jesus Christ can cure you?' She said, 'I do.' He knelt down and prayed with her. He came into the front room: the family were gathered there seated talking over the matter, and during the conversation the sufferer appeared, not having been able to walk for many, many months. And I have been told she has since been entirely restored.

What am I to believe? Is this a conspiracy? Why, if God can heal a soul cannot He heal a body? If He can do the greater work cannot He do the lesser? If He can cure a palsied soul cannot He cure a palsied body, which is not half so bad? If He can awaken the deaf ear of the soul cannot He awaken the deaf ear of the body? If He can do the larger work cannot He do the smaller work?

"I hardly know where I stand on this matter, but I simply declare before God that I believe the doors are opening in this direction.

WHAT DO THE PROPHECIES MEAN?

I cannot explain them in any other way, although I desire to put an interpretation upon them, just as any minister of the Gospel would, to his people. That prophecy which says, 'The eyes of the blind shall be opened and the tongue of the dumb shall sing'—what does that mean? Merely spiritual and physical recoveries! Have I obtained this faith? No! There is the point. A great many Christians believe, but they have not enough of that faith by which the lame man would leap, and the sick one get up. There are a thousand things you cannot do, and I cannot do, but they are done, nevertheless. It is an absurd thing to say, I don't believe in that because I cannot effect it. I have the idea that perhaps God gives a special grace to some. I believe He has given it to these brethren and sisters. He has not given it to me, that is my misfortune; but the fact that I have it not is no ground for infidelity. Now, the time is come when the ears of the Christian Church are to be opened to these testimonies.

"I believe in prayer. I could give instances of God's positive answer to prayer that would make your ears tingle—things just as remarkable as anything stated here this afternoon in regard to physical recoveries. I will tell you of what took place when was at the point of death. We carried her on board a steamer at New York bound for Savannah. Everybody who saw her go out of the house said she would never return. She was so feeble that in the berth on board the steamer she fainted, and it was impossible to remove her hat or shawl; there she lay all that night. Every time we touched her she would go into insensibility. Next morning at eleven o'clock she took my arm, and with very little help walked on deck. Why? At eleven o'clock, the very moment, the people in my church were praying for her recovery. I stated that occurrence in a meeting some ten years ago, and there were secular newspapers that derided it. They said, It is absurd to think there was any relation between the prayer offered in that church and that she walked up-stairs. I put the two together—they are evidently connected—and the time has yet to come when the church is willing to be laughed at and caricatured. I tell you that a religion that will not help the body as well as the soul is no religion at all.

"I tell you that I believe in prayer because there is that makes me believe. My grandfather and grandmother went to a great revival meeting in Baskingridge, New Jersey, and they were so impressed with the religious service that they went home and said, If we could only have our children converted, if we could only have this great influence in our family! That night all the young folks were to go off to a very gay party. Grandmother said, 'Now, when you are all ready for the party come into my room, as I have a word to say to you.' She was somewhat of an invalid, not able to get about much. The children came into the room where she sat, and she said, 'Now, you are going to the party, going to have a very gay time. I want you to know that all the time you are there your mother is praying for you, and that we will kneel and pray for you until you come back.' They all went to the gay party, and, as may be well supposed, did not have a very good time. They knew their

MOTHER WAS PRAYING

for them. Grandmother went to bed, and the next morning very early she heard crying and sobbing in the room below. It was one of her little party crying to God for mercy, seeking a new heart, wanting to act on the Christian life. My Aunt Phoebe said to grandfather, 'Go down and find what is the matter; go and hunt up Samuel—he is gone to the barn; he feels worse than I do.' Grandfather went to the barn and found Samuel there kneeling and crying to God for mercy. He told him the way of salvation, so that he became a minister of Jesus Christ, and there was no man more useful in America during the century than he. Then Samuel said, 'Go to the wagon-house; David is there.' Grandfather went to the wagon-house. There was David, afterward my own father. He told David the way to the cross. David became a Christian. David, then a young man, had some one to whom he was affianced at the foot of the lane, not far off—Catherine Van Nest, afterward my mother. He told the story of the cross to her, and she became a Christian. A great awakening resulted as this story went round the neighborhood, and people heard what things were going on in Mr. Talmage's family. Why, they were all getting converted, and was converted to God. And finally as many as two hundred and eighty from that neighborhood stood up in one church to profess Christ. That story lingered in my mother's mind until she made a covenant, after her children were born, with five of her neighbors, to meet and pray one afternoon of each week for the salvation of her household. These five mothers met. I did not hear this story till after my mother's death. Nobody knew why these five persons met, there was a sort of mystery about it. Sometimes the question was put, 'Mother, where are you going?' She used to answer, 'I am just going off a little while. They met to pray for their children; they prayed until they were all converted, myself the last. Oh! I believe in prayer. I believe you can get just what you ask of God if it is good for you. This story has no end.'

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Decision which May Lead to Important results was arrived at, on August 25th, by the Republican State Committee of New York. An inclination has been manifested since the last Presidential election to exclude from the primaries all who bolted the party ticket in November. Many local organizations have already done so, and the result has been to widen the breach in the party and decrease the chances of Republican success in the future. The State Committee, however, has resolved on conciliation. It has adopted a resolution inviting all voters to take part in the primaries "who adhere to the principles of the Republican party and whose general intention is to act with the party and promote its success by their votes and influence at the next general election, without regard to any so-called fundamental test." That concession opens the way of return and reconciliation, if the "Independents" choose to avail themselves of it. There are indications, however, that they will be guided as to their course in November by the character of the ticket. The day is evidently past when any nomination regularly made can command the support of the whole party. The Committee has done all in its power to heal the breach by inviting the bolters to assist in making up the ticket. The Republican Convention will meet on September 22d at Saratoga, and the Democratic Convention at the same place two days afterward. Senator Evarts is spoken of as the Republican candidate for the Governorship, and Mr. Edward Cooper, the son of the late Peter Cooper, as the Democratic candidate. There are, however, several other candidates whose claims for the respective nominations are being urged. The campaign will be a severe though a short one.

Why the Central and South American States do not trade with this country is explained in the report of the commission appointed to visit the River Plate country submitted to the President, which was published last week. The commissioners say, "The share of the United States in the enormous commerce of the River Plate country, which includes Paraguay, Uruguay, and the Argentine Republic, is lamentably insignificant, and less than it was half a century ago. The reason is very apparent. Twenty-one lines of steamships connect these ports with those of Europe, while there is no regular steamship communication whatever with our country. From forty to sixty steamers arrive at Buenos Ayres every month from Europe and not one from the United States. The flag of our country is never seen in these waters except upon men-of-war, and semi-occasionally upon some sailing vessel which happened to be chartered for some special voyage. An English company sends a steamer to New York when necessary where it discharges a cargo of hides and wool, and reloads with a cargo of merchandise for Europe. The few products of our fields and factories found there are brought sometimes in these chartered vessels, but more frequently come by way of Europe, the merchants with one voice saying that because of the absence of steam communication they can afford to buy in the United States only such articles as cannot be obtained elsewhere. Another reason which applies to Uruguay specially, is that the country is poor and cannot afford to purchase for cash, but is compelled to exchange her products for the goods she imports. Her main product is wool, which it does not pay our merchants to buy, while the present rate of duty is maintained.

The Prohibitionists of Pennsylvania Held a convention at Harrisburg on August 25th, and nominated Barr Spangler, a merchant of Marietta, as his candidate for the office of State Treasurer, which is the highest office to be filled this year. The Convention was enthusiastic over the progress of the party in the State. One of the delegates reminded the Convention that he had been a candidate of the party seven years ago, when the Prohibition vote for him was 12. Last year St. John's vote in Pennsylvania was 15,306. Mr. St. John, who was in the city during the session, was invited to attend the Convention. He was received with enthusiasm. A significant feature of the platform, indicating the character of the Convention, was the plank "that the Sabbath-day should be protected from profanation by secular pursuits and pleasures."

A Destructive Cyclone Struck the City of Charleston, S. C., on August 25th, inflicting damages estimated at more than a million dollars. No storm of equal intensity has ever been reported from that section. It commenced shortly before daybreak, and by six o'clock the streets were strewn with business-signs, limbs of trees, and overturned fences. The storm continued to increase in violence as the day advanced. The streets were gradually filled up with slates, bricks, signs, window shutters, and sashes, and above the howl of the wind and the soughing of the trees as they rustled and bent under the influence of the breeze could be heard the sharp rattle of falling bricks and slates. The dome of St. Michael's Church, which has weathered the gales of a century and escaped injury in the bombardment, was torn off, and the steeple fell into the street below. No less than eight other churches were unroofed, and one of the colored churches completely demolished. The shipping suffered severely, and the destruction of property on the wharves and piers was very serious. Over a mile of railroad track was torn up, and there was much damage of freight and rolling stock. The loss of life appears to have been confined to the shipping, but there were many escapes from falling buildings that seem almost like miracles.

Mr. Parnell Openly Declared for a Repeal of the union between Great Britain and Ireland at a banquet given in his honor in Dublin on August 25th. He said that there was only one thing on their programme—to restore the Irish Parliament. When that Parliament assembled in Dublin it would make tenants owners of their holdings and secure to laborers a share in the land. "If we use judgment and moderation," he continued, "we shall see the two English parties competing to settle the Irish question. There is something solemn and dazzling in the thought that we belong to a generation about to witness the finish of a struggle lasting several hundred years, opposed by such tremendous obstacles and odds." This announcement that he and his followers were working for that object has produced much excitement among politicians of both parties. It had been supposed up to the time of the Dublin meeting that nothing more radical than local self-government was aimed at by the Parnellites. There were indications that both the great parties were considering the propriety of conceding a limited measure of Home Rule, as a bid for the support of the Irish members of Parliament. Mr. Parnell's declaration has consequently produced general consternation, and its effect at present appears to be to unite both parties in opposition to him, and to maintain the integrity of the empire.

The Deaths from Small-Pox in Montreal Last week number two hundred and nineteen. Only one half of these were in the city proper, the others being in the suburbs. Precautions are being taken to prevent the spread of the infection, but in spite of them the disease is being carried to other cities. A case has occurred at Lachine, the result of the arrival there of a workman from Montreal. Other cases are reported from Caledonia Flats, Plantagenet, and Little Rideau, in which the infection was clearly traced to people from Montreal.

The Meeting of the Czar of Russia and the Emperor of Austria at Kremsier, on August 25th, was accompanied by a display of magnificence rarely equalled. As to the objects of the meeting, the Herald correspondent, who asserts that his information was obtained from an influential statesman, says: "In Gastein the Emperors of Germany and of Austria came to an understanding about the necessity of peace for and in Europe, and the Czar in Kremsier gave his assent to a lasting alliance, having for its object the maintenance of this peace. Austria has no interest in Central Asia. She has no other object but to 'cultivate' Bosnia. Germany considers her mission to be the maintenance of that which she has already won and to defend herself in case of a French war of revenge." It is, however, notorious that when emperors have met to insure peace, a war has too often followed.

The Cholera Record is now far in Excess of that of last year. The European correspondent of the New York Times, who made a personal investigation of the districts ravaged by the pestilence last summer, cables that the total number of deaths in Spain alone from this year's outbreak have been 81,489, and the death-rate is still much over 1000 each day. The plague has diminished in Granada and in most provinces that were attacked before the middle of July, save in Cuenca, but it increases steadily in Almeida and Barcelona. From France, outside of Marseilles and Toulon, no news is to be had, though it is known that the pest is spreading daily. Cases of persons who die in two or three hours are very common. The victim is stricken down before even diarrhoea or vomiting has begun, and dies in an extremity of cold on which violent friction has no effect.

The Difficulty between Germany and Spain in respect to the seizure by Germany of the two Caroline Islands is in a fair way for amicable adjustment. It is stated by the Spanish ambassador to Berlin, that Germany in occupying the Caroline Islands had no intention to prejudice any anterior rights which Spain might possess therein, and that if an examination into the question of Spanish rights to the Carolines should produce no mutual understanding, Germany would be still perfectly disposed to appeal the dispute to the good offices of some power friendly to both disputants. Germany claims that the agitation in Spain on the subject has been fomented by French agitators, desiring to produce a rupture between the two powers. The Spaniards, however, deny the assertion, and state that their animosity is only natural resentment at detecting a professedly friendly nation in the act of stealing their property.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying colored ministers and others with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been received since our last acknowledgment to the amount of $11. The amounts were: From Blackinton, Mass., $5; from Philadelphia, Pa., $5; from Gordonsville, Ala., $1.

Reports of a Disastrous Inundation in Canton, China, were received in Washington, D. C., last week. The writer says that the flood was the most serious which has visited Canton in thirty years. More than ten thousand persons lost their lives, and a far greater number are left in a starving condition. Entire villages were ingulfed, and the rice and silk crops in the vicinity were almost ruined. Thus, those who escaped drowning are in peril by famine. The price of rice has been raised eighteen per cent in consequence of the loss of the crop. The rain fell the latter part of June, filling and overflowing all the rivers. Many of the streets of Canton were flooded for over a week. At Sz Ni City the water broke through the city wall. It is reported that several thousand people were drowned in that place. The embankments of the rivers were broken in numerous places, and the water swept across the surrounding country, carrying everything before it. A pitiful picture is drawn by the correspondent of the misery and helplessness of the people. They beat gongs, burn incense, prohibit the killing of pigs, and beseech one idol to go to another and make him stop his raining. Of practical helplessness for themselves or others they seem to have no conception.

Better Discipline Appears to be Needed on board transatlantic steamers. Passengers who arrived by the Gallia, of the Cunard line, last week, complain that they were subjected to much annoyance by the proceedings of a number of men who were frequently intoxicated, and when in this state conducted themselves in a scandalous manner. It is said, among other things, that they amused themselves by throwing steamer chairs overboard. Complaints were made to Captain Murphy, but the nuisance continued unabated. The captain is said to have confessed himself powerless to act in the case.

Song Services in the Parks of New York on Sunday afternoons are attracting a large number of non-Church-goers, and promise to be a valuable and efficient agency for reaching the masses. They were commenced in Tompkins Park, at Avenue A and Eighth Street, through the persistent efforts of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, who, noticing the large number of working people who spend their Sunday afternoons there in the summer, was anxious that in some way they might hear the Gospel. Last Sunday a service of song was held in Battery Park also, and was largely attended.

A Summer Mission has been Conducted with much success at the Chicago Avenue Church (Moody's), in Chicago, Ill., during the past two months. Grave doubts were expressed by many as to the success of such a mission in the hot season, but Mr. Moody having urged that the effort might be made, the meetings were commenced. From the first a revival spirit was manifested, large congregations assembled, and many remarkable conversions have taken place. Such has been the interest, that at the end of eight weeks no diminution is manifested, and nothing is said about bringing the mission to a close. Major D. W. Whittle has preached, and Charles Herald has sung the Gospel with great acceptance. An open-air service has been held every evening on a vacant lot near the church, which has not only been the means of advertising the meetings, but in three cases, if not more, has been instrumental in leading souls directly to the Lord Jesus.

The Northfield Wagon is an Institution to which the recent convention gave birth. In the course of one of Mr. Moody's addresses he referred to the large rural population who were unable to attend church because they live too far away to walk, and had no means of conveyance. He said: "I asked Brother Bolton the other day why he didn't bring down some of his neighbors to church, and he replied, 'I should, but my wagon isn't big enough.' Now I propose that this church buy a wagon that will be big enough to bring all the neighbors that are less favored than those of you who have teams, and have it running up and down here every Sunday morning to bring people to the house of God. Now I propose to take up a collection right here this morning for it." The boxes went round, and the result was all that could be expected, for $125 was raised to purchase the first church wagon.

The Siege of a House is Reported from Boston, Mass. "A despatch from that city states that a legal warfare with force of arms is being waged for the possession of a house at Beverly. The trouble arose out of a questioned lease. A firm of lawyers in 1875 presented a bill for a thousand dollars to the owner of the house, and not receiving the money, attached his property in his absence, and purchased it at a sheriff's sale. The owner refused to vacate the premises or to pay rent. Several suits for ejectment have been brought, but owing to technical legal quibbles, no final decision has been obtained. Finally the lawyers leased the house, and on August 26th the lessee appeared on the scene with a posse of six men and took possession, turning the effects of the original owner out of doors. The men were kept on guard all day, but about ten o'clock at night the owner appeared with a hundred men, who laid regular siege to the house, and finally captured it, ejecting the ejectors. The furniture was restored, and a celebration held. The house has since been barricaded and garrisoned as for a siege, but it is thought the lawyers will prefer legal measures to siege operations in future. This incident will remind readers of Bunyan's "Holy War" of the siege of Mansoul. The anxious sinner, lamenting that Satan holds possession of his heart, may rest assured that if he once gives it to Jesus, Satan will never be able to recapture it (Luke 11: 20-22).

The Best Antidote to a Poison is Generally another poison, but the same rule does not often apply in morals. One case of the kind, however, is reported by the Atlanta Constitution. It is the case of a man whose vanity cured his appetite for liquor. He thus described his emancipation to the reporter: "I used to drink like a fish. People began to say that I couldn't quit, that I was ruined. That made me mad. I had a good deal of vanity, and I cultivated it—gave it a regular hot-house forcing. I worked myself up to a point where I imagined myself the greatest man in Atlanta, struggling with a crowd of malignant rivals who were hoping and praying for my downfall through the whiskey habit. I began to feel an exquisite pleasure in disappointing my imaginary enemies. This delusion of mine grew into an apparent reality. It dominates me yet. It has made me an offensive egotist, but it saved me from whiskey." It is safe to conclude that the reformed drinker was not a Christian, or he would have gone about his work in a different way. We may hope that, being sober, he will seek the higher blessing of salvation. In that endeavor he will have to abandon his delusion and learn that he is poor and helpless, and in need of strength not his own (Isa. 64: 6).

How a Lady's Extravagance was Cured by an object lesson is told by the Boston Transcript, which states that the incident is literally true. An elderly wealthy gentleman, who had married a beautiful lady much younger than himself, delighted to purchase for her everything for which she expressed a wish. The aggregate amount expended, however, mounted up, after a time, to a sum that astonished the husband; and thinking that his wife was not deficient in common-sense, he determined to teach her a lesson that would impress her. The next request was for "a lovely camel's hair shawl, which would cost only fifteen hundred dollars." The wife pleaded for a cheque on the spot, but the husband said he would bring the money from the office, and the next evening, with the assistance of his porter, he did bring home, and placed on the parlor table, fifteen hundred silver dollars. At the sight of this pile of metal, weighing nearly a hundred pounds, the wife exclaimed, "What are you going to do with all that money?" "Why, love," it's the money you wanted for the new shawl." "Does it take all that to make fifteen hundred dollars?" "Why, I had no idea it meant so much. I will do without the shawl, and will put it all in the savings bank, if you will let me." She did so, and has since added several sums to the deposit. The husband affirms that since that time his wife's purchases have been far less numerous and costly. Another kind of object-lesson, which might be beneficial to Christian people, would be to see some poor afflicted family saved from destitution by a sum smaller than they spend with the cigar merchant and the jeweller in a month (Isa. 58: 7).

A Man Imprisoned in a Bear Trap had a narrow escape from death two weeks ago in Vermont. A gentleman from Boston, Mass., who was spending his vacation in Vermont, became interested in bear-trapping. He was extremely anxious to catch a bear himself, and constructed an ingenious trap for the purpose. The trap was set in the woods at some distance from his hotel, and on August 18th he went alone to visit it. Finding it empty, he went in to arrange the bait. The trap was a big box arranged to catch the animals alive, and the amateur trapper accidentally sprung it, and found himself imprisoned. For thirty-six hours he remained in his prison with no water and but little air, and his only food was the repulsive raw meat with which the trap was baited, and which hunger finally compelled him to eat. The amateur trapper had no one to blame for his misfortune but himself, though that fact would only add to his misery. The important consideration for him was that, thanks to his own ingenuity, he was helpless, and unless outside help arrived he would die. He therefore shouted as loud and as often as he could. At last, to his intense joy, a passing party heard his cries and liberated him. The man's plight was pitiable, but there are thousands of men in worse case. Caught in one of Satan's traps through their own heedlessness, they are held securely by the power of evil habit, and are lost unless they cry to Christ, who alone has power for deliverance (Job 33: 27, 28).

Cattle Pounded by their Owner Involved him in some expense in Connecticut on August 22d. A despatch to the New York Sun from Bridgeport, Conn., says that Mr. P. T. Barnum visited his estate at that place two weeks ago. He was driving around his property, seeing that everything was in order, when his attention was attracted by a large number of cattle grazing in a fine field of grass which he owns at the corner of Park Place and Park Avenue. He was indignant, and ordered his attendant, who goes around with him and his show, to turn about and have the intruding cattle driven to the public pound. The orders were obeyed. At night the dairyman went to find the cows, and they were not to be found. This fact was communicated to the famous showman, who asked where the pasture ground had been changed, and that the cattle he had sent to the pound were his own property. He went to the pound, and found them locked in, and several dollars had to be transferred to the pound-keeper's pocket before that official would liberate the animals. Mr. Barnum, notwithstanding his extensive acquaintance with animals, evidently has not so good a memory of their appearance as the Scotch shepherds. It is said that they know the features of every sheep in their charge, though their flocks sometimes contain over a thousand animals. When Christ spoke of Himself as the Good Shepherd He referred explicitly to this intimate and individual knowledge which the Shepherd possesses. He said: "I know my sheep, and am known of mine" (John 10: 14).

THE TIMES.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having t. is seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."—11 TIM. 2: 19.

Paul's Many Difficulties—Anxiety about the Church—I. A Lamentable Overthrow—Signs which made Him Uneasy—A General Coldness—Teachers Erring—Professors Apostatizing—Ungodliness Increasing—II. The Abiding Foundation—III. The Inscription it Bears—The Royal Cartouche—The Transport Mark—A Sweeping Precept—German Silver not Wanted.

PAUL had met with many difficulties in his earnest career, but his most painful trials came from false brethren. A compact army of brave spirits, every man in health, and every man a hero, can march across a continent and strike at the foe time after time, and every stroke shall fall as from the hammer of Thor. But if you have the leadership of a great and motley host, and there are many sick folk to be carried in the ambulances, while others are faint-hearted, cowardly, and cold in the cause, and yet another company are half suspected of a design to go over to the adversary; then the captain's hair may well turn gray in a night at the thought of what may be the result of a battle. Paul was full of somewhat similar anxieties when about to leave the field of conflict to receive his crown. He was handing over his commission of watchman of the churches to Timothy; and as he did so, it was with a trembling hand, as he thought of the evil influences which were at work within the Church itself. Outside persecution seemed light enough to him, but internal dissension, heresy, and ungodliness weighed upon his spirit.

MISCHIEF-MAKERS.

When I read this Second Epistle to Timothy it reminds me somewhat—only it is a great improvement upon it—of David's addressing Solomon, and reminding him of those who had given him trouble in his lifetime, and exhorting him how to deal wisely with them lest his kingdom should be disturbed by them. You notice that throughout the Epistle the apostle makes more mention of troublesome individuals than in any other letter. In the first chapter there is Phygellus and Hermogenes; and now we come upon Hymenæus and Philetus. These dogs generally hunt in couples. A little further on you get Demas, and Alexander the coppersmith, who had done much evil to the apostle. The departing saint, harboring no resentment, yet has great anxiety of spirit as to what these mischief-makers might do with a young man like Timothy, since they had been such thorns in his own side.

CONFIDENCE.

It is a cheering thing to note that, while Paul mentions these things with a gracious anxiety, they do not disturb the serenity of his faith, nor make him question for a moment the success of the cause, nor doubt the success of the work which the Lord had wrought by his own hands. Courage, then, servant of God, whatever may be thy trials because of an apostatizing church; for thy faith will give thee victory. Be faithful to the word of the holy testimony, and the truth shall yet prevail. The campaign is not lost. Despite all that has happened or ever shall happen, not one jot the less "the foundation of God standeth sure;" the work of God goes on, and the reward which God gives to the workers is not diminished, nor even placed in danger. Wherefore in patience possess thy soul.

This morning with deep solemnity of soul I approach this text, and pray that the Spirit of God may bless it to us all. I see in it three things: the first, perhaps, is rather in the context; it is the lamentable overthrow of which the apostle has been speaking. He says that these two men, Hymenæus and Philetus, overthrow the faith of some. Secondly, we shall survey the abiding foundation—"the foundation of God standeth sure;" and then, thirdly, the instructive inscription upon the foundation-stone,

"The Lord knoweth them that are His. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."

I. First, let us think for a little of the lamentable overthrow which the apostle so much deplored. The apostle observed with sorrow

A GENERAL COLDNESS.

It was in some respect coldness toward himself, but in reality it was a turning away from the simplicity of the doctrine of salvation by grace through faith. He says in the 15th verse of the previous chapter: "This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes," two men, I suppose, of whom he had hoped better things; perhaps persons who had professed a warm attachment to his person. Their departure was the unkindest cut of all. A great want of spiritual life and zeal for the truth is our trial to-day. Laodicea is not the only church that is neither cold nor hot. I am at this moment unwillingly compelled to believe that a very serious blight is upon many of our churches. From a wide correspondence I gather that a wintry chill is just now upon the church; possibly it is not to such an extent as in certain terrible periods, but still to a very saddening degree. There is not that firmness in the faith, that holiness of life, and that enthusiasm for the cross of Christ that one would wish to see. I view the immediate prospect with serious anxiety.

Furthermore, the apostle saw with much alarm that teachers were erring. He names two especially, Hymenæus and Philetus, and he mentions the doctrine that they taught—not needlessly explaining it, but merely giving a hint at it. They taught, among other things, that the resurrection was past already. I suppose they had fallen into the manner of certain in our day, who spiritualize or rationalize everything. They say, "This is mythical. This death of Christ is to be understood as the triumph of self-sacrifice. This resurrection of Christ means the revival of forgotten principles." Thus they hold an atonement which is no atonement, and a resurrection which is no resurrection. They appear to accept the great historical fact, and yet they reduce it to fiction. This is the subtlety of the old serpent.

TRAITOROUS PREACHERS.

Somehow or other these men manage to extract from the Gospel an attractive philosophy; but it is not the Gospel which God intended to be preached. They seek rather the wisdom of man's thought than the revelation of God's thoughts. You need not that I go into particulars, for all around us men are dealing craftily with the truth of God, adulterating it, and in heart denying it. These are by no means persons to be trifled with; many of them are keen, acute, and thoughtful; and it is the great peril of the church at this moment that she numbers such among her teachers. These can stab under the shield. We care not for the besiegers without, but we are distressed because of the traitors within. God grant that this thing may go no further, but may His people become alarmed by the growing decline of the church, and resolve to be rid of this destructive influence, which eats as doth a canker.

In Paul's day many professors were apostatizing from the faith because of the evil leaders. Sheep are such creatures to follow something that, when they do not follow the shepherd, they display great readiness to follow one another. When Hymenæus and Philetus taught a highly intellectual doctrine, ever so many people, who fancied themselves to be cultured, must needs be of their mind. Hymenæus had discovered a method of being abreast of the times, so that the Christian teacher could figure in the heathen academy and be complimented for his liberal views. These "cultured" teachers looked down with contempt upon those uncouth fishermen who were so unlearned and ignorant as to believe that the teaching of Jesus meant what it said; for they themselves gave the Gospel a more rational meaning. They thought themselves profound and eclectic, men who could see the soul of things, and therefore they rejected the simplicity of the cross, and put in its place the theories of the philosophers. They took away the foundation facts under the pretence of building higher, and thus the faith of many was overthrown.

Paul also deplored that

UNGODLINESS INCREASING.

He says that the profane and vain babblings of his time increased unto more ungodliness. Oh, brethren and sisters, it is godliness that we want—the living of the soul with God, and in God, and to God. We need a holy fear of God, a sacred sense of God, a true delight in God. We want less of man and more of God. Less of mere creed-repeating, and more of vital faith in God; less following of men, and more following of God in Christ Jesus. More of union with God, living in God, and likeness to God. Oh, that He would work this in us! The world grows dark with accursed lust, and the Christian Church grows more conformed to the ungodly world. Persecutions unto death have ceased; it is easy and respectable to bear the Christian name, and hence the separation from the world, which is the glory of Christians, becomes less and less apparent. My heart is sore wounded with the sight of some who will come into God's house and undertake God's service during the Sabbath day, and yet during the week they are unjust, oppressive, graceless, and greedy—not servants of God, but servants of self and sin. By unholiness the cross is dishonored, the Holy Spirit is grieved, and Christ is put to an open shame. All this vexes the heart of the apostle in his day, and it is our cross and burden at this hour. "Lord have mercy upon us! Christ have mercy upon us!"

II. Now let us turn to the subject which supplied Paul with consolation. He speaks of

THE ABIDING FOUNDATION:

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure." It is a joy to quit the ever moving flood for the firm, substantial rock. It is bliss to feel that there is something under your foot, something substantial, abiding, sure. Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure.

What is this foundation which standeth sure? Those who have interpreted the passage have given many meanings to it, but I believe that all those meanings are really one. For the sake of clearness I would give three answers to the inquiry: the foundation is, secretly, the purpose of God; doctrinally, the truth of God; effectively, the Church of God; in all, the system of God whereby He glorifies His grace. The foundation is the divine purpose. Though men prove fickle, false, and wicked, and the church is thereby sorely grieved, "nevertheless" God's purpose is carried out; the covenant of grace is fulfilled, and the glory of God is revealed.

The apostle also meant the divine truth, which is the foundation of the Gospel. He had been speaking about certain truths which were spirited away by those two unworthies, Hymenæus and Philetus, and he says, "Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure." Interpreters have thought that Paul points at the doctrine of the resurrection. No doubt he does; but he includes every other doctrine which is a foundation truth of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Yonder is a man who has proved that Jesus is not truly God. Let him prove what he likes, since Jesus is God for all that. Another man has disproved the substitutionary atonement of Christ; let him disprove it if he pleases, for it is just as true. Rhetoric and logic can do wonders in appearance, but they do nothing in reality. Brethren, the Gospel is none the worse for all the opposition which has surrounded it, though it has been as fierce as devouring flame. Only the additions of men have been burnt out of it. Everything that can be consumed ought to be consumed, and only that which cannot be burned is really God's eternal truth.

But, further, I think Paul meant here not only the purpose of God, and the truth of God, but God's divine work in the world in the salvation of His own. You look upon the church and lament that so many have turned aside; that so many others are very poor specimens of Christians; that so many more are sadly questionable; and that a certain company are evidently false. Well, it is very sad; but yet there is a remnant according to the election of grace: "The foundation of God standeth sure."

III. Now we are, in the third place, as we may be helped of the Holy Spirit, to look at this foundation and observe

THE INSTRUCTIVE INSCRIPTION.

The custom of putting inscriptions upon foundation-stones is ancient and general. In the days of the Pharaohs, the royal cartouche was impressed upon each brick that was placed in buildings raised by royal authority. The structure was thus known to have been erected by a certain Pharaoh. Here we have the royal cartouche, or seal, of the King of kings set upon the foundation of the great palace of the church. The House of Wisdom bears on its forefront and foundation the seal of the Lord. The Jews were wont to write texts of Scripture upon the door-posts of their houses; in this also we have an illustration of our text.

The Lord has set upon His purpose, His Gospel, His truth, the double mark described in the text—the divine election and the divine sanctification. This seal is placed to declare that it belongs to the Lord alone, and to set it apart for His personal habitation.

If I might use another illustration, I can suppose that when the stones for the temple were quarried in the mountains, each one received a special mark from Solomon's seal, marking it as a temple stone, and perhaps denoting its place in the sacred edifice. This would be like the first inscription, "The Lord knoweth them that are His." But the stone would not long lie in the quarry, it would be taken away from its fellows, after being marked for removal. Here is in the second inscription: "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." The first seal marked it for the Lord, the second secured its removal from the common stones around it. First comes election, and sanctification follows. I want every professing Christian to have that double mark, and so to be Christ's man, known of all to be such by coming out from the unclean, and being separated unto the Lord.

The text teaches us that the Lord discriminates: "The Lord knoweth them that are His." Some who bear His name are not His, and He knows them not. He will say of them at the last, "I never knew you." They are supposed to be His, they suppose themselves to be His, they are taken into His Church as His, they continue throughout a long life nominally His; but they are discovered at the last. There is another and severer test than that of ministers, and elders, and church votes; the Lord discovers the secret things of the heart. Be not deceived, God is not mocked.

"The Lord knoweth them that are His" signifies that He is familiar with them, and communes with them. They that are really the Lord's property are also the Lord's company; He has intercourse with them. They know Him, and He knows them. He makes Himself known to them, and they make themselves known to Him. Oh, brothers, do you know God Himself? Does God know you? Will He ever say, "I never knew you"? When I have been cast down I have said unto the Lord, "Lord, Thou canst not say Thou dost not know me, for I have knocked at Thy door by the hour together; I have burdened Thee with my needs, and haunted Thee with my groanings. I have been Thy daily beggar, receiving large alms at Thy hands." It is a blessed thing to be sure that we are not unknown in heaven. At least we have the fellowship of asking and receiving, if no more.

The second seal is, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." Observe how the practical always goes with the doctrinal in Holy Scripture. Those whom free grace chooses free grace cleanses. We are not chosen because we are holy, but chosen to be holy; and being chosen, the purpose is no dead letter, but we are made to seek after holiness. Note that the word is universal as to the persons of believers: "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." This is as to the thing to be avoided; let him "depart from iniquity"—not from this or that crime or folly, but from iniquity itself, from everything that is evil, from everything that is unrighteous or unholy. Oh, ye Christian people, be holy, for Christ is holy. Do not pollute that holy name wherewith ye are named. Oh, ye people of God, if you are indeed the Lord's, let no sin dwell with you. Do not say, "It is a constitutional sin." You are born again, what have you to do with the old constitution but to mortify it? Do not say, "Oh, but others do it." What have you to do with others?—to their own masters they stand or fall. Depart from iniquity on your own account, even as Israel departed out of Egypt. Let your family life, your personal life, your business life be as holy as Christ, your Lord, would have it to be.

Brethren, I conclude with a brief but earnest appeal. Let us seek after the highest degree of holiness. Let us not be satisfied with being nominal Christians; let us aim at the greatest measure of godliness. Let us plunge into the stream of grace, immersing ourselves wholly into the life of God. How many professors appear to know nothing of the real force and energy of the Spirit of God in subduing sin and creating holiness! There is a shallow life. Alas, how much they lose! They come under the obligations of the house of God, but they do not know the infinite privileges of that house. It is for the truly spiritual that God reserves the choicest of His dainties. Be and you shall have enough religion to make you miserable; be wholly a Christian, and your joy shall be full. Walk with God in the light as He is in the light, and you shall have fellowship with Him, such as shall make earth akin to heaven. Take a little light and a little darkness, and attempt to make a mixture of them; seek to join the church and the world, and you shall have neither the pleasures of the world nor the comforts of the Spirit. It is a pity for a man to miss joys which an angel might covet!

What an injury such professors are to the church! Each one pulls his fellow up or drags them down. Every man in the church is either a help or a hindrance. No Christian man can live to himself. He may attempt to confine himself within his own ribs, and button up his coat, and fancy that what he does is to himself alone, and that his tongue and his heart are his own; but it is not so. An aroma steals forth from every man's life, and it is either like the spikenard of the alabaster box, or like the reeking of a dung-hill. God help us to remember our influence upon others.

SOLID METAL.

Think also how much the world is injured by Christians who are not Christians! Oh, friends, we want nowadays a sterling Christianity. We cannot do with German silver now; we must have the real metal. I was about to say I would sooner you had no religion, and made no pretence to having any, than to have the imitation of it. Sin is real to-day. We have heard enough of how far sinners will go. Oh, for a Church of God that shall shake itself loose from the world! If we had but once such a church, there were hope for our age. God send it!

Last of all, how is Christ shamed and dishonored when we are not holy, but worldly, covetous, proud, and unloving! Oh, sirs, it seems to me that since the foundation of God was laid in agony and bloody sweat, and since God Himself became incarnate that He might lay the foundation of holiness in the world, we ought to take heed how and what we build thereon. We must come to it, for "other foundation can no man lay"; but it behoves us to come very solemnly to it, and to know what we mean by building thereon. True godliness is not to say, "I believe," but to believe; not to talk of repentance, but to repent; it is not to speak of regeneration, but to be born again; it is not to talk about consecration, but really to live to God; it is not to speak about the Holy Ghost, but to have Him dwelling in you. Be it ours to have truth in the inward parts and grace in the core of the heart. Oh, may God bring us to this! We ask it for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake. Amen!

THE CONGO MISSIONARY STEAMER.

MR. T. G. COMBER, to whom Mr. H. M. Stanley refers in his work on "the Congo" as the missionary in charge of the station at Leopold Hill, has sent the following account of the arrival in sections at Stanley Pool of the much-needed missionary steamer "The Peace."

"Away up there at Stanley Pool, floating on the as yet unbroken and smooth water, is our little steamer, Peace, to carry the glad message which the angels sang over Bethlehem, of peace and goodwill to all mankind, to the troubled, restless, cruel, and degraded tribes beyond. This steamer had to be carried up on men's heads the whole of the distance we ourselves travelled. There were wanted eight hundred strong men to carry her from Underhill to Bayneston, again another eight hundred to take her on to Wathen, and once more, a third set of eight hundred to take her to Stanley Pool. Five years ago, and no stranger, whether white man or Congo of San Salvador, could take that long journey without great and frequent peril from violence—onset with stones and sticks, jungle around alive with armed and threatening warriors, highway robbers ready to plunder, bullets, spears, and knives displayed, and sometimes used. Now, not only can we pass unmolested, unaccompanied by caravan or escort, if need be, but we are able to dispatch caravan after caravan with the plates, machinery, fittings of our steamer—in all eight hundred loads—carried in turn by twenty-four hundred carriers, unaccompanied by any European, and every part of the steamer arrived safely and undamaged at Stanley Pool; and this in four months."

"Then came the work of putting the Peace together. It is such a unique and remarkable tale that I think that wherever the story of the founding of the Congo Mission is told it should be told how Grenfell put together the steamer Peace. Grenfell was to have had an efficient staff to help him reconstruct the Peace, the first building of which he had superintended. His specially fitted companion, our dear brother Duke, died just on the threshold of his work. The two young mechanics, engineer and riveter, fell on the journey up to Stanley Pool, which place they never saw. Thus, as far as skilled human assistance was concerned, Grenfell was alone. But with dauntless spirit and energetic effort, Grenfell set to work to rebuild the steamer himself, although only an amateur. He knew her well, however, every plate and rib, every tube and tap, and pipe and board, of hull, machinery, and fittings; and, calling around him the black men—natives of Sierra Leone, Victoria, Loang, and Congo—he laid the keel; plate after plate was fitted and carefully riveted—many thousands of rivets; the complicated boiler, the engines, propellers, were all carefully adjusted and fastened into position, cabin, deck, awning, windows, door, fittings—everything was carefully fastened in its place, and the day came for launching. God's blessing upon her!

"She slid down the launch-ways, and floated complete upon the waters of Stanley Pool; fires were lighted, and away went the messenger of peace and goodwill upon her Congo trial trip, making as good speed as she had done upon the Thames. When I think of the success of that part of our work, I feel that you must have been earnestly and fervently praying for us. The Peace has already made one journey of over one thousand miles in going and returning, and is now away on a long voyage of four months to choose the stations on the upper river for which there are as yet no men ready.

"Where are our missionaries for the upper river? The work has gone on too quickly for you all! You are not ready. The Lord has flung wide open the door into Central Africa. The tribes and peoples of the far interior of the Congo do not come out in pursuit of us, launching spear and drawing bow, and desiring to feed upon us as a new kind of meat, but actually ask us to come and live among them. The day Livingstone longed and prayed for, the day earnestly desired by Saker and Thomson, has come, and we can get into Central Africa with comparative ease. Does any one wish to make an easy trip to Central Africa? Take steamer to Banana and up to Underhill; a hammock and ten men shall carry you up by easy stages in twenty days to Stanley Pool; our little steamer, the Peace, is there in splendid order and condition, and off you can go to the centre of the Continent. All the great difficulties seem to be over; no one will want to shoot you or eat you; and if you say you are a friend of Bentele or Vianga-Vianga, or any one of us, you may be sure of a warm welcome everywhere. So much for the greatness and accessibility of the field to which you have sent us. The Lord, as to this, has exceeded all our thoughts and desires. Of course, we owe much to the work of Mr. Stanley."

A MONSTER PETITION.

A MEMORABLE scene was witnessed in the British House of Lords on Monday, August 10th. The Lord High Chancellor, who is ex-officio President of the House, as our Vice-President is of the Senate, was in his place, popularly known as "the woolsack;" the two barristers, who are clerks of the House of Lords, were seated at the table; while on their left, on the front ministerial bench, was the Premier, the Marquis of Salisbury, with his arms folded. Beside him was another member of the Cabinet, and behind him the bishops in their robes. On the opposite side of the House was seated the ex-Secretary of the State Department, Lord Granville. The business of the House had just commenced, when they approached the table one of the Parliamentary officials, carrying a huge petition. Lord Mount-Temple promptly rose, and standing at the table, announced to their lordships that the huge roll of paper they saw was a petition from fifty-five thousand citizens, who in one week had affixed their signatures to it, praying that a certain bill might be passed by the House. The petition was drawn up by the Blue Ribbon Gospel Army, of which the Rev. M. Baxter is President, and copies of it placed in the hands of the officers, who in a few days had collected that enormous number of signatures. The bill which the petitioners desired Parliament to pass was one for the better protection of young girls from the wiles of vicious men. Heretofore a man who seduced a girl over thirteen years of age escaped punishment, unless he was guilty of violence. The bill under consideration proposed to raise the age to eighteen, as many girls above thirteen and under eighteen are in need of legal protection.

In presenting the petition Lord Mount-Temple took occasion to refer to the means which had been used to arouse public opinion on the subject. It had been urged that there was no need for the Pall Mall Gazette to take the matter up, because Parliament was already in possession of the facts from the report of one of its committees; but Lord Mount-Temple reminded the House that when the bill, which was founded on the recommendations of the Lords' Committee, was brought in, it had no public feeling behind it. In effect, though his lordship was too courteous to state the fact in plain words, Parliament would not pass the bill until the people rose in their might and forced them to do so.

No better justification of the course pursued by the Pall Mall Gazette could be afforded. We understand that a compromise on the bill was effected, and the protected age was fixed at sixteen.

THE BRIDGE TOLL PAID.

AN evangelist who had been holding a series of services in a manufacturing town was standing one afternoon at the entrance to a bridge at which a toll was demanded of foot-passengers. Three laboring men came up as he stood there, whose faces he thought he recognized as some he had seen at his meetings. They accosted him respectfully, and asked if he would pay their fare over the bridge. They were on their way home from work in a distant part of the city, and when they came to the bridge every one of the three was found to be without money in his pocket. The evangelist thought he saw an opportunity for a practical illustration of the lessons he had been trying to impress on his auditors, and this conversation ensued, as narrated by the preacher: "Turning to one of the men, I asked him if he knew the way to heaven? With a very broad stare in his face, he nervously replied, 'Jesus Christ is the way.'"

"That is right; you know the way. But it seems to me that knowing the way is not enough, for you all know that your way home is along that bridge; and, after all, you can't get home. How is that?"

"For the want of money, sir, to pay the bridge." "Exactly so. Then if I pay for you as you have asked, will you get over?" "Yes, sir." "Just the same as if you had paid yourselves?" "Oh, yes," they answered, with a smile. "And if you knew that your way to heaven had been paid, the fact that you had not paid it yourselves would not make you doubt about getting there?"

"No," said the men, though not quite so promptly as in the question of the bridge. "Your way is paid; do you know what the price was?" "I suppose you mean Christ had to die for us."

"Exactly; now you know that the way is open you will enter it, will you not?" A dead silence.

"Ah, my dear fellows, you know the way, but you are not yet walking in it; come on, and I will show you how you may get across the bridge, by which I trust the Lord may open all your eyes."

"After paying the toll for the bridge for them, I said, pointing to the keeper, 'That toll-collector will not keep you back any longer now?' 'No, sir, not now; the toll is paid.'"

"Do you believe that I have paid for you?" I asked them. "We do believe it," was the reply.

"Well, my friends, you have my word for it, and you are going to act upon it. I want you to act on Christ's word in the same way. He said, 'God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever BELIEVETH in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' I then left them, and they wended their way over the bridge in silence, impressed, I sincerely trust, by the practical illustration which, defective as it was, struck at the heart of a difficulty which I have found is one of the most stubborn that inquiring souls encounter."

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Wreck.

WHILE Dr. Arnold is visiting his patients and hastening to return before night to the bedside of his interesting little friend, let us glance at a home in a seaboard village on the coast farther north. It is that of the Vicar of Lingford.

The wind was moaning around it this September evening, making the little family inside draw their chairs closer to the fire. The morning and early afternoon had been clear and fine, but at sunset a change had come and the wind rose, reminding every one that the long dreary winter would soon be at hand. Lingford was a straggling village composed mostly of fishermen's cottages, many of them little more than huts, and two or three small farm-houses a little distance inland. The cottages were scattered here and there along the cliff, and half way up stood the vicarage; while nearly at the top was the old church, gray with age, and much covered with ivy.

The vicar, old Mr. Lindsay, looked, like his church, both gray and aged, and each winter his parishioners thought would be his last; but still he kept on, his regular habits of life from youth having insured to him a long life and a healthy one.

On this particular evening the usual party, Mr. Lindsay, with his two daughters, Jean and Margaret, were in the vicarage dining-room. The ladies would scarcely have been taken for sisters, so unlike were they, and evidently there was a great difference between their ages.

Margaret, the elder, was verging on forty, and looked as if she had never seen any side of life but the prose side. She was a handsome woman, with clear-cut, regular features. An imposing, grand air was around her, as if she were a queen or some grand lady accustomed to receive deference and have her commands promptly obeyed. But there was something lacking in Margaret Lindsay. She was not a woman to be loved. Every one instinctively felt that. Respect, admiration might be given her, but love seemed repelled by her stern, austere manner. Her features seemed to be cut out of rock or ice. They never melted in sympathy, never relaxed in merriment. She did her duty conscientiously, and she expected all around her to do theirs. Words of praise or endearment never fell from her lips, but neither did angry, passionate words. Cold, imperturbable, dignified, she held on her way, and her heart was closed even against those of her own flesh and blood. That had been her way from childhood, and though all felt that she was a good woman, no one had ever spoken to her of love.

Jean was about nineteen, with such a bright, fresh face that it did one good to look at it. She was certainly a sunbeam in the room, though her brightness met with little or no response from her companions.

Punctually at nine o'clock Mr. Lindsay rang the bell, and Jean stood up to reach down the large family Bible.

"How the sea roars to-night, father! the wind gets higher and higher every minute."

"God help our poor sailors!" was Mr. Lindsay's reply.

By this time old Sarah had come into the room. She was the only servant at the vicarage except Gillings, who was chiefly an out-door servant and did not sleep in the house.

Slowly Mr. Lindsay opened the Bible, and then gave out the 107th Psalm.

Jean, it is to be feared, thought prayer-time rather wearisome, and seldom listened very much, but let her mind wander far away to other things. She was almost startled to-night as her father, in his deep tones, read the 23th verse: "For He commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof." And then, again, the 29th verse: "He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still." Often had storms burst over Lingford Vicarage, but Jean thought she had never heard the wind rage as it did to-night, and it seemed to lend a new meaning to the familiar words of the Psalm.

When the prayer was finished the simple supper was taken, after which the little family parted for the night.

Jean, from her own choice, had lately taken possession of a little room on a story above that on which her father and sister slept; she liked being away from the others, for only Sarah's little room was near it, and she was little likely to intrude on her solitude.

To-night Jean had no desire for sleep, and when at last she felt satisfied that her father and sister were safe for the night, she blew out her candle and with a jump mounted her favorite window-seat. No seat in the house was comparable to this in Jean's eyes. Often had she sat there watching the glittering ocean spread out before her in its grandeur, eagerly following with her eye the passing vessels till they were lost to sight.

Poor Jean had never known a mother's love, and her ardent nature longed for sympathy which she could not get in her own home.

When quite young she had loved to wander away on the rocks by herself, and enjoy seeking for shells and seaweed and other treasures of the shore.

These rambles, however, one day came to an end, greatly to her sorrow. She had walked on, not thinking of time or tide, absorbed in picking up the seaweed which had been thrown up by the storm of the previous night. All at once, on looking round she found herself on rocks surrounded by water. The tide had been coming in fast, and there seemed no way of escape.

Meanwhile, at home, the dinner-hour had come, but no Jean; half an hour had passed, then three quarters, and Mr. Lindsay went out to seek his little daughter.

Old Jack Smith, hearing the child was missing, and knowing her love for rambling along the shore, seemed to guess the state of the case, and without waiting hardly to answer Mr. Lindsay's inquiries, ran down to the shore, and in a minute was in his boat, rowing fast toward the rocks. There he soon spied Jean's white, frightened face, the water just covering her feet. Jean little thought then of the Heavenly Father's care of His child, that Father's care of all His creatures, that even a sparrow falls not to the ground without His knowledge.

Many of her sailor friends were anxiously looking for her, for the child was beloved by all the village, and it was a welcome sight to many eager eyes when they saw Jack bringing her back to her father. Jean had grown up among them from her babyhood, and many remembered the sweet young mother who was with them for such a short time, and then was called away, leaving her fair child behind her. How she loved to hear all they could tell about her mother, till she longed and yearned for that mother's love.

There was not much to tell. Mr. Lindsay had lost his first wife when Margaret was about twelve years old, and when after some years he brought home a second sweet young wife, the people wondered how it was their grave, cold perky man had won for himself a bride so fairy-like, so bright and lovely. Her health soon failed, however, and when the little Jean was born she had to leave her motherless, almost as bad as alone in the cold, weary world—and yet not alone, for she knew the mother's God would never forsake her child.

On this night Jean sat dreaming much longer than she thought. Sometimes the moon would peep out from behind the clouds and light up the cliffs and the sea. Then the fast-flying clouds would almost cover it again, and ever and anon far out on the horizon she could see vivid flashes of lightning. She almost jumped as she heard the old clock on the staircase strike, it sounded so loud in the stillness of the house, and she counted, and to her astonishment found it was twelve o'clock.

"I must go to bed," she thought to herself, but, waiting a second, she unfastened the casement window very softly and leaned out, intending just to listen for a moment to the roaring of the waves.

As she did so she was startled by a booming sound. "It cannot be," she thought to herself; "it is only the waves beating against the cliff"—and again she listened. One or two waves rolled in, breaking, with majestic grandeur, on the shore, and then again came the booming sound. There was no mistake this time; Jean knew it only too well—the minute-guns of a ship in dire peril. Again and again it came, till Jean, thrilled all over, could stay no longer. Slipping a warm shawl round her, she very quietly unfastened her door, as quietly slipped down-stairs, and went out at the front door. Once out she was soon fleetly running down the garden, and as she went out of the gate nearly ran up against old Jack. He could not believe it was really Jean, and with difficulty satisfied himself that it was not her ghost.

"Oh, Jack! it must be a vessel in sore distress; do let us make haste."

With quickened steps, two or three minutes more brought them to a projecting knoll, where a group of men and women were already gathered eagerly watching. A flash of lightning at the moment revealed a fine vessel not far from the shore, rolling fearfully, and strained at every joint.

"Jack! can nothing be done?" Jean cried, in her eagerness forgetting what poor chance a small boat had of living in such a sea.

No braver men could have been found on all that coast than those that were gathered on that cliff, but they knew it was worse than useless to attempt anything at present. When the tide turned, which would be in about an hour, perhaps the wind might go down a little.

So there they stood, this band of men and women, enduring the agony only sailors and their wives can know to its fullest, of watching a vessel containing fellow-sailors for whom they see but little hope of rescue. The group was very silent; their hearts were too full for utterance, and every eye was endeavoring to pierce the darkness, to see if the good ship were still holding out.

Every now and then a prayer was heard, and Jean, perhaps for the first time, there in the midst of the excitement, thought of what prayer was, even the longing cry to an all-loving, all-powerful God.

The guns still boomed at intervals, but it seemed as if those who fired them were fast losing hope. At last the hour was passed, the tide turned, and with it the wind slightly abated.

Some of the brave fellows prepared at once to set off on their hazardous errand of mercy. Soon all was ready, and, with a ringing cheer, those on the shore sent them on their way. They thought they heard floating on the wind an echoing cheer—perhaps it was fancy; perhaps the poor shipwrecked ones had caught the sound, and it had given them a gleam of hope, and they were answering back again. Brave men, that could thus go forth to save their fellow-men, eh! and brave women, too, that could thus see their dearest go forth to danger for the sake of others.

It has been said, "Men must work and women must weep." I would rather say, and women must wait. Only a woman's heart knows how hard the waiting is. Work is exciting—work helps to bear; but just to wait—I was going to say, and do nothing. But stop! who would say that the woman waiting and praying is doing nothing? Oh! fathers and husbands, lovers and brothers, you little know how much you owe to women's prayers. Some danger passed, some temptation overcome—because somewhere a woman is praying for you. Has the Master said, think you, only to one woman, "Oh, woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt"?

Jean was a girl of intense feeling, and this hour had roused her and made her, no longer the thoughtless girl, but the woman ready to work and act.

As she heard the boats retreat, she thought to herself, "There will soon be some cold and wet that will need all we can do for them." And with a hasty word to Jack's wife she set off swiftly toward the Vicarage. When she reached it she saw lights in the windows, and soon found that her father and Margaret were up, the storm having completely prevented any thought of rest for that night. In days gone by Mr. Lindsay would have been foremost on the shore helping and directing, but now he was unable to risk the exposure, and Margaret staid with him.

Jean ran in, breathless with her exertion.

"Father, there is a wreck—two boats are gone out to the rescue—the men think there is some hope of saving life still. We must have fires and hot blankets ready—some will be needing them soon."

At this Margaret bestirred herself; she was just the person for such an emergency, for she seemed to know what to do and how to do it. She and old Sarah at once set to work making up fires and getting ready hot blankets. Jean quickly saw her help was not needed there, so slipping away, she ran to the shore again.

The anxious group were standing there still, and made way for her as she came.

Just then they thought they heard a cheer come across the sea, but the wind and sea still roared so much that it was difficult to be quite sure. Soon came another cheer, which seemed much nearer; and before long they could distinctly hear their comrades calling to them. It was evident one boat at least was at hand; but as it came in, wave after wave breaking over it, those on shore felt instinctively that all was not well.

By the light of the lanterns several carried, Jean saw that the brave men had at least been able to rescue some, but from the grave faces she felt sure that in the midst of joy there was much sorrow.

The sailors were now, Jean saw, lifting some one very carefully out of the boat; and as the light flashed it fell upon the sweet face of a girl about her own age, looking pale as marble, her long golden hair hanging wet and dank about her.

Jean shuddered at the sight, then in a moment she was wrapping a blanket round the fair form, and telling Jack, who was bearing it, to carry her at once to the Vicarage. She only stopped a minute to give some directions for the other sufferers, and then followed Jack with his precious burden.

Jean could not speak as they slowly mounted the steep hill, but her thoughts were working with lightning speed.

"Who was the young girl? How old was she? Where had she come from? Had she those that loved her at home? Then, would she live? Could it be that she was dead even then?" Poor Jean held her breath at the very thought.

"Dead," she said to herself; "dead, and so young!" and even then came to her the thought, "What if it had been me?"

Poor Jean! it was only the stern side of religion that had been presented to her. No mother had been there to tell her that, solemn as death was, it was a glorious entering into a Father's home to those who had washed their sins in Christ's precious blood, from whom His love so full, so free, had taken the sting of death away. And so to her death was a dread thing indeed.

Very tenderly Jack carried his burden and laid it down on the bed Margaret had prepared. With her usual forethought, she had sent Gilling for the doctor, feeling sure his aid would be needed. He was quickly on the spot, and all the restoratives that could be thought of were applied.

Some others from the wreck were also brought to the kindly shelter of the Vicarage, but Jean felt she could have no thought but for the unknown girl, and she longed for her to make some signs of life.

Margaret came in from time to time to see if the doctor needed anything, and saw that the fires were replenished, and that all the means used in such cases were at hand, and then went away to see to the other rescued people. They did not need the doctor and were doing well; but this girl, it seemed, had fallen into the water as she was being lowered into the boat as it rose and fell with the waves, and the shock had affected the heart's action. The doctor listened intently, but could detect no beat of the organ, and as he rose from his stooping posture his face wore a gloomy look.

"She is not dead?" asked Jean, tearfully.

The girl was a complete stranger to her, but Jean thought that such a face as that lying on the pillow must be very dear to some one. She could not account for the feeling, but she was conscious that in some way she herself was very near in heart to that unknown girl, as if somehow their lives were linked together. She had never seen her before; Jean was sure of it, for the strange sense of kinship made her look closely at her for some familiar mark that she could recognize. But no; the face was utterly unknown; yet she loved that girl, and felt sure that, if she lived, they would be friends dearer than any others, more to each other than all the world. Oh! if she could but get well. She longed passionately for that with the longing of a lonely girl.

Again the doctor stooped and listened, and then, rising quickly, redoubled his exertions.

"Is she alive, Doctor?" Jean asked, eagerly.

"Yes," said the doctor. "She is not dead yet, but very near it. I am afraid she cannot live. Her constitution seems good, but it was not equal to such a strain as she has undergone. But while there's life there's hope."

At last, about seven in the morning, suddenly the eyelids unclosed and a pair of soft, gentle eyes looked wonderingly around, and in a faint whisper came the words, "Father—mother." Then she sank again into unconsciousness. The faintly fluttering life was hovering on the verge of extinction, and the watchers knew it. Patiently they continued their efforts, and anxiously looked for some responsive sign; but there was none.

It was nearly an hour later when again the eyes opened, but this time there was no inquiring gaze around. The eyes were directed upward with a look of glad surprise. There seemed to be almost a heavenly light in them, and the lips moved slowly. Jean bent eagerly forward to catch the whispered words. "It is Jesus—the angels—I am coming," said the voice. A slight shiver passed through the body, and she was gone.

When Jean saw that all was over she burst into an hysterical fit of weeping; the excitement and fatigue of the night had been too much for her, and they carried her away to her own little bed. The next thing she knew was the strong noonday sun pouring into her room, and a feeling of bewilderment as to where she was, and what had happened.

She rose hurriedly as the events of the past night came to her recollection, and dressed herself. Her eyes were swollen with weeping, and she felt faint and weak, but she was able to go down-stairs, and she descended slowly to the room where that long and unavailing struggle with death had taken place. There lay the unconscious form, still and beautiful in death.

There was no sign of pain on the lovely features, and to Jean it seemed that there was a smile on the lips as of one whose eyes had looked on some delightful scene. On a table near the bed, carefully folded by Sarah's neat hands, lay the clothes they had taken off the dead girl when they brought her in the night before. Jean looked at them sorrowfully, and turning over the handkerchief which lay among them, she saw on it a name. She looked at it eagerly and read, "Grace Arnold."

THE SHUNAMITE'S SON.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 13, 11 Kings 4 : 18-37. Golden Text, ver. 26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Evidence of Elijah's Spirit in Elisha—The Christian Worker in the House—The Thoughtfulness of Elisha's Hostess—The Woman's Contentment—A Child Promised—The Trial of Faith—Gehazi's Failure—The Conflict between Life and Death—The Child Raised—Elisha a Type of Christ.

ELISHA's reputation as a prophet was now fairly established. Not only as a stern rebuker of sin was he known, as in the case of the mocking children at Bethel (11 Kings 2 : 23, 24), but also as an instrument of blessing and deliverance in the healing of the bitter waters (verses 19-22), and in the deliverance of Jehoram's army from death by drought (11 Kings 3 : 9-17). Thus we see the evidence that a double portion of the Spirit was granted to him. Elijah was truly the precursor of John the Baptist, while the life of Elisha points very strikingly to Jesus.

In the course of his journeyings, as he, like the Lord, went about doing good and healing them that were oppressed (Acts 10 : 38), Elisha came to Shunem. There a person of distinction pressed upon him her hospitality. The prophet saw that he was welcome, and he made her house his home whenever he passed that way.

A CHRISTIAN WORKER

is not always as much admired in the house as in his or her meetings. There are some who adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour in all things (1 Tim. 2 : 10). There are others whose contrary spirits give a sense of discord and pain in every house they enter. There are often trials on both sides. The necessities of the work, the unexpected delays caused by anxious souls, make it difficult sometimes for an evangelist to keep regular hours. Again, some hosts and hostesses seem to imagine that a Christian worker has no right ever to be weary a moment; they will invite friends to every meal, and arrange conversations in between, so that he or she gets no time alone with the Lord, and no breathing space for soul or body in between the meetings. But if a Christian worker stands on his own defence, pities himself, and throws out unpleasant hints about this, it is very clear that he does not take all things which happen as coming directly from the hands of God. Oh, how safe our interests are in His hands! If we trust Him to provide quiet, He will do so. He put it into the heart of this lady of Shunem to say to her husband: "Behold, now, I perceive that this is a holy man of God, which passeth by us continually. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick"—just in accordance with the prophet's simple tastes. God saw how His dear child needed a quiet little room alone. Elisha's hostess saw God in all he said and did—no self-care; he had left his interests with God, and thus lovingly, thus tenderly the Lord cared for him.

But our loving God is free-handed; most richly does He repay all which is done for Him, and He says of all who care for His own: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me" (Matt. 25 : 40). On one of his visits Elisha's heart was filled with gratitude to God for His care, and he directed his servant Gehazi to call the Shunamite. He said: "Say now unto her, Behold, thou hast been careful for us with all this care; what is to be done for thee? Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?" With all the greatness and nobility of true simplicity, she replied: "I dwell among mine own people." So fully had she imbibed the spirit of Elisha that it was difficult to awaken any desire for earthly things. Honor and distinction had lost their charms for her—the ministry to her own work-people was the joy of life to her. Had she, then, no one desire? Gehazi hit it well when he said: "Verily and her husband is old." Elisha knew it was not too much to ask of God, and receive of him by faith, and so he told her that she should have a son. Long-abandoned hopes began to spring up anew; no doubt she had most earnestly prayed for this blessing, but it was the prayer of wish, or the prayer of hope, and not the prayer of faith. Now the warrant came from God through His prophet, and she could hardly take it in. "Nay, my lord, thou man of God, do not lie unto thine handmaid."

It was no lie; a year passed by and saw this woman of God a happy mother. Years passed, and he grew old enough to take a boyish interest in all the farm work, when one hot harvest-day he had a sunstroke, and was carried home from the field to his mother; he sat on her knees till noon, and then died. Why was this? Had she sinned? We are not told so. But God had more to teach her than she yet knew of Him. All His chastenings are parts of our education, that we may know more of Him in His wondrous unveilings of Himself in the time of trial. Without telling her husband the sad news, she laid the little corpse on the bed of the man of God and closed the door, then sent for one of the asses and one of the servants, that she might go and see Elisha. Her husband wondered, but was satisfied when she said: "It is well," or "Peace." With all possible speed she went to Mount Carmel, where Elisha was to be found. He saw her at a distance, and sent Gehazi to meet her with the questions: "Is it well with thee?" "Is it well with thy husband?" "Is it well with the child?" This was

A TEST OF FAITH.

God was teaching her the lesson: "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal" (11 Cor. 4 : 17, 18). Looking at God's side, understanding nothing, but fixed in her faith that He could make no mistake, she boldly said:

"IT IS WELL."

This was all she could say to Gehazi. But once in the presence of Elisha, her heart wept itself out, as she caught him by the feet. Gehazi was ready to interfere, but the prophet said: "Let her alone, for her soul is vexed within her, and the Lord hath hid it from me, and hath not told me." This was a strange thing to Elisha; he was in the habit of knowing what the Lord did (Amos 3 : 7). "Did I desire a son of my lord? Did I not say, Do not deceive me?" It was all out now; the God-given child was dead; what next? The Lord God of Elisha, who had raised the son of the widow of Sarepta, was still Elisha's God; but the prophet was not in the habit of putting himself forward, as though he were necessary to the works which God did by him. He sent Gehazi, and said to him: "Gird up thy loins, and take my staff in thine hand, and go thy way; if thou meet any man, salute him not; and if any salute thee, answer him not again; and lay my staff upon the face of the child."

Gehazi went his way, but the agonized mother was not satisfied. She knew that God was with Elisha; she had had solid proof of it, but she had no faith that Gehazi was equally counting upon God, and so she said: "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee." Gehazi went on, silent and solemn, but no power of God with him; he laid his staff upon the face of the child, but nothing happened, and he was obliged to return with the humbling confession:

"THE CHILD IS NOT AWAKED."

Dear reader, how is it with your class in the Sunday-school? Have you brought the Gospel to bear upon them Sunday after Sunday, and yet have you nothing more to say than this: "They are not awakened yet"? Look to it whether you are really counting on the living God for them all, or whether, as in Gehazi's case, there is uncleanness lurking in your heart. Want of power means really want of God. All the logic, all the eloquence in the world brought to bear upon them will not quicken souls into spiritual life; only the Holy Ghost can do this; and as we count on the Holy Ghost, He does His work by us or without us.

Elisha came on to the house with the mother, but he left her outside while he went in alone with God and with the dead. The mother's anxiety and prayers could do nothing here; it must be the finger of God. The prophet shut the door; there was going to be a mighty battle between him who lieth the power of death, even the devil, and He who is the Prince of life. Elisha must be the only spectator, and he would see but a glimpse of what passed. He prayed unto the Lord. No doubt this was the prayer of faith—no hesitation about it, no fear; it was a bold claim upon God to be true to Himself, and to justify Himself to the worthy woman who was in such perplexity. And he went up, and lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and he stretched himself upon the child; and the flesh of the child waxed warm. Then he returned, and walked in the house to and fro; and went up, and stretched himself upon him; and the child sneezed seven times, and the child opened his eyes."

LIFE HAD CONQUERED DEATH.

It was but a moment, and the mother, who had counted on the power of God to raise her son (or she would never have gone to fetch Elisha), was rewarded. "Take up thy son," was the prophet's word, but before she gave him one kiss she fell at the prophet's feet, and bowed herself to the ground, her whole being going out in worship to the Lord; then she "took up her son, and went out." Thus life conquers death. Elisha is but a type of Jesus. It is Jesus coming in who vivifies us in soul or in body. Jesus our Holiness conquering our sin. Jesus our Wisdom conquering our foolishness, and just so Jesus our Life and Strength of body. His eyes for our eyes, His hands for our hands, His brain for our exhausted brain. The body is . . . for the Lord; and the Lord for the body (1 Cor. 6 : 13). There is no need in spirit, soul, or body for which we may not take Jesus.

The persistency of the Shunamite may well teach us a lesson. She saw one thing: that if only the God of Elisha could come in contact with her child he would live, and she knew no other way than to constrain Elisha to come with her. We know that Jesus is with us now, and that being so, nothing is impossible to us; the very Creator and Upholder of the universe is with us, yes, dwelling in us. "Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates" (11 Cor. 13 : 5)? But in so many lives Jesus is indeed dwelling, but unrecognized. He is not known, is not given place within as the Life of spirit soul and body, the Source of all strength, power, wisdom. Where He really reigns faith can say, in all circumstances, with Him to fall back upon: "It is well."

"You are paid to preach," is a reproach often flung in the teeth of hard-working Christian ministers by men of coarse fibre who are not ashamed to insinuate that the earnest endeavor to win souls for Christ is undertaken as a means of genteel livelihood. The reproach is in nearly all cases unjust, for the abilities essential to a successful preacher would be far more liberally compensated in other professions, and the labor involved would be much less. The Church and the world would be heavy losers if the Christian ministry were unpaid, if only those could engage in it who had independent fortunes, or if the preacher, instead of studying the Word, and visiting the sick and the poor, had to labor in secular employments for a living.

UNPAID SERVICE.

But there are some against whom the reproach, unjust as it is, cannot be levelled. Preaching Christ because they desire to serve Him, preaching to the people because they know that Christ is the power of God to salvation, they refuse to accept remuneration, preferring to labor with their hands for their own necessities. All honor to that noble band of workers in the Christian army, some of whom are to be found in every city, giving to God, and to their fellow-men the time other men give to recreation and pleasure. Of this grand, self-denying body of men, the celebrated preacher whose portrait appears on the first page of the CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is a conspicuous example. Like the great Apostle of the Gentiles, Mr. Merritt is able to say: "Ye remember, brethren, our labor and travail; for laboring night and day that we might not burden any of you, we preached unto you the Gospel of God" (1 Thess. 2:9), and as he pleads with the sinner in Christ's stead, he may say with the same apostle: "I seek not yours, but you" (11 Cor. 12:14). To men who impute interested motives to Christian preachers, such an instance as that of Stephen Merritt, is a conclusive answer; for his Christian labor has no reward, but the reward he covets—that of seeing souls brought out of darkness into the marvellous light of the Gospel.

BIRTH AND EARLY LIFE.

Stephen Merritt was born in New York City, on March 6th, 1833. His father was an undertaker, but he wished his son to acquire an independent handicraft, and when he had completed his education he sent him to the Brooklyn Navy-yard to learn the art of sail-making. It is a curious coincidence that the man who in after life was to follow the Apostle Paul's example in preaching the Gospel gratuitously to the poor, should have been taught the handicraft by which the great apostle supported himself (Acts 18:3). Four years the boy worked in the Navy-yard, and at the end of that time his apprenticeship was completed, and he was free to follow his own inclinations. He was able to earn his own livelihood, and he left the Navy-yard to enter upon his career in the world.

A CRITICAL TIME.

That is always a critical time for a young man. He is then at the parting of the ways. Parental control is necessarily relaxed, and the youth must decide for himself what his future course shall be. In a great city like New York the crisis is intensified by the circumstances which surround him. Devices of all kinds are employed to draw such young men into evil courses. They are tempted by allurements which appeal to the strongest tendencies of a young man's nature. It is heart-breaking to any Christian man to see as he passes along the streets in the evening young men who are just commencing the road to ruin. On the Bowery, and in the up-town streets the announcement "Concert this Evening: Admission Free," appears at the doors of liquor-saloons; and in those places every night may be seen, listening to the music, young men who evidently have spent the day in business houses or the workshops. At the first visit, perhaps, the table is empty; but after a time the waiters make it clear to the young visitor that he is expected to buy liquor or cigars if he comes there. The lights, the mirrors, the gorgeous decorations, the luxurious seats, the enchanting music, the gay company—all unite to draw and hold the young victim. Everything seems full of life, and it is not until he is himself bound by the chains of iniquity that the young man learns that "the dead are there." Parents who are dazzled by the advantages their sons may derive from commencing life in a great city ought to know that it is the worst place in the world for a lad to be who is just entering upon man's estate.

Young Merritt was in the midst of these seductive temptations at the crisis of his life. But, happily for him, he had at that time secured the armor which alone is strong enough to withstand the assaults of the enemy of mankind. Possessing a bright, lively, sanguine temperament, being what is called "a good fellow," cheerful, humorous, vivacious, he was just the young man to be drawn into the vortex from which so few ever return, but at that time young Merritt's evenings were being spent in Christian society, and he was enjoying the delights which God provides for those who seek Him, and which fill the life with joy indescribable. A short time before, while sitting in Bedford Street Methodist Episcopal Church, the Holy Spirit had spoken to his soul, and he had yielded himself to Christ. His was not the nature to do anything half-heartedly, and as he commenced the Christian life he consecrated himself wholly to the service of the Saviour. With his heart full of the love of Christ, he walked the dangerous path safely, and his superabundant energy found a congenial outlet in Christian activity. He very wisely resolved to gain a little more intellectual culture, that he might become a more effective laborer in Christ's service. He accordingly spent one year in the seminary at Amenia, N. Y., and at the end of that time returned to New York, eager for employment in the harvest-field of souls.

BEGINS TO PREACH.

In 1858, Mr. Merritt being then twenty-five years of age, received a lay-preacher's license in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and his work of publishing the Gospel commenced. Six years later he received from Bishop Clark ordination as deacon, and there could be no better justification of the call than that Mr. Merritt could produce in souls saved by the blessing of God on his preaching. It was not until 1871, however, that Mr. Merritt entered fully on the special work in which he has won the praise of all the churches. That work was commenced in Bank Street, New York.

AN UPHILL STRUGGLE.

A dingy room in that thoroughfare was fourteen years ago dignified by the name of a chapel, and in it a few poor people were gathered every Sunday to listen to the Gospel. It was a poor congregation, but among them were one or two who were rich in faith, though almost destitute of this world's goods. Mr. Merritt preached there, and was struck by the opportunities for earnest, self-denying work in that locality. Energetic, unselfish, faithful labor, he believed, would be a blessing there, and much good might be done. He became the pastor of the church, knowing well that every cent the people could raise would be needed in church work, and that if his plans were carried out he would be a loser financially by his undertaking. But Mr. Merritt has never entered on any religious work with any other expectation. He went to Bank Street, and his irrepresable energy gave new life to the struggling church. It amazed all who knew it, before his arrival, to see what a months produced. Somehow, the past genial manner, his warm heart and ready sympathy with the poor and the struggling, seen to be felt through the streets and in the hon of that neighborhood. People came to the li Bank Street chapel, and were cheered and encouraged. Religion there was "a living thing people who had gone to grander churches, had been thrust into a seat in some obscure corner, where their shabby clothes would be an offence to the wealthy members, and w came and went away without a friendly w being spoken to them individually, found the selves welcomed at Bank Street, and the fire t burned in the pulpit warmed all the chur The congregation grew; souls were saved, a the little church was crowded. Before t years had passed, a new church had to be bu and the commodious edifice in Perry Stre erected at a cost of $35,000. To the surpris the people themselves the money was paid t and no one ever knew, though many shrew suspected, how much of that large sum h come from the pastor's pocket.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.

In this church was first seen a characteristic Mr. Merritt's Christian genius, which has been noticeable wherever he has been. That was t prosperity of the Sunday-school. He has ways believed in children. The very look of t man attracts them. There is no chilliness all his personality. A child instinctively fe that the good-humored face is an index to a l heart, and places his hand confidently that of the pastor. Almost as soon as Merritt settled in Bank Street he began to t special attention to the Sunday-school. gathered around him a band of teachers af own heart, and the few children who came the school, began to tell their companions ab the place where they were happy. The sch grew until, when the Perry Street church v built, accommodation had to be provided fo school containing six hundred children.

The rules of the Methodist Episcopal Chur do not allow of any pastor remaining more t three years over any one charge. In 1874, the fore, Mr. Merritt to the intense regret of t church had to leave and seek a new field. T he found at Piermont, on the Hudson, and established himself at Nyack. The Pierm church did not find him a sufficient scop his energy, and in less than six months, th additional churches were added to the we under his charge.

BUSINESS.

The close of the year 1875 found Mr. Merr again resident in New York. His father's advancing years and infirmities, and his rapid growing business required the presence of t son. It was with reluctance that Mr. Merr separated himself from his people at Nyac where his energetic, devoted work was beginni to produce hopeful results; but parental clai were not to be ignored. His duty evidently l at home, and he believed, and rightly, th opportunities for usefulness would not be lacki to one who earnestly sought them. He the fore appeared in his father's undertaking, t establishment, and was assiduous in his attenti to business, and in his devotion to his ag parent, engaging all the time, in the intervals business, in Christian labor.

He had not been at home much over a year when his old church in Perry Street began m ing with a view to his resumption of his past charge over them. He was ordained an elder Bishop Merritt, and was placed in Perry Stre for another term of three years. His term w drawing toward its close, when a new fi opened of a kind especially congenial to the LEADER OF FORLORN HOPE.

In the down-town district of Franklin Stre among the very poor, a handful of Christian m were holding services, and striving to form little church for the neglected and indige dwellers in the tenement houses. It was ha work. No money, even for the most sim necessaries of worship could be expected from men whose most strenuous exertions could barely earn enough to provide them and their families with bread. The ragged clothes and the emaciated faces of the people who came to listen to the Gospel, told a sad tale of hardship and privation. Yet those were the very people to whom by the Saviour's injunction the Gospel was to be preached. The need was great, but there was nothing to attract any but workers who were self-denying and consecrated. It seemed as if the effort must be abandoned when some one who had seen the growth of the Bank Street church, suggested that perhaps Mr. Merritt would come. The application was made. Mr. Merritt went and looked at the little room, and the miserable congregation. That was the work for him; the work he loved best. "What do you think of it, Mr. Merritt?" timidly inquired one of the originators of the mission. "Yes; I'll come," was the laconic answer. And Mr. Merritt went.

THE FRANKLIN STREET CHURCH.

That was in the fall of 1879. It was worth a journey to go to that place in this month of September, 1885. A building has been purchased near the site of the old mission for $16,000. Improvements were made which cost $8,000 more, and this year an additional $4,800 have been expended on the structure. In the Sunday-school, which is in many respects, the model Sunday-school of the city, there are six hundred and eighty children, bright, intelligent, well-behaved, and ardently attached to the school. Two missions—the Third Ward chapel in Greenwich Street, and the De Witt chapel and Sunday-school in the First Ward have been founded, and are supported by the church, making an aggregate membership of church and Sunday-school of more than twelve hundred persons. To be sure, the people are still poor. You see no carriages waiting at the doors, and, if the clothes of every occupant of the pews were sold at a fair price, the sum realized would not pay for the diamonds that glisten in a single pew of an up-town church. But listen to the singing; watch the eager faces turned to the preacher, see the joy and peace that rests on the poor hungry countenances, and you will thank God that to the poor the Gospel is preached. How was the big church built? Who pays expenses? Who supports the pastor? Only a few could give an idea of the financial arrangements. But go into Mr. Merritt's undertaking establishment in Eighth Avenue. There you see that a splendid business is being done. You notice that commissions are continually coming in from which a handsome profit must be cleared. The proprietor must be well on the way to the circle of the millionaires. But he is not. He is a comparatively poor man. There is little prospect of a lawsuit over his will after he is dead, and though the business has been growing and extending year after year, the proprietor does not seem to become any richer. The curious in such matters will not be able to solve the riddle until the accounts of the Franklin Street church are compared with the accounts of the business house in Eighth Avenue.

TEMPERANCE WORK.

Besides distinctly religious work, Mr. Merritt is a prominent and active laborer in the cause of temperance. On one occasion he started out on a temperance campaign which occupied seventeen months, and during all that time there were but thirteen nights in which he was not speaking somewhere for the cause of total abstinence. Poughkeepsie was one of the places visited, and there in one night one hundred and three persons signed the pledge at the close of Mr. Merritt's lecture. That was not by any means an unusual result of his effective appeals. In the temperance campaigns, as in his preaching, Mr. Merritt strictly adheres to his independent action. He receives no remuneration for his services, and pays his expenses out of his own pocket.

Probably Mr. Merritt himself does not know how much he gives away directly to individuals in the course of a year. Physicians who visit the poor could give some clue to his expenses in one direction. The clothiers of the city know him as a good customer for garments that never appear on his person. Provision dealers make up parcels of nourishing goods which go to various houses in the poor districts, and they send the bills to Mr. Merritt. There are thriving businesses in this and other cities the proprietors of which were, not many years ago, struggling along in situations for precarious salaries, but who, after making Mr. Merritt's acquaintance, set up for themselves with a little capital of ready cash, which industry and frugality is developing into a respectable competence. And beside these avenues of dispersion, there are the direct alms to the starving and, it is to be feared, not always deserving applicants. The roll of bills which Mr. Merritt's pocket contains in the morning present a very shrunken appearance at night, for, like the late Peter Cooper, he is the well-known prey of any one who is in distress, and, like him, he enjoys the luxury of giving relief.

IN POLITICS.

To the surprise of many people Mr. Merritt not long ago appeared in the political arena. He was a candidate for the State comptroller-ship. He was not elected, for his known prohibitionist principles aroused an opposition to him which spared neither money nor labor to defeat him. Again, last year, he received the nomination of the Prohibition party for Assemblyman. It was, of course, a forlorn hope; but to the surprise of every one in the district Mr. Merritt, though defeated, received twenty-four hundred votes. A few weeks ago he was nominated for the State Senatorship of his district by a meeting of citizens, who were aroused from their apathy by the state of affairs at Albany, and conceived the idea that it would be for the interest of the State if an honest, upright man were sent to take his seat in the Senate Chamber of the Capitol. There is good reason for hoping that the better feeling of his fellow-citizens and the desire for honest government, which at present has manifested itself in many unexpected quarters will insure his success in November.

Unobtrusive as Mr. Merritt's career has been, there are few men in the city who do not know of him, and he is widely honored. His enemies are the men whose enmity it is an honor to enjoy. The poor love him, and thousands of families now living decent lives, in the enjoyment of home comforts, look back to days when drunkenness desolated their homes, and hunger and misery made their lives a burden, and death only a fearful expectation of judgment; and as they contrast those times with the better days on which their lives have fallen, thank God that they ever came in contact with Stephen Merritt.

"MODERN BABYLON."

PASTOR HIRSCH writes to Le Matin, a Parisian publication, eloquently and truthfully, as follows: "I quite understand the satisfaction that many Parisians feel at the disclosures of the Pall Mall Gazette. The subject of 'Modern Babylon,' about which our neighbors on the other side of the Channel have long been ashamed, has at length been disclosed. But I wish that this terrible lesson may not profit the English alone. That they will profit by it you may rest assured. Those among them who, overcoming their national pride, have dared to lay bare the wound, and that in a measure before the eyes of all the world, will know how to cauterize it till it is perfectly healed. I desire that a similar work should take place among ourselves. Let us not recriminate nor cover ourselves with the garment of hypocrisy. The evil is among ourselves, as it is in London; it is practised here, perhaps, under different phases, and not on so great a scale, but, such as it is, it must be combated without mercy.

"Our customs, do you know them? Do you know that in the midst of Paris, in houses set apart for the purpose, which pay a tax to the Government, and in exchange enjoy its protection, there are perpetrated, day after day, monstrosities and crimes exactly like those which have spread a cry of horror throughout the civilized world? We must reform man by man, and cause him to respect his mother, his wife, and his sister, whom he degrades when he degrades the mother, the wife, or the sister of others. We must pursue into its most secret recesses this theory that it is necessary, and at the risk of being called dreamers."

MR. HENRY VARLEY WRITES:

"A subtle form of evil has been working in calculable mischief in the State. It is not new, for evils of similar character have long been in the chequered history of humanity. I refer to the practical divorce which has existed in England between moral character and fitness for political, social, and professional eminence. Men of the highest social position have again and again been proved to be of the lowest moral character.

"Not only so, but there are living among us men who have so disgraced themselves by moral deformity that their names are an offence among those who know their true character. Conversing recently with a gentleman who has spent many years in India, concerning the character of a certain nobleman whose evil living was a public scandal, he quietly added, 'Oh, yes, respectable men would not allow their daughters to go where resides!' Imagine such a man to be the representative of England's authority in India.

"Twice recently, in company with friends, have I visited one of the most popular of West End places of amusement, in order that we might verify the facts. On the first evening I counted in one house nearly one hundred and thirty harlots, dressed in every style of fashion. On a second occasion seventy were plying their avocation in this 'house of assignation.' The police who were present chatted freely with the 'loose women,' and in the knowledge and providence of the late Home Secretary kept vice from breaking out into crime. In this same haunt of wickedness there was presented a spectacle grossly suggestive of indecency. I need hardly say that here also the police were present to yield the protection of the law. About two years since the eldest son of a prominent Christian man, well known to me, was tempted to go to this 'carnival of lust.' Leaving it in company with one of the sisterhood of shame, he shot himself dead the following morning in her apartments.

"It occurs to me that at such a time the press and platform and the pulpit should lift up their united voice against this dangerous divorce between a clear moral character and fitness for prominent social and political positions.

THE REV. W. ARTHUR, M.A., the distinguished Wesleyan Methodist minister, and author of "The Tongue of Fire," has published a timely and most trenchant brochure, entitled, "Hush, or Speak Out?" in which he remarks: "The improvements now accepted in our law, if really worked, may effect much toward diminishing the particular variety of crime which consists in the ruin of unborn girls. But both past experience and recent debates show that there are men in plenty who will defeat the operation of such laws, if by any artifice they can do so. The men who fire up at any distant danger to the gentleman libertine, at every possible wounding of his feeling or shadow upon his reputation, at every possible loss to him of money, and who revile, wherever they dared to do it, those who plead for the equal right of poor women to have their feelings, their reputation, their whole store of goods actual and possible—that is, their character—screened by the majesty of the State from the paws of brutal men in rich clothes, are not the persons who will as magistrates, lawyers, or legislators do otherwise than connive at the Jefferies of either sex."

THE GREAT ASSIZE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached at Cork, Ireland, Last Sunday Morning, Sept. 6, 1885.

"When the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory: and before Him shall be gathered all nations: and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats."—MATTHEW 25: 31, 32.

The Final Judgment Inevitable—Necessary—Christ in His Glory—Never yet Seen—Who is on the Judgment Seat?—Betrayed by His Scars—The Angelic Constabulary—The Multitude Assembled—The Blue Canopy of the Sky—A Suspended Auditorium—The Separation—Division According to Character—Conventionalities Shattered—Division by Two—The Leaves of the Book—Memory's Automatic Register—The Bugle Signal—Cancelled Leaves—Two Tremendous Words.

HALF way between Chamouni, Switzerland, and Martigny I reined in the horse on which I was riding, and looked off upon the most wonderful natural amphitheatre of valley and mountain and rock, and I said to my companion, "What an appropriate place this would be for the last judgment. Yonder overhanging rock the place for the judgment-seat. These galleries of surrounding hills occupied by attendant angels. This vast valley, sweeping miles this way and miles that, the audience-room for all nations." But sacred geography does not point out the place. Yet we know that somewhere, sometime, somehow, an audience will be gathered together stupendous beyond all statistics, and just as certainly as you and I make up a part of this audience to-day, we will make up a part of that audience on that day.

A common sense of justice in every man's heart demands that there shall be some great winding-up day, in which that which is now

INEXPLICABLE SHALL BE EXPLAINED.

Why did that good man suffer, and that bad man prosper? You say, "I don't know, but I must know." Why is that good Christian woman dying of what is called a spider cancer, while that daughter of folly sits wrapped in luxuriance, ease, and health? You say, "I don't know, but I must know." There are so many wrongs to be righted that if there were not some great righting-up day in the presence of all ages, there would be an outcry against God from which His glory would never recover. If God did not at last try the nations, the nations would try Him. We are, therefore, ready for the announcement of the text.

The world never saw Christ except in disguise. If once when He was on earth He had let out His glory, instead of the blind eyes being healed, all visions would have been extinguished. No human eye could have endured it. And instead of bringing the dead to life, all around about him would have been the slain under that overpowering effulgence. Disguise of human flesh. Disguise of seamless robe. Disguise of sandal. Disguise of voice. From Bethlehem caravansary to mausoleum in the rock,

A COMPLETE DISGUISE.

But on the day of which I speak the Son of Man will come in His glory. No hiding of lustre. No sheathing of strength. No suppression of grandeur. No wrapping out of sight of the Godhead. Any fifty of the most brilliant sunsets that you ever saw on land or sea would be dim as compared with the cerulean appearance on that day when Christ rolls through, and rolls on, and rolls down in His glory. The air will be all abloom with His presence, and everything from horizon to horizon aflame with His splendor.

Elijah rode up the sky-step in a chariot, the wheels of whirling fire and the horses of galloping fire, and the charioteer drawing reins of fire on bits of fire; but Christ will need no such equipage, for the law of gravitation will be laid aside, and the natural elements will be laid aside, and Christ will descend swiftly enough to make speedy arrival, but slowly enough to allow the gaze of millions of spectators. In his glory! Glory of form, glory of omnipotence, glory of holiness, glory of justice, glory of love. In His glory! An unveiled, descending to meet the human race in an interview which will be prolonged only for a few hours, and yet which shall settle all the past and all the present and all the future, and be closed before the end of that day, which will close, not with setting sun, but with the destruction of the planet as a snuffers takes off the top of a burned wick.

AN UNCOVERED GOD

It is a solemn time in a court-room when there is an important case on hand, and the judge of the Supreme Court enters, and he sits down, and with gavel strikes on the desk commanding bar and jury and witnesses and audience into silence. All voices are hushed, all heads are uncovered. But how much more impressive when Christ shall take the judgment seat on the last day of the last week of the last month of the last year of the world's existence, and with gavel of thunderbolt shall smite the mountains, commanding all the land and all the sea into silence.

Can you have any doubt about

on the judgment day? Better make investigation, to see whether there are any scars about Him that reveal His person. Apparel may change. You cannot always tell by apparel. But scars will tell the story after all else fails. I find under His left arm a scar, and on His right hand a scar, and on His left hand a scar, and on His right foot a scar, and on His left foot a scar. Oh, yes, He is the Son of Man in His glory. Every mark of wound now a badge of victory, every ridge showing the fearful gash now telling the story of pain and sacrifice which He suffered in behalf of the human race.

But what is all that commotion and flutter, and surging to and fro above Him and on either side of Him? It is a detailed regiment of heaven, sent forth to take part in that scene, and to execute the mandates that shall be issued. Ten regiments, a hundred regiments, a thousand regiments of angels; for on that day all heaven will be emptied out of its inhabitants to let them attend the scene. All the holy angels. From what a centre to what a circumference. Widening out and widening out, and higher up and higher up. Wings interlocking wings. Galleries of cloud above galleries of cloud, all filled with the faces of angels come to listen and come to watch, and come to help on that day for which all other days were made. Who are those two taller and more conspicuous angels? The one is Michael, who is the commander of all those who come out to destroy sin. The other is Gabriel, who is announced as commander of all those who come forth to help the righteous. Who is that mighty angel near the throne? That is the resurrection angel, his lips still aquiver and his cheek aflame with the blast that shattered the cemeteries and woke the dead. Who is that other great angel, with dark and overshadowing brow? That is the one who in one night, by one flap of his wing, turned 185,000 of Sennacherib's host into corpses.

A CONSTABULARY ANGELIC,

Who are those bright immortals near the throne, their faces partly turned toward each other as though about to sing? Oh, they are of the first Christmas night! Who are this other group standing so near the throne? They are the Saviour's especial body guard, which hovered over Him in the wilderness and administered to Him in the hour of martyrdom, and heaved away the rock of his sarcophagus, and escorted Him upward on Ascension Day, now appropriately escorting Him down. Divine glory flanked on both sides by angelic radiance.

But now lower your eye from the divine and angelic to the human. The entire human race is present. All nations, says my text. Before that time the American Republic, the English Government, the French Republic, all modern modes of government may be obliterated for something better; but all nations, whether dead or alive, will be brought up into that assembly. Thebes and Tyre and Babylon and Greece and Rome as wide awake in that assembly as though they had never slumbered amid the dead nations. Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, all the nineteenth century, the eighteenth century, the twelfth century, the tenth century, the fourth century—all centuries present. Not one being that ever drew the breath of life but will be in that assembly.

VAST MULTITUDE!

No other audience a thousandth part as large. No other audience a millionth part as large. No human eye could look across it. Wing of albatross and falcon and eagle not strong enough to fly over it. A congregation, I verily believe, not assembled on any continent, because no continent would be large enough to hold it. But, as the Bible intimates, in the air. The law of gravitation unanchored, the world moved out of its place. As now sometimes on earth a great tent is spread for some great convention, so over that great audience of the judgment shall be lifted the blue canopy of the sky, and underneath it for floor the air made buoyant by the hand of Almighty God. An architecture of atmospheric galleries strong enough to hold up worlds. Surely the two arms of God's almightiness are two pillars strong enough to hold up any auditorium.

But that audience is not to remain in session long. Most audiences on earth after an hour or two adjourn. Sometimes in court-rooms an audience will tarry four or five hours, but then it adjourns. So this audience spoken of in the text will adjourn. My text says, "He will separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats."

THE SEPARATION.

"No," says my Universalist friend, "let them all stay together." But the text says, "He shall separate them." "No," say the kings of this world, "let men have their choice, and if they prefer monarchical institutions, let them go together, and if they prefer republican institutions, let them go together." "No," say the conventionalities of this world, "let all those who moved in what is called high circles go together, and all those who on earth moved in low circles go together. The rich together, the poor together, the wise together, the ignorant together." Ah! no. Do you not notice in that assembly the king is without his sceptre, and the soldier without his uniform, and the bishop without his pontifical ring, and the millionaire without his certificates of stock, and the convict without his chain, and the beggar without his rags, and the illiterate without his bad orthography, and all of us without any distinction of earthly inequality? So I take it from that as well as from my text that the mere accident of position in this world will do nothing toward deciding the questions of that very great day.

DIVISION ACCORDING TO CHARACTER.

"He will separate them as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." The sheep, the cleanliest of creatures, here made a symbol of those who have all their sins washed away in the fountain of redeeming mercy. The goat, one of the filthiest of creatures here, a type of those who in the last judgment will be found never to have had any divine ablation. Division according to character. Not only character outside, but character inside. Character of heart, character of choice, character of allegiance, character of affection, character inside as well as character outside.

In many a case it will be a complete and immediate reversal of all earthly conditions. Some who in this world wore patched apparel will take on raiment lustrous as a summer noon. Some who occupied a palace will take a dungeon. Division regardless of all earthly caste, and some who were down will be up, and some who were up will be down. Oh, what a shattering of conventionalities! What an upheaval of all social rigidities, what a turning of the wheel of earthly condition, a thousand revolutions in a second. Division of all nations, of all ages, not by the

Two! Two characters, two destinies, two states, two dominions, two eternities, a tremendous, an all-comprehensive, an all-decisive, and everlasting two!

I sometimes think that the figure of the book that shall be opened allows us to forget the thing signified by the symbol. Where is the book-inder that could make a volume large enough to contain the names of all the people who have ever lived? Besides that the calling of such a roll would take more than fifty years, more than a hundred years, and the judgment is to be consummated in less time than passes between sunrise and sunset. Ah! my friends, the leaves of that book of judgment are not made out of paper, but of memory. One leaf in every human heart. You have known persons who were near rowning, but they were afterward resuscitated, and they have told you that in the two or three minutes between the accident and the resuscitation, all their past life flashed before them—all they had ever thought, all they had ever done. Oh, they had ever seen in an instant came to them, the memory never loses anything. It is only a folded leaf. It is only

A CLOSED BOOK.

Though you are an octogenarian, though you are a nonagenarian, all the thoughts and acts of our life are in your mind whether you recall them now or not, just as Macaulay's history is in two volumes, although the volumes may be closed, and you cannot see a word of them, and will not until they are opened. As in the case of the drowning man, the volume of memory was partly open, or the leaf partly unrolled; in the case of the judgment the entire book will be opened, so that everything will be displayed from preface to appendix.

You have seen self-registering instruments which recorded how many revolutions they had made and what work they had done, so the manufacturer could come days after and look at the instrument and find just how many revolutions had been made, or how much work had been accomplished. So the human mind is a self-registering instrument, and it records all its past movements. Now that leaf, that all-comprehensive leaf in your mind and mine this moment, the leaf of judgment, brought out under the flash of the judgment throne, you can easily see how all the past of our lives in an instant will be seen. And so great and so resplendent will be the light of that throne that not only this leaf in my heart and that leaf in your heart will be revealed at a flash, but all the leaves will be opened, and you will read not only your own character and your own history, but the character and history of others.

In a military encampment

in one way means one thing, and sounded in another way it means another thing. Bugle sounded in one way means, "Prepare for sudden attack." Bugle sounded in another way means, "To your tents, and let all the lights be put out."

I have to tell you, my brother, that the trumpet of the Old Testament, the trumpet that was carried in the armies of olden times, and the trumpet on the walls in olden times, in the last great day will give significant reverberation. Old and worn-out and exhausted Time, having marched across decades and centuries and ages, will halt, and the sun and the moon and the stars will halt with it. The trumpet, the trumpet!

Peal the first: Under its power the sea will stretch itself out dead, the white foam on the lip, in its crystal sarcophagus, and the mountains will stagger and reel and stumble and fall into the valleys never to rise. Under one puff of that last cyclone all the candles of the sky will be blown out. The trumpet, the trumpet!

Peal the second: The alabaster halls of the air will be filled with those who will throng up from all the cemeteries of all the ages—from Greyfriar's Churchyard, and Roman Catacomb, from Westminster Abbey, and from the coral crypts of oceanic cave, and some will rend off the bandage of Egyptian mummy, and others will remove from their brow the garland of green seaweed. From the north and the south and the east and the west they come. The dead! The trumpet, the trumpet!

Peal the third: Amid surging clouds and the roar of attendant armies of heaven the Lord comes through, and there are lightnings and thunderbolts, and an earthquake, and a hallelujah, and a wailing. The trumpet, the trumpet!

Peal the fourth: All the records of human life will be revealed. The leaf containing the pardoned sin, the leaf containing the unpardoned sin. Some clapping hands with joy, some grinding their teeth with rage, and all the forgotten past becomes a vivid present. The trumpet, the trumpet!

Peal the last: The audience breaks up. The great trial is ended. The high court of heaven adjourns. The audience he themselves to their two termini. They rise, they rise! They sink, they sink! Then the blue tent of the sky will be lifted and folded up and put away. Then the auditorium of atmospheric galleries will be melted. Then the folded wings of attendant angels will be spread for upward flight. The fiery throne of judgment will become a dim and a vanishing cloud. The conflagration of divine and angelic magnificence will roll back and off. The day for which all other days are made has closed, and the world has burned down, and the last cinder has gone out, and an angel flying on errand from world to world will poise long enough over the dead earth to chant the funeral litany as he cries, "Ashes to ashes!"

That judgment leaf in your heart I seize hold of this moment for cancellation. In your city hangs the great book of mortgages has a large margin, so that when the mortgagor has paid the full amount to the mortgagee, the officer of the law comes, and he puts down on that margin the payment and the cancellation, and though that mortgage demanded vast thousands before, now it is null and void. So I have to tell you that that leaf in my heart and in your heart, that leaf of judgment, that all-comprehensive leaf, has a wide

MARGIN FOR CANCELLATION.

There is only one hand in all the universe that can touch that margin. That hand this moment lifted to make the record null and void forever. It may be a trembling hand, for it is a wounded hand, the nerves were cut and the muscles were lacerated. That record on that leaf was made in the black ink of condemnation; but if cancellation takes place, it will be made in the red ink of sacrifice. O judgment-bound brother and sister, let Christ this moment bring to that record complete and glorious cancellation. This moment, in an outburst of impassioned prayer, ask for it. You think it is the fluttering of your heart. Oh, no! It is the fluttering of that leaf, that judgment leaf.

I ask you not to take from your iron safe your last will and testament, but I ask for something of more importance than that. I ask you not to take from your private papers that letter so sacred that you have put it away from all human eyesight, but I ask you for something of more meaning than that. That leaf, that judgment leaf in my heart, that judgment leaf in your heart, which will decide our condition after this world shall have five thousand million years been swept out the heavens, an extinct planet, and time itself will be so long past that on the ocean of eternity it will seem only as now seems a ripple on the Atlantic.

When the goats in vile herd start for the barren mountains of death, and the sheep in fleeces of snowy whiteness and bleating with joy move up the terraced hills to join the lambs already playing in the high pastures of celestial altitude, oh may you and I be close by the Shepherd's crook! "When the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory; and before Him shall be gathered all nations; and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats."

Oh, that leaf, that one leaf in my heart, that one leaf in your heart! That leaf of judgment. Oh, those at the last, "Come!" "Go!" As though the overhanging heavens were the cup of a great bell, and all the stars were welded into a silvery tongue and swung from side to side until it struck, "Come!" "Go!" As though all the great guns of eternal disaster were discharged at once, and they boomed forth in one resounding cannonade of "Go!" Arithmetical sum in simple division. Eternity the dividend. The figure two the divisor. Your unalterable destiny the quotient.

TWO TREMENDOUS WORDS

THE REV. DR. TALMAGE IN EDINBURGH.

(From the Edinburgh Scotsman, August 24.)

The Rev. Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, U. S., preached in the United Presbyterian Synod Hall, Edinburgh, yesterday afternoon, the services beginning at half past two o'clock. Long before midday people desirous of being present began to assemble at the main entrance, and on account of the number who had arrived by twelve o'clock it was resolved to open the doors. In less than an hour the spacious building was filled in every part, all the passages and some of the windows even being occupied. The doors were closed shortly after one o'clock, those outside in Castle Terrace, now numbering several thousands, being informed by means of bills which were exhibited that the hall was full. The crowd continued to increase as time wore on, very much disappointment evidently being felt at being unable to gain admission. About two o'clock, however, an intimation that Dr. Talmage would in the course of the afternoon address the gathering in Castle Terrace seemed to afford relief. Meanwhile several of Sankey's hymns were being sung inside by a choir, and shortly before the appointed time for the commencement of the services, Dr. Talmage made his appearance on the platform, accompanied by Mrs. Talmage, and their son and two daughters. After devotional exercises—Professor Calderwood having engaged in prayer—Dr. Talmage gave out as his text, "I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth" (Joel 2: 30).

(From the Edinburgh Courier, Monday, August 24.)

At the close of the proceedings Dr. Talmage shook hands with as many of the people as could get near him, but the crowd pressed forward in such a way that those in the front ranks were crushed to an uncomfortable degree, and this put a temporary check upon the leave-taking. Dr. Talmage then re-entered the building, and made his way to the rear of the hall, where a cab was in waiting for himself and family. Upon his appearance a crowd rapidly assembled eager to shake hands with him, and crowded around the cab in such a way that it could not move until the police cleared a passage. A few gentlemen jumped upon the cab steps, ladies got their dresses soiled with mud by rubbing against the wheels, and some more adventurous than the others got their toes crushed by the wheels. Dr. Talmage then stood and shook hands over the back of the cab as hard as he was able, and it was not until Lothian Road was reached that the efforts of the police in keeping back the crowd were no longer needed.

The Fisk Jubilee Singers Announce the commencement of another campaign. They are to unite under the direction of Professor George L. White, who was their manager in the original tour. Their first appearance will be at Red Bank, N. J., on September 15th, and they will hold their first service in New York about October 1st. The company will include many of the original members. It may be hoped that this enterprise will be as successful as the earlier one, which resulted in the erection of one of the finest edifices in the Nashville group.

MISSION WORK IN FRANCE.

RECENTLY an article appeared in these columns describing the valuable results of individual Christian labor in the country districts of France. The following narrative by a Christian traveller in that country confirms the facts previously stated:

"Lately we have had the opportunity of seeing the work of two Christians in circumstances and in fields so different that we had thought other Christians would be interested in hearing something of each. A few weeks ago we received a letter from a pastor's daughter at Ancelon, saying, 'The work here is difficult, and we have great need of encouragement. Can you come to us?' Some months ago we heard the appeal from St. Etienne: 'The field here is wide, and the laborers few; can you help?' Now we have seen the two, and I want to tell you something of what we have seen.

"To reach Ancelon is the first difficulty: no road but a mule-track. The pastor's son, a lad of twelve, came to guide us—along the river bed, across a swift, though shallow mountain stream, down one deep ravine, up a mountainside, with a range of precipices, and through a natural door in the rocky wall. More ravines, more torrent beds, and then from the mountainside you look down on Ancelon. Already we had been walking five hours, and he told us we had two more to reach the village. Between it and us there are yet two ravines, and from the depths of the last the climb is a zig-zag path up the face of the rocks. The fertile slopes of pasture are dangerous for the mowers. Once slip, and there is certain death in the abyss below.

"This is not the place for descriptions of scenery, but it is impossible to understand the pastor's work unless one knows something of his field; and these ravines lie between the pastor and his 'annexes.' We saw him start on Sabbath morning for his service at Peine, on foot in the heat, his daughter with him, and come back at sunset uncomplaining, but with a look of exhaustion that told how the work was telling on his strength. Right in front of his window, across the ravine again, rises a high mountain; across this is his way to another annex. Will the city laborers who have train, horse-car, or cab within reach think of this pastor's work, where the path is in summer a goat-track covered with loose stones, in winter the untrodden snow? Will they think, too, of the privilege of many fellow-laborers at hand of being prayed for by thousands of Christian intercessors, of having stores of Christian literature at hand—will they pray for lonely country workers?

"At Ancelon for months the pastor and his wife are alone in their work. Rarely, indeed, does a visitor come to these lonely mountain retreats. It was a great joy for us to find M. Saintron there; he had climbed the hill to the north as we had come from the south. Just an hour or two of precious Christian intercourse, and then he was away again among the vacant parishes and neglected hamlets of the Drôme. In winter the isolation must be extreme.

"What a change, to come almost directly from Ancelon to St. Etienne! River, canal, railway, every facility for locomotion at least. Here are wooded hills and long chimneys, coal-pits and iron-works; the silence of the hills and the sound of waterfalls exchanged for the rattle of machinery and the continual detonations from the gun-barrel manufactory. As the fields differ, the work differs and the workers. Here we find the McAll Mission in full activity, also chapel, and others at work; workmen's meetings, under their French name ouvriers, held four times a week in different salles; réunions populaires every night in one or other of the quarters of the town, and the Medical Mission attracting the sick to come to the great Healer.

"It is so different from reading a report to see all this for one's self. Never had I so fully appreciated the work of the McAll Mission, as when I heard a young and zealous pastor, who is engaged here in the réunions populaires, say heartily, 'I am the child of the McAll Mission, and my wife also. Both of us were brought up in the Roman Catholic Church.' There is much to interest in the Medical Mission of St. Etienne. Those who come are nearly all Catholics, or have been such, till, at the Medical Mission, or réunion populaire, they have learned the truths of the Gospel.

"Mrs. Robertson recently sent here a supply of Testaments for gratuitous distribution. Yesterday I had the privilege of giving one of these to an intelligent young ouvrier who had never even heard of such a book. He listened as I read the story of the prodigal with eager curiosity, evidently having no idea of how the story would end. While I spoke with him, Miss Mudie found a young mother equally ignorant and equally delighted to have the Book. I do hope that when the present stock of Testaments is distributed another supply may be sent. In fact, one feels as if Dr. Burroughs should, at all events, be free from all pecuniary anxieties as to the Medical Mission. He is solely responsible for it, finds the funds, prescribes for the patients, prepares the medicines, gives the opening Gospel address, and all this in addition to his work as Director of the McAll Mission, which means providing for fourteen meetings weekly, with occasional Sunday work in the nearer Catholic villages.

"Those who bear the burden and heat of the day have a claim to our sympathy, our prayers, our help. Miss Mudie and I go back to our own corner of the vineyard, humbled and stimulated by the zeal of others, and thankful that for us, too, there is something to do for the Master.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Jeannie's Beautiful Confidence.—At a recent meeting a Christian friend remarked: "I heard of a little girl, both of whose parents had died, who was asked by a lady, for the purpose of testing the child's faith, 'Now that your mother is gone, to whom will you tell your troubles, Jeannie?' 'To Jesus,' she replied, 'for when mother was living she taught me to tell Jesus everything.' 'But Jesus is very far away, and He has a great many things to do; do you think He will mind a little thing like you?' Looking up, she simply answered, 'Yes; for He says so.'"

A Lesson from a Muff.—An Evangelist Said: "A little girl got a present of a muff, of which she was very proud. When she walked out with the evangelist she was always in the habit of taking his hand; but when next she walked out she took her muff with her and placed both her hands therein. 'Won't you give me your hand, dear?' But she thought she could manage to keep her feet, although the roads were very slippery, it being winter. She had not gone far until she missed her footing, and fell. After this she gave him her hand, when she was led along in perfect safety. Thus we, if we place the hand of our faith in that of our heavenly Father, how safely we shall walk through the slippery paths of life."

Drawn Out of the Rapids.—A Minister Said: "A lumberman in America went to the edge of a river for the purpose of securing some logs to the bank, when he fell into the stream and was speedily drawn down with the current toward the rapids. A friend at this moment rode up to the edge of the bank, and seeing the danger in which the man was, rode to a bridge further down the stream; quickly he seized a rope and lowered it over the bridge, and as the drowning man was about to be swept into the whirling water he saw the rope, and with a desperate effort he seized it, and was quickly drawn up to the bridge. Jesus, the Friend of sinners, holds out to us the only means of safety, even Himself, for has He not said, 'I came to seek and to save that which was lost?'"

A Farmer's Work for Christ.—The Rev. Mr. Inglis, of Dundee, said: "When Mr. Hammond first visited Annan, in Dumfriesshire, I went round to see the fruits of his labor at the end of the meetings there. My two sisters, who are now called to be with Jesus, were brought to the Lord under Mr. Hammond's preaching. I remember the case of a well-to-do farmer, but a rougher or a less likely man you never saw, but he came into one of Mr. Hammond's meetings, was convicted of sin, and afterward was converted, and what a burning and shining light he became in Annan! He gave up his farm to preach the Gospel. Three times a week that man went up and down on the railway, from Annan to Glasgow, to preach Christ to the people in the train. At length the authorities of the railway gave him a free pass, and in this way many were led by him to Christ. Another was an exceedingly rough man, who was brought to a knowledge of the truth at that time. After his conversion he became very anxious for the souls of others, and won many to Christ!"

A Violinist's Grief.—Mr. George Ross remarked: "An aged Christian used to play on the violin. His fame went abroad throughout all the district, so sweetly did he play upon this instrument. Some musicians came to the town, and hearing of the old man and his playing went to see him. On a beautiful warm morning they found him sitting outside his cottage door and singing and playing on his violin. As the sweet strains fell upon their ears they hushed their voices to listen, and they heard him sing:

'He took me from a fearful pit,
And from the miry clay;
And on a rock He set my feet
Establishing my way.'

When the old man ceased a murmur of most beautiful 'wound round the musicians. The old man requested them to play something upon their instruments. While they played his eyes filled with tears, and they asked him why he was weeping. 'I am weeping,' said the old man, 'to hear such grand music given to the service of the devil.'

Visiting the Gambling Saloons.—Mr. Hammond said: "Years ago in Syracuse, N. Y., we were holding meetings which were well attended. It was proposed that we should visit all the saloons in the surrounding district. It was agreed upon, and a number of ministers and myself, with a band of singers, went through these saloons, where there was a great deal of gambling carried on. When we asked permission of the keepers of these saloons to go in they would say, 'If you choose you can have a meeting here,' and such answers. The result was that many joined us. Finally we came to a German saloon, when some of these young converts became too enthusiastic in the work, and getting ahead of us they ran in there without asking permission. The German saloon keeper became very angry, and said: 'Ve don't vant any of dis Jesus here; dis vill spile mine trade; nor any of your shinging.' Nor any swearing, either,' I added. 'No,' he rejoined, 've don't vant any swearing either.' I began quickly to speak to the crowd, and said: 'There is a saloon-keeper who says he will not have any swearing here.' I spoke on the sin of profanity for about fifteen minutes. The saloon-keeper and all present were solemnized, and we heard afterward that numbers who came in to this meeting were converted."

Robbery and Murder Prevented by Prayer.—Mr. Hammond said: "A minister in Canada, with whom I was well acquainted, one night was led to go to a certain house, four miles away, and pray. He tried to put the thought from his mind, but he could not banish it. Finally he went out and saddled his horse and rode to the house, where he found it all dark. He turned his horse homeward, smiling at his own fancy. But again a voice seemed to say, 'Did I not tell you to go into that house and pray?' He turned back and said, 'Well, Lord, I will do as you bid me.' He alighted from his horse and found the door unbolted. Entering, he found the house quite dark; not a movement was heard. Kneeling at a chair he prayed aloud, and rising, he left the house, feeling rather ashamed to tell his wife of this. Eighteen months afterward he was preaching in a prison, and at the close a man came to him and said: Did you not pray in such a house on such a night, eighteen months ago? The minister all remembered the occasion, and said he did. Well, said the man, 'I was in that house waiting for the owner, who was expected home with large sum of money, intending to rob him and kill him, if need be; but when you came in and prayed I could not do it. When you left the use I slunk away.'"

Clothes and a Railway Ticket Wanted.—Mr. Payson Hammond related the following personal narrative at one of his meetings in Glasgow, from which it appeared that even in his young days the narrator was remarkable for his zeal and kindness: "When I was a student in Williams' College I spent all my spare time in working for my divine Master. The whole of my vacation I spent in preaching to people who knew not God; and Sunday after Sunday I walked seven miles to a place that I might carry the glad tidings of the Gospel to them. I also conducted Sunday-school, and one afternoon a little boy, named Joseph Barclay, came to the College, and said: 'Dear Mr. Hammond, my other lives up in Maine, and I am going to talk home to her. A man took me from my other's home and brought me down here and made me work for him all through the summer, and when the winter came on he turned me out of doors.' 'My boy, I said, 'you can never talk there; it is hundreds of miles away; you could die on the way in this cold weather.' (Well, he replied, 'will you give me a letter to the conductors of the railway?' 'What good could that do? I am only a student; they now nothing of me!' The little boy began to peep bitter tears. I then wrote a letter to my associates, telling them the boy's story, and asking them to give him a little money to help him on his way. Giving him a small sum of money and the letter, I sent him off to my classmates. He soon returned with his face shining, and his hands full of money. I took him into a clothing-store, and got him a new outfit; then I bought him his ticket, and saw him safely on his way to his mother." This, Mr. Hammond thought, was an illustration of "the manner in which Jesus has provided a garment of salvation for all who believe in Him, and He has paid our way to heaven, when He came down from His father's home, and bled and died for us."

RUSSIA: HER CONQUESTS AND DOWNFALL.

By Rev. A. C. Tris, of Howard City, Kan.

Israel the Golden Thread of Prophecy—Other Nations in Connection—Ezekiel's Reference to Russia—Evidently Unfulfilled—Identification of the Northern Peoples.

PROPHECY deals only in a few instances with the nations now in existence, living in this dispensation, called "The Dispensation of the Gentiles;" and if those nations are mentioned, it is always in their connection with the Jews or their relation to the land of Canaan. Israel stands in prophecy as "the nation" pre-eminently; the nations, "Gentiles," are mentioned secondarily. Israel is the golden thread woven in the history of nations and people, the centre of all; and in that connection we find the future of other nations outlined, among them that of the Russian Empire, as it were, as an adjunct to the Hebrews. The 37th chapter of Ezekiel speaks of Israel's return to Canaan, and the 40th chapter gives a description of the glorious temple to be built in Jerusalem, and between those chapters we find in the 38th and 39th the conquests and also the downfall of the Russian Empire.

UNFULFILLED.

The great questions concerning those two chapters are these: Do they belong to the present and future time, or are they already fulfilled? The answer must be, They are yet unfulfilled, because the history of former ages has no record of a war causing such a destruction of nations. At no time in the past did "the Jews dwell in Canaan safely and at rest, dwelling in cities without walls," without fortifications or strongholds, "having neither bars nor gates" (Ezek. 38: 11). The picture drawn by the prophet is marvellous, and is so in contrast with the spirit of the present age of war, rapine, theft, and burglary, that it rather seems to relate to an ideal age of fiction than of reality; and yet so the future time shall be. It is recorded in Is. 2: 4, "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

We know with certainty that this prophecy of Ezekiel belongs to the future time verses 8 and 16 speak of—"after many days," "in the latter days" (literal Hebrew, in the latter years, in the last days). The prophetic formula used here is found also in Is. 2: 2; Gen. 49: 1; Micah 4: 1; and if any one should have yet a doubt about it, the question seems decisively settled by verses 8 and 12, where it is said of Israel, the Jews: "That they were brought back from the sword and were gathered out of many peoples," and that their land, "the mountains of Israel," have been "a perpetual waste." Here is plainly spoken of the restoration of the house of Jacob to their own land.

RUSSIA.

The Hebrew words of chapter 38: 2, 3, and of 39: 1 read: "Son of man, set thy face unto Gog of the land of Magog—Prince of Rosh—Meshech and Tubal," and not, as we have them in our authorized translation, "The chief prince." (See Geikie, "Hours with the Bible," p. 183; Gesenius Lexicon, p. 955; Dr. Young, in loco; Baxter, Bochart, Michaelis, D'Herbelot, and others.) These and other authorities agree on the following explanation of the names mentioned by the prophet: Magog.—A region and also a great and powerful people dwelling in the extreme recesses of the north, the former territory of the Sarmatians and Scythians, the very location of Russia and Siberia. Gog.—The king of the land of Magog, a name given as Cesars, Pharaohs, Czars of Russia, and others. Rosh.—A northern nation—the Russian. The Byzantine writers of the tenth century described that nation under the name of Röös, inhabiting the northern part of Taurus; and also Ibn Tosslian, an Arabian writer, called them Ros, dwelling upon the river Volga (Trahn, Petersburg, 1823, p. 28, and Von Hammer, "Origin of the Russians," Petersburg, 1827), and in the Koran (Sale, pp. 196, 280) they are mentioned as "Al Rass."

Meshech.—Probably the Moschi, a barbarous people inhabiting the Moschian Mountains, between Iberia, Armenia, and Colchis (Ps. 120: 5; Strabo, XI., 344, 378), usually coupled with the Tibareni. Tubal and Meshech appear not only as barbarian warriors, riding on steppe horses, but as a trading people, who brought vessels of iron and copper to Tyre (Ezek. 27: 13), and also slaves (Circassians) to that market. Tubal.—A people of Asia Minor dwelling on the south-eastern shore of the Euxine, on the west of Moshi (Gen. 10: 2; Is. 66: 19; Ezek. 32: 26). It is quite remarkable that the ancient names have been perpetuated in Tobolsk, Moscow, and in Rus-land, and the word Muscovite is generally in use in Europe to express the name of a Russian.

It must be borne in mind that the territories of the Scythians, Sarmatians, Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal were never in the bounds and limits of the so-called Roman earth; neither were they comprehended in the dimensions of the metallic image of Nebuchadnezzar. All these nations were but slightly known to the Jews, Romans, and Greeks, under the general title of "the Barbarians of the North."

HISTORY AND CONQUESTS.

That there are turning points in the history of nations is a well-known fact, and some of them are cosmic. It is worthy of remark that in the same century that Constantinople fell and the Ottoman power was established, the continent of America was discovered, the printing-press was invented, the light of the Reformation dawned in the West, and that the Russian Empire commenced to grow.

That empire symbolized as the Northern Bear was founded by Rurik in 862; its millennium of existence was celebrated only a few years ago. In 955 the patriarch of Constantinople baptized the Queen Olga, and Christianity was introduced in the ninth century, and at the end of the tenth century the foundation of the Russian Church was laid. Russia being the mission-field of the Byzantine Church cannot be called the original Greek Church; neither can it claim the title of the Byzantine Church. After more than six centuries of war from the incursions of the Mongols, Tartars, and Poles, and after long intestine struggles between provinces and principalities, Peter the Great consolidated, in 1589, his dominions in Europe and Asia as the great Russian Empire. To-day that territory is the largest territory of any nation on the globe—much more than twice the area of the United States of America, one twenty-fourth part of the globe. One fourth of her domains lies in Europe and the rest in Asia, with a population of one hundred millions.

This territory is double what it was at the accession of Peter the Great. Recalling to our memory some of the aggressions and conquests, the last of which was confirmed by the Treaty of Berlin, 1878, we must be impressed with the idea that it means some wonderful manifestation of Providence in the growth of such an empire. The battle of Pultowa, 1721, and the Treaty of Nystadt in September of that year, the province in which St. Petersburg now stands, was conceded to Russia. A half century later, 1774, the Muscovite standard was advanced to the Crimea and the sea of Asof, and an annexation was made from Tartary larger than the whole German Empire. In 1783 Russian power reached the vast plains which lie between the Black and Caspian seas. In the eleven years following Russia had a southern frontier line of seven hundred miles.

The subsequent extensions of the Russian Empire have been in the direction of Northern China and the Pacific, "the illimitable Siberia," the valley of the Amoor to its mouth and to the sea of Japan being twenty-two hundred miles long. In the south, through Turkestan, Khiva, and Merv to the Hindoo-Coosh Mountain and Afghan passes, they are approaching to Herat. Indeed, it is the Colossus of the north, east, and south.

RUSSIA IN PROPHECY.

The word of Jehovah corroborates fully the truth of the above statement, and gives a farther intimation of yet greater acquisitions to be made. Ezek. 38: 4 called "Gog" a "numerous assembly." Verse 6, "Many peoples are with thee. Thou, and all thine assemblies who are assembled unto thee, and thou hast been to them for a guard." Verse 9, "Thou, and all thy bands, and many peoples with thee." Verse 15 gives a description of the Russian army as a newspaper correspondent might write it, with its hordes of Cossack cavalry prominent and preponderating over the infantry—"And thou hast come in out of thy place, from the sides of the north, thou and many peoples with thee, riding on horses all of them, a great assembly and a numerous force" (Young). Verse 4 also refers to this particular feature of the army of that empire. The Lord says: "I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses and horsemen, all of them clothed with all sorts of armor, even a great company with bucklers and shields, all of them handling swords;" and how true is this description applicable to the Russian army. The Cossacks alone have already given to Europe the impression of the prowess of Russia; that empire has at the present time three hundred and thirteen squadrons of cavalry, besides three hundred thousand irregular troops of Cossacks, Kirghez, Circassians, and other contingents. There is no nation on the globe that answers better to the description of that word of prophecy.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Immigration Statistics for the Past Year were published last week by the National Bureau. It reports that the number of immigrants arrived in the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1885, was 387,821, being 122,013 less than the immigration during the preceding fiscal year and 401,171 less than during the year ended June 30th, 1882, the year of the greatest immigration. During the month of June, 1885, there arrived in the customs districts of Baltimore, Boston, Detroit, Huron, Minnesota, New Orleans, New York, Passamaquoddy, Philadelphia, and San Francisco, 55,778 passengers, of whom 45,382 were immigrants, 6952 citizens of the United States returned from abroad, and 3444 aliens not intending to remain in the United States.

Preparations for the Great Tariff Debate, which it is expected will take place when Congress meets, are already in progress. Two hundred communications from business men and manufacturers in reply to Secretary Manning's letter of invitation for suggestions in relation to the subject have been received at the Treasury. There has not been so general a response as was anticipated, but what has been received gives much valuable material to the Treasury Department for use in the annual report of the Secretary. These have been classified and collated by competent officials. The iron manufacturers have not replied individually, but it is understood they are preparing a comprehensive statement representing their views and giving interesting statistical information that will be of service whenever the subject is considered by Congress. The general impression in the country is that although the subject will be debated, there will be no important changes made in the tariff at the approaching session.

The Grounds for Encouragement which Temperance men think they have discovered in the recently issued report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are diminished by careful analysis. The money received in taxes on distilled liquor during the financial year is less than that received during the previous year by $9,512,545. That amount represents a decrease of consumption of 10,800,000 gallons. It is, however, stated by well-informed authorities that the decrease is largely due to a difference in the export to foreign countries, and to the fact that stocks in the hands of dealers were unusually large at the beginning of the year, and are now low. Another cause is that business has been depressed, and cheaper liquor has been drunk. The quantity of beer drunk in the fiscal year was 10.3 gallons for every inhabitant, while in the year before it was 9.81 gallons, an increase of about half a gallon a head. The inference that the hard times rather than temperance progress has affected the traffic is confirmed by another item in the report, which shows a decrease in the number of cigars smoked, and an increase in the quantity of tobacco.

A Remarkable Crime was Committed in New York on August 31st. A man in Texas named Holland received some time ago a circular from New York, stating that some counterfeit bills might be bought at a low price in this city. The Texas came on, and met the New Yorker, whose name was Davis. Arrangements were made for the delivery of the forged paper, and Holland went to the office of the counterfeiters to receive it. Davis had no counterfeit bills, but he handed over to his customer a lot of good money, which Holland put in his satchel. Davis then called off the Texan's attention while his brother removed the money from the satchel, and put packets of blank paper in the place. Holland discovered the substitution, and drawing his revolver, he shot Davis, and tried to shoot Davis's brother. When arrested, he said: "This man was trying to rob me; that is why I shot him." He appeared to ignore the fact that his own intention was to rob the public, by passing counterfeit money. As citizens of Texas are displaying sympathy with the murderer, and his trial is likely to be attended by considerable excitement, it should be understood that, according to his own queer code of morals, the man's life is forfeited.

Dr. Talmage Explicitly Declines the Nomination of the Prohibition party for the Governorship of New York. In a letter recently received from him, Dr. Talmage says: "I cannot see that it would be my duty to accept the nomination. It seems to me that I can serve the cause better from my present place. . . . That the cause will march on to complete success is as certain as that God did not make this world to be like it destroyed by a deluge of strong drink."

Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Sr., Died on Thursday last at his home, at Irvington-on-the-Hudson. He was eighty-five years old, and during the past three years he had been suffering from decay of his mental faculties. He retired from active ministerial labor in 1878, after a pastorate of fifty-seven years, of which thirty-two years were spent at St. George's Church, New York. Dr. Tyng was an earnest evangelical clergyman, rigidly opposed to High Church doctrines and practices. He worked hard in preaching, pastoral, and Sunday-school work, and was eminently successful. His portrait and a sketch of his life will appear in an early number of this journal.

Vigorous Measures are Being Taken to Stamp out the small-pox epidemic in Montreal. At a public meeting of citizens held on September 5th, at which the Mayor presided, resolutions were passed ordering house to house vaccination by competent surgeons, the providing of suitable hospital accommodation for the isolation of patients, and the thorough cleansing of the city. The Finance Committee was authorized to place all the funds necessary to carry out their objects, and a Citizens' Committee was formed to act in conjunction with the Provincial Board of Health. This Board will have arbitrary power to deal with the disease, and to use all measures for its eradication. A meeting of medical men was held on September 4th, at which complaints were made against the municipal authorities. Montreal was declared by one speaker to be in a chronic state of filth, and the worst drained city on the Continent. An order in council has been passed by the Government of the province providing that any special locality or the whole province may be proclaimed in case of an epidemic, and appointing a Board of Health with arbitrary powers, and the work of cleaning up and enforcing vaccination in municipalities adjoining Montreal may be executed by the board at the cost of such municipalities. There were seventy-five deaths from the disease registered in the city last week, of which nineteen occurred on Saturday. On the same day there were thirty-one new cases reported.

An Insult to the German Flag in Spain has produced consternation in Europe. The Spanish populace has been in a state of agitation since Germany seized the two Caroline Islands, and it has been necessary to place a special guard at the German Embassy in Madrid. On Friday last, however, there was a riot in the Spanish capital, and the guard was overpowered. An excited crowd surged through the streets of Madrid all night long, frantically gesticulating and calling the Emperor William, the Crown Prince, and Bismarck the vilest names. Several thousand people, shouting "Death to Bismarck!" "Viva Espana!" mobbed the German Embassy, smashing the windows, breaking into a thousand pieces the German arms on the Embassy building, and trampling the fragments under their feet. The Embassy was completely wrecked. The furniture and mirrors were dashed to pieces, the people almost foaming at their mouths with frenzy. The news was promptly telegraphed to Prince Bismarck, who at once consulted the Emperor, and will, it is expected, demand reparation from Spain. The prospects of Spain recovering the Caroline Islands peaceably are now much diminished.

British Political Affairs are in a Disorganized condition. The probabilities of a success for the Liberals, which would have carried Mr. Gladstone back into power, are clouded by an open rupture between the two men who, next to the ex-Premier, are the most influential members of the Liberal party. The Marquis of Hartington has publicly repudiated the programme Mr. Chamberlain laid down for the Liberal party, and speaks of his ex-colleague in the Cabinet as a socialist. Thereupon Lord Randolph Churchill invited Lord Hartington to join the Conservatives, and mercilessly exposed the divisions in the Liberal ranks. It is remarkable that in his speech Lord Randolph carefully refrained from criticising Mr. Parnell's recent manifesto, which is the most important question of the hour. Mr. Parnell's power in Ireland is steadily growing, and it is evident that he is likely to command in the new Parliament a compact and disciplined force of eighty members. In that case, unless one of the great parties has an overwhelming majority, Mr. Parnell can dictate his own terms or render legislation for the whole empire impossible.

The Approaching Elections in France are anticipated with considerable anxiety. The Republican camp is split into two sections, which appear to hate each other more violently than either section hates the reactionaries. The reactionaries, too, are hopelessly divided, and are jealous of each other. They comprise the Bonapartists and the Monarchists. An attempt has been made to combine them against the Republic, but in arranging the lists of candidates for the constituencies, the Monarchists have taken advantage of the Bonapartists, and a quarrel has ensued which will prejudice both sections at the polls. The two sections of the Republicans are led respectively by M. Clemenceau and M. Jules Ferry. Clemenceau's wing contains the socialists and red Republicans. It is thought that if he succeeds at the polls a revolution will be precipitated, as the middle classes dread, with good reason, the supremacy of the party responsible for the Commune. M. Ferry, who aspires to the position of Gambetta, as the leader of the moderate Republicans, would have the best prospects for success were he not discredited by the miserable wars in Tonquin and Madagascar, and by his foreign policy generally, which has offended every friend France had in Europe.

A Cowardly Conspiracy to Punish the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette has been devised by certain influential persons. In the course of his investigations he was anxious to test the truth of statements made to him, which revealed a depth of infamy which tried his credulity. He therefore requested a procuress, who had bought and sold many children for immoral purposes, to procure a child as she had been accustomed to do for vicious men. She did so, and Mr. Stead, in the course of his disclosures, stated that the bargain had been made. He is now to be prosecuted for that act, with the woman who acted as his agent. He will not be allowed to open up the whole question in court, as the judge has the power to exclude irrelevant evidence. It is evident that he is to be prosecuted for making the revelations, not for abducting the child, though that is to be made the ostensible ground for the prosecution. The serving of the warrants has aroused popular indignation.

Mr. William Noble, the Celebrated Gospel temperance evangelist, whose work in this country in 1877 will be fresh in the recollection of our readers, is again here on his way to Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. He is at present on a visit to his intimate friend, Mr. J. B. Gough. Numerous invitations from all the States have been sent to him, soliciting a visit, so that it is probable he will remain in the United States through the fall and winter. His work at Hoxton Hall, London, has been the wonder of the whole country. Many of the drunkards reformed under his effort are now lecturing and working in the cause of temperance. Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, writing of him, says: "He has done grand service in England, and is fitted for abounding usefulness anywhere and everywhere. He needs no introduction, for he is his own best commendation through the exceeding usefulness of his life. I hope his visit to other lands will be fraught with untold blessings to thousands, both as to temperance and the Gospel. I rejoice in all that Mr. Noble has done, and I desire for him every blessing that I could wish for myself." Letters for Mr. Noble may be sent to the care of Mr. J. B. Gough, Worcester, Mass., or to the office of this journal.

A New Mormon Settlement is to be Formed in Mexico. It will be commenced by the new immigrants from Europe, and a few of the more prominent leaders, whose polygamous practices render desirable for them a change of location from territory under the operation of the Edmunds law. The land selected is situated in the northern part of the State of Chihuahua, within fifty miles of the Arizona and New Mexican boundary line. A portion of the lands lie in Sonora. The new "Canaan" is a magnificent grazing country, well watered and susceptible of a high state of cultivation. The soil is virgin. It is said the Mormon section comprises about one million acres, which they have contracted to purchase at very low figures. No money has passed yet, as the titles are being perfected. Arrangements are going forward, however, for the immediate settlement of the lands, and the vanguard of the Mormon army will arrive the first week in December from Utah. The Mormons assert that the Mexican Government guarantee them freedom from molestation on the subject of polygamy. If they will go voluntarily from United States Territory a difficult problem will be solved, and they will save themselves from penalties which otherwise would be enforced.

Messrs. Mateer and Parker, the Two English evangelists who have been doing excellent work in connection with Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's church, have arrived in New York on an extended visit to this country. They purpose visiting all our chief cities, and are desirous of holding union meetings wherever that is practicable. Their permanent address is the Young Men's Christian Association, Brooklyn, N. Y. They bring a letter of commendation from Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, which will be a strong passport to Christian ministers and laymen in America. The following is an extract from that letter: "Messrs.

Mateer and Parker were two students in my college, and they have been for some considerable time evangelists at large, in connection with us. They have done eminent service. Mr. Mateer has received high commendation as an earnest speaker, of remarkable gifts and grace. Mr. Parker has a specially fine voice for singing. I believe that those who will provide for them spheres of Christian service will do good service to our Master's cause. I send this, with hearty salutations, to all the followers of our Lord Jesus."

A Nursery in the Church is a New Feature inaugurated in Iowa. The new Presbyterian Church at Carroll, Iowa, which has been dedicated free of debt, has a novel arrangement called the "Nursery." In the corners, on each side of the vestibule, curtains are drawn across, behind which are little rooms, and in each is a small comfortable rocker and a crib, all furnished for the babies. The pastor, Dr. Robinson, adopts this method to encourage mothers to attend the services.

A Murderer was Hanged in Effigy in Chicago, on August 29th, by an excited crowd. A large number of people, principally women, gathered in Clybourne Avenue, hoping to get a sight of a man charged with the murder of a woman. It was expected that the inquest would be held there, but it was held instead at the East Chicago Avenue Police Station. The assemblage on Clybourne Avenue attracted people from all the surrounding neighborhood, until its numbers were swelled to about one thousand. There were many calls for the execution of summary vengeance on the murderer, and had the inquest been held at that place there is no doubt but that the people would have seized and hanged him. Some of the leaders in the crowd hastily constructed an effigy resembling the murderer as he appeared in that neighborhood, with false face, spectacles, and an umbrella under the sleeves of the coat, and, amid deafening shouts, it was swung aloft on a rope stretched between two buildings. The crowd then vented its energy in howling at the effigy. This sham execution would probably discourage the accused man. It could do him no good, and it was an indication of the opinion the public have of his crime; but if he were told that public vengeance had been wreaked on an innocent man who had voluntarily assumed his guilt, and not on a mere inanimate representation of himself, he would naturally rejoice in hope of discharge. It is strange that sinners under God's condemnation so seldom manifest a like joy when they hear that Christ has suffered for them (Rom. 5: 7, 8).

A Thrilling Experience in a Shaft was described by the rescued man a few days ago. Nine of the workmen engaged on the new aqueduct at High Bridge, N. Y., were in the cage ascending the shaft at the dinner hour, when the huge bucket tipped, and a man who was standing on the edge fell off. Throwing out his arms, he caught a swinging rope, to which he clung with all the energy of despair. He said afterward: "When I first grasped the rope and found it held me I was much rejoiced. But to my horror I soon found the greasy cord was slowly but surely slipping through my grasp. I watched the bucket go away from me, and calculated how long it would take to send it back to me, and wondered if the rope was long enough to keep me up till the car could get back. I tell you I thought of most everything I ever did in those two or three minutes. I could feel the rope slowly but certainly slipping, and I put all my strength into my hands, but 'twas no use. I was sliding down, and must soon reach the end. I saw the car stop and heard the voices of my fellow-workmen. It seemed as if they never would lower the bucket again. I could feel my strength going, and knew that I must soon drop one hundred feet upon the rocks and be dashed to pieces." Happily for him, the cage was let down in time to take him on board before he came to the end of the rope, and he was saved. The man cried from thankfulness as he put his feet on the cage. In a position infinitely more perilous are sinners, to whom safety is offered through the Gospel (Job 33: 22-24).

How to Magnetize a Piece of Metal is Explained by a scientific journal. It states that any bar of steel may be made into a magnet by a very simple process. An old file, for example, is placed in a coil of moderate-sized wires, with one end resting against a block of iron. One of the wires from a dynamo-electric machine is connected to one end of the wire coil, while to the other end of the coil is attached a small block of iron, which rests against the free end of the file. The other wire from the dynamo-electric machine is attached to a good-sized hammer, the face of which is past injury by the spark. When the block to which the wire coil is attached is struck by the hammer against the end of the file, a mechanical shock is imparted, while at the same instant the electric current passes through the coil. The shock and the current together render the file magnetic, and it is stated that the magnetization thus obtained is permanent. The process may serve as a type of spiritual work. It would be well for the Church and the world if, when the hammer of conviction strikes the sinner and the current of God's love passes through his soul, he, too, became a spiritual magnet, drawing others into the kingdom (1 Cor. 9: 22).

A Romantic Wedding was Solemnized Recently in St. Louis. A pretty Belgian girl, who said her name was Eugenie, arrived there, and was promptly presented at the recorder's office by a young citizen of St. Louis, who is a native of Belgium. The bride-elect blushing acknowledged in French that she had known her lover since he was a little boy. He had been in this country for some years, and when he left Liege it was understood that he would return some day to claim Eugenie for his bride. A few weeks ago he took passage for Europe to redeem his promise, and when the young lovers met in their native town the fair Eugenie expressed a decided objection to residing in the United States. Her lover remained firm in his resolution to return here, and she begged to be released from her engagement. The lover reluctantly consented, and returned to America. It appears, however, that Eugenie found that he was more to her than she had supposed, for she left her home and friends, and followed him. The decision had evidently cost her a struggle, but she seemed glad to have come. Those whom Christ calls to follow Him are often reluctant at first to quit their old associates and their old ways; but there is no other way of becoming united to Him. So long as a woman is able to manifest such devotion to her lover, the demand of Christ on those for whom He died is not unreasonable (Matt. 10: 37, 38).

Sixteen Million Ancestors Can, it Appears, be claimed by any one who traces his pedigree back for eight hundred years. This curious and suggestive fact, of which few people are aware, is the subject of an interesting letter published in Nature from one of its correspondents. He calculates the duration of a generation according to the accepted rule of a little over thirty years. Thus, reckoning for one century, a man had two parents, four grandparents, and eight great-grandparents. In the second century the number rises to sixteen, thirty-two, and sixty-four. A century earlier the numbers double again at each generation until, in the year 1085, or twenty-four generations back, the people who could claim any particular man as their descendant must have numbered fully sixteen million persons. This number would be reduced by intermarriages; but, even those would leave a prodigious number of ancestors to every man's progeny. Evidently, as the correspondent says, the brotherhood of mankind is more of a literal truth than is generally supposed. That fact alone, however, would not, even if it were realized, insure brotherly feeling among men. A more effective bond is a realization of the brotherhood which exists in a common relationship to Christ (Matt. 23: 8).

WHAT IS THE VERDICT?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God."—1 JOHN 3: 21.

The Confidence of the Saved—Proceeds from a Trial—I. The Trial in the Court of the Heart—Not the Great Assize—Condemnation a Bad Omen—The Trial Avoided—Not to be Continuous—The Question at Issue—Plenty of Evidence—II. The Acquittal—Caution Necessary—The Best Christians the Most Afflicted—Sickness Purifying—III. The Consequence of the Acquittal—Kinds of Confidence Produced—The Perfect Peace.

CAREFULLY observe that this text is spoken to the people of God. It speaks to those who are called "beloved." These are the people who are specially loved of God and of His people. It is a very sweet and endearing title, but it evidently in this case belongs only to those who are of the family of grace; these alone can remain uncondemned of their hearts, and live in confidence toward God. I want you to observe this, because there are different ways of addressing different people, and these ways are instructive. To those who are not yet numbered among the beloved, we preach the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. But when we come to speak to those who are saved, to those who are the beloved of God, we deal not with the pardon of criminals, but with the conduct of children. As soon as we become children we are freed from the condemning power of the law; we are not under the principle and motive of the law of works, but yet we are not without law unto Christ. We come under those sacred regulations which rule the household of God. We are dealt with not as mere subjects are ruled by a king, but as children are governed by a father. If we so live that our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God.

It appears from the text that this child-like confidence toward God originally arises out of a certain solemn trial of our case. There is to be a trial within the heart, or conscience, a trial in which every power of the inner nature is to take its part as prosecutor, witness, jury, or judge. Out of this trial comes the non-condemnation which gives birth to "confidence toward God."

I. I want you to think of

in the inner court of man's nature, within his heart. It is a sort of petty sessions, not the Great Assize. Conscience sits within us, as judges sometimes sit in chambers, hearing cases, as they say, in camera. If we be righteously acquitted in this first court, then the matter is ended, and we have confidence toward God; but if our heart condemn us, if in this preliminary trial we are condemned, it is an evil omen; for the probability is that the great all-knowing Judge will more than confirm the sentence. Condemnation by our own conscience is an ill sign, though even yet there is a court of appeal. If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. I will now speak upon this trial under the heads of certain observations.

This trial is studiously avoided by very many. Many professors shun anything like a testing of their profession, any trying of their religion by examination. Multitudes of persons seldom think; they live the life of butterflies, flitting from flower to flower with careless wing; there is no real purpose in their lives. Many others think, and think deeply, but not about their souls or their God. They consider the matter of their relationship to their Creator to be a very secondary matter, which can be taken up in the last few minutes of their lives, when the death sweat is on their brow and they are quite incapable of proper judgment. They leave, I say, the best things to the worst moments, and think that they are wise in so doing. This is a grave folly, and ought not to rule a man in his senses.

Certain Christian professors, too, who should know better, seldom examine themselves as to whether they are in the faith. They take it for granted that all is well with them. They made a profession a great many years ago; they have been decent sort of people ever since; in fact, they have been respected among their fellow-Christians, possibly they have even taken office in the church. Are they to question their foundation? Is it necessary that they should put themselves into the scales and be weighed again? It is a very ominous sign for a man when he is afraid of discussing his spiritual state in the chamber of his own heart. I am persuaded that many Christians are the subjects of doubts and fears about their own condition, simply because they have never had the matter out. It is a great deal better to sift an affair to the bottom than it is to be always tormented by suspicion.

I do not think it is a healthy state of things for man to be always singing:

"'Tis a point I long to know."

Brother, you ought to know whether you love the Lord or no. Your love must be very cold and feeble if it be a matter of question. Warmth of love proves its own existence in many ways. Friend, you should be anxious to the last degree to take stock of your spiritual estate. Your desire should be to know the very worst of your case. If your condition should turn out to be horribly bad, you had better know it; certainly your knowing it will not make it any worse. If your case should turn out to be all right, then you will have the confidence that comes of this knowledge—the confidence of which our text speaks. But, I repeat it sadly, many avoid the inward trial of the heart; they will not bring their case into the spiritual court, even though the judgment-seat be set up in the privacy of their own inward nature. Thus they walk on blindfold to the brink of the precipice. God grant the bandage may be taken off before they have taken the final and fatal step.

But, secondly, let us note that genuine Christians very much frequent this

COURT OF CONSCIENCE.

They long to have their condition put to a thorough test, lest they be deceived. I have known some Christians even keep too much in this court; they so often test themselves that it looks as if they would spend their lives in making trials of their state. Looking within can be easily overdone; we ought to have higher work than that of continually laying the foundation of repentance from dead works. When a ship first leaves the stocks it is well for it to go a trial trip, but to have a ship always being tried would be very absurd; it is time that it took voyages in real earnest, and was registered in the merchant service; there will then be trial enough in the actual execution of service. Some Christians, by a continual introspection, are always raising the point, "Am I a Christian?" Brother, be a Christian. "Am I a child of God?" Brother, be a child of God, and enjoy it; and do not spend a lifetime in searching for the family register. However, it is certain that the genuine Christian is not averse to self-examination, nor to any form of test through which he can be put. The spirit of the true man answers to this; he is always willing to set in order the court of conscience, and make solemn trial of his heart and life.

In this court, dear friends,

THE QUESTION TO BE DECIDED

is a very weighty one. What is that question, do you think? I do not think it is the question, "Am I perfect?" because we can solve that without holding a formal court. The question is not, "Am I absolutely free from sin?" for, "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us." The question is this, "Am I sincere in the truth?" Is my religion true, and am I true in my profession of it? Next, "Does love rule in my nature?" Then the next question is, "Do I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ?" In the verse which succeeds my text this is put as a great test, that we believe in Jesus Christ. Faith is the main question for conscience to decide, together with the following one, "Do I also keep His commandments? Do I obey God? Do I seek to be holy as Jesus is holy? Or am I living in known sin, and tolerating that in myself which does not and cannot please God?" These are the questions to be tried in the court of conscience, and never was there a weightier issue.

This court is guided by

A MASS OF EVIDENCE.

That evidence has not to be sought for, it is there already. If the case were to be, "Do my fellow-men think me a child of God; do they regard me as being a believer in whom faith works by love?" that would be a difficult question, because we should have to subpoena so many to give their opinion of our private and public life. But in this case we have nothing to do with outsiders; the conscience is the witness as well as the judge and jury. The whole case is carried on within. Memory rises up and says, "I remember all thou hast done since thy profession of conversion—thy shortcomings and breaches of covenant." The will confesses to offences which never ripened into acts for want of opportunity. The passions own to outbreaks which were concealed from human observation. The imagination is made to bear testimony, and what a sinful power that imagination is, and how difficult it is to govern it; its tale is sad to hear. Our tempers confess to evil anger, our lusts to evil longings, our hearts to evil covetousness, pride, and rebellion. Hopeful witness there is also of sin conquered, habits broken, and desires repressed; all this is honestly taken in evidence and duly weighed. Everything within us will have to tell whether it has been renewed or not, whether it has been changed from darkness to light, and come from under the power of sin and Satan into the power of Christ. Each power can give evidence of grace or token of unregeneracy, and according to the weight of evidence the verdict must go.

WAITING FOR THE VERDICT.

While the trial is going on, the deliberation causes great suspense. As long as I have to ask my heart, "Heart, dost thou condemn me, or dost thou acquit me?" I stand trembling. You may have seen a picture entitled, "Waiting for the Verdict." The artist has put into the countenances of the waiters every form of unrest, for the suspense is terrible. Blessed be God, we are not called upon to wait long for the verdict of conscience. We ought never to let the question remain in suspense at all; we should settle it, and settle it in the light of God, and then walk in the light as God is in the light.

One thing I will observe, however, before I leave this matter: it is not the supreme court. I pray you all to recollect this, that the trial by your conscience is not, after all, the ultimate and the decisive one; because your conscience may go to sleep, or make a mistake in your favor; or your conscience may become morbid, and may not take under its consideration all the facts of the case, and so may go against you. Since there may be an error of judgment you should make your appeal to the Most High, saying, "Search me, O God." Above all, if your conscience should now condemn you, still remember that there remaineth the free, full Gospel even for the chief of sinners. If you stand before God condemned in heart this morning, throw yourself upon your face with that sense of condemnation upon you, and cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner." Whichever verdict comes from an enlightened conscience, it will be exceedingly serviceable to you if you have regard to it.

II. Allow me, secondly, to speak to you upon a pleasing theme—namely, from this court: "If our heart condemn us not." Observe, that a man may get an acquittal from the court of conscience; for the question laid before the heart can be settled. It can be ascertained whether I sincerely believe in Jesus Christ; it can be ascertained whether I sincerely love God and love His people; it can be ascertained whether my heart is obedient to the commands of the Lord Jesus Christ. These are not hazy, mysterious problems, which can never be solved. The case may be made clear one way or the other. The court has no difficulty before it beyond its faculty; it is quite competent to decide the question in the light of Scripture by the help of God.

THE ACQUITTAL ISSUED

BLESSED SICKNESS.

These questions, however, must be debated with great discernment. Suppose a person to be greatly tempted, to be tempted morning, noon, and night with foul temptations, yet conscience must not say, "This person is no child of God, because he is tempted." There is no sin in being tempted, since our Lord Jesus was tempted of the devil, and yet in him was no sin. It will never do to say, "I am greatly afflicted in estate, in family, or in depression of spirits, and therefore I cannot be a child of God." What, are not God's children chastened? What son is there whom the Father chasteneth not? Some of the best children of God have been the most afflicted; aye, and let me say it pointedly, some of the purest Christians that have ever lived have had the most sickness to bear, and by that means they have been made more meet for heaven, even as the sycamore fig by being bruised becomes ripe.

UNTRUSTWORTHY EVIDENCE.

Permit me to say here that this question in the court of the heart must never be settled by our feelings. If the heart be at all right in its judgments it will never say, "I am a child of God because I am so happy;" nor will it exclaim, on the other hand, "I cannot be a child of God because I am so sad." Holy feelings may be brought in as evidence, but they are hard to estimate. Feelings are variable as the wind; feelings depend so much upon the body and outward surroundings, so much even upon the condition of the atmosphere. I protest that as to feelings I go up and down very much according to the weather-glass. Therefore I make small account of my feelings.

The question of our state ought to be settled speedily. As I have already said to you, it must not be allowed to hang about. We know "the law's delays," but we must not allow any delay in this court. No, we must press for summary justice. Does my heart condemn me, or does not my heart condemn me? Get a clear and plain answer at once to this issue. If your heart condemns any of you here this morning, if you say, "Yes, I am a member of the church but I ought not to be, I do not live as I should;" if you are not believers in Christ; if you feel that you have no love to the brethren, then take the verdict, and go humbly to God and ask Him to renew your hearts. The door of free grace is still open to you. But, on the other hand, if your conscience says, "Yes, with all my imperfections, with all my infirmities, I do love God with all my heart; I do trust in Christ; I know that the things I once loved I now hate, and the things I once hated I now love; I desire to perfect holiness in the fear of God;" then you are in the condition of which the apostle says, "If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God."

III. Let us consider

of this acquittal. Here is the man who has had his acquittal in the court of conscience. Your conscience has said, "He is a sincere man; he is a believing man; he is quickened with the life of God; he is an obedient and God-fearing man;" and now you have confidence toward God; or at least you have a right to such confidence. What does that confidence or boldness mean? There is the confidence of truthfulness. When you kneel down to pray, you know that you are praying, and not mocking God; when you sing, you are making melody in your heart; when you preach, you are preaching that which your soul believes. This deep sincerity breeds in a man a blessed indifference to the judgments of men. Having a conscience void of offence, he feels a holy freedom as to the formalities of pretence.

This leads to great confidence in prayer.

Look at the context. "We have confidence toward God. And whatsoever we ask, we receive of Him, because we keep His commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in His sight." If you want power in prayer you must have purity in life. There is no promise in the Bible made to every one of you that whatsoever you ask God will give you; it is made to persons of a certain character; the unlimited promise is to the man of God who is so sanctified that he will not ask, and does not think of asking, anything that is not in accordance with God's will. Unsanctified desires will be graciously refused; but the will of the sincerely obedient man is conformed to the will of God, and therefore it shall be fulfilled. "This is the confidence that we have in Him, that, if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us." CONFIDENCE IN SERVICE.

Our text means also that such a man shall have confidence toward God, in all service for God. Look at the man of God who has confidence toward God, as to the perils encountered in faithfully following his Lord. Take Daniel, for instance, Daniel does not question about what he has to do when the decree is signed that whosoever shall pray shall be cast into the den of lions; he throws up his window as he was accustomed to do; he looks toward Jerusalem, and he bows his knee as he had done aforetime, and he prays to God as if there were no edict. His confidence toward God is that he is safe in the path of duty. He does not count the cost. Alas, what foolish tricks men play with what they call their consciences nowadays! This wonderful nineteenth century is altogether incomprehensible to a simple, honest man. Consciences used to work up and down, yes or no; but now they have an eccentric action, altogether indescribable. A man serves the devil nowadays, and gets the devil's pay, and all the while talks of serving God. May you have a conscience void of offence, straight and clear in everything, and so have confidence toward God.

THE PERFECT PEACE.

I wish I had time to tell you all that confidence toward God means. It means rest, perfect rest. Look at your Lord when the tempest was on. Loud roaring, the billows come near to overwhelming the ship; but He is asleep. Nobody but He could dare to slumber, because nobody else had such confidence toward God. He knew the vessel was safe; why should He worry? He cast Himself on God, and fell asleep. It was the best thing to do. You and I may do the same; we need not be frightened, nor worried, nor troubled; but just trust in the Lord and do good, so shall we dwell in the land, and verily we shall be fed. This is confidence toward God.

Blessed man, that hath confidence in God. Such a man goes up to his last bed when the message comes that the spirit must return to God who gave it; he goes to die without alarm; his conscience does not condemn him, and therefore he lays himself down in patience, and waits the signal to be with God. Meanwhile the light of heaven steals over his face, and they that come to cheer and comfort him hear strange words, like notes of the birds of Paradise, dropping from his lips. They see that he is in pain, but they also mark that he is baptized in enjoyment. They think that he is dying, but he testifies that he is entering into life. The pearly gate is open before him, the glitter of the golden street is meeting his failing eye. Hear him sing, as best his failing breath permits:

"And when ye see my eye-strings break,
How sweet my minutes roll;
A mortal paleness on my cheek,
But glory in my soul."

Now he is gone, gone into the land of spirits. He stands before his God, and he does not tremble. He has that eagle-eye which can bear the light of the eternal sun. His heart condemns him not, and he has confidence toward God. Amid the supernal splendors he cries, "My Father." Angels are crying, "Lord and God," but he saith, "My Father," and those loyal servants make room for a royal child. The shining ones escort the happy spirit to the blessed Father's feet. There we leave him. "Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God." God bless you. Amen.

MARIA FRY, THE SOLDIERS' FRIEND.

MANY a sunburnt soldier in India, many a stalwart cavalry-man in Canada, many a drummer-boy in the various English barracks, exclaims, as his eye lights on the picture of this lamented lady, "Why, there's our friend, Miss Fry!" and many an eye fills with tears as memory recalls the loving counsels of the voice never again to be heard on earth, and of the hand that has forever laid down the pen.

As sacred to many a soldier's heart will be the memory of Maria Fry as to many a prisoner's heart was that of Elizabeth Fry fifty years ago. Very unlike the dignified and venerable Quakeress in some respects was this simple, earnest young evangelist, yet very like in others. The love of Christ constrained both to care for the souls of their fellow-men; both succeeded in influencing, by holy gentleness and loving presentation of the truth as it is in Jesus, those too often deemed inaccessible by such means; and each will have multitudes of souls for her crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ. Though the one lived beyond the term allotted to man, and the other was still in the early summer of her days when she passed away from the ranks of the Church on earth, yet each devoted her life to God.

From the time of her conversion, at twelve years of age, to the day of her death, twelve years later, the one great object and interest of Maria Fry's life was the salvation of souls, and especially of the souls of soldiers. With perseverance and steadfastness she kept her life-work continually before her; in the hours of happy childhood her greatest gladness was in talking to others about the Saviour she loved; throughout her girlhood she had this as her one engrossing interest—an interest which preserved her from feebleness and folly, and brought her more into sympathy with earnest servants of God than with young people of her own age.

As she grew on, her expanding heart only embraced the spiritual interests of others more warmly and more deeply, and when she became a suffering invalid the salvation of soldiers was still constantly before her. She would dictate when she could no longer write letters of spiritual counsel and encouragement to such, and would read or hear with loving eagerness their replies. She wrote thousands of such letters during her brief life, and very many soldiers, and others in different parts of the world, were led to Christ through this instrumentality. She now rests from her labors, and her works do follow her.

Drawn, as the English army has been, from the very lowest stratum of the population, hard cases are always numerous in the ranks. Sometimes they are characterized by sullenness and coarse vice; in other cases a wild, reckless daring is the prominent feature; but always it is difficult to reach them by ordinary influences. They need personal and individual effort, and this has not often been made. Miss Fry, however, had rare tact in approaching the rough men and winning their confidence. They would listen to her appeals respectfully, and after a few interviews would treat her as an old friend. Many strange secrets have been revealed to her in her conversations with soldiers. Men enlist from a wide variety of motives, but it is generally some sudden trouble that drives them into the army. A disappointment in love is a very common cause, and many have joined through harshness at home. In both those cases Miss Fry has been known to effect a reconciliation after taking vast trouble with both parties to the quarrel. Her interest in the soldier was always unwearied, and her name is an honored one in many a regiment.

NEW BOOKS.

CITY BALLADS,

by Will Carleton, is a companion volume to Farm Ballads, Farm Legends, and Farm Festivals, by the same author. It is elegantly bound and profusely illustrated. Many copies of it will doubtless go as presents from young men settled in the city to their old friends in the farm-houses of the country. They will be very acceptable, for it is rare that city life is portrayed so graphically and vividly as in this collection of poems. They prove that even in the busy scenes of city life, in the unromantic struggle in the prosaic streets and slums of the metropolis, the true poet can recognize an element romantic and poetic. The scene is shifted from the fields and orchards and farmyards of the country to the pavement, the high buildings, the stores and offices, and the dens and traps of the city; but Mr. Carleton appears to be as much at home there as he was in the pure air of the country. The peculiar charm of Mr. Carleton's poetry is preserved here by the form in which the new subject-matter is presented. Mr. Carleton's effort is to "reproduce some of the effects of city scenes and character upon the intellect and imagination of two people from the country." First, a young student fresh from a rural college, and second, an old farmer of warm heart who, after a life of hard toil, has suddenly become rich by the discovery of oil on his land. The latter forms the resolution to "look about and see what I can see;

Appoint myself a visiting committee,
With power to act in all parts of the city;
Growl when I must, commend where'er I can,
And lose no chance to help my fellow-man.
For he who joy on others' paths has thrown,
Will find there's some left over for his own;
And he who leads his brother toward the sky,
Will in the journey bring himself more nigh."

The farmer comes to the city, and, true to his plan, takes in all the sights, among them many that visitors do not usually see. He rides on the elevated railroad, has a dip at Ocean Grove, and even goes into the vile dens of the Bowery, where his adventures with "a confidence man" are amusingly told. The farmer falls into the artful snare, and loses his money. Altogether he learns a great deal in the city.

The poems are grouped under eight heads: Wealth, Want, Fire, Water, Vice, Virtue, Travel, Home. Under the head of Fire is the famous "Fireman's Story," one of the most pathetic and thrilling narratives of the book. But the most touching and beautiful of the poems is found in the group under the head of "Want." It is the story of a sewing girl, who is earning her livelihood by sewing at twenty cents a day, and as she toils, her thoughts go back to the time when she stood on a stage, courted and applauded by the crowds who are gone now to worship some other popular idol, and have left her to starve. The illustration on the next page, for which we are indebted to the publishers of "City Ballads," represents the scene that flitted through the poor girl's memory. The following extract from the affecting poem must close the notice of a book full of exquisite poetic sketches:

A SEWING-GIRL'S DIARY.

Here—am I here?
Or is it fancy, born of fear? . . .
Is't the same girl that stood, one night,
There in the wide hall's thrilling light,
With all the costly robes astr
That love and pride had bought for her?
How the great crowd, 'mid their kind din,
Gazed with gaunt eyes and drank me in!
And then they hushed at each low word,
So Death himself might have been heard,
To hear me mournfully rehearse
The tender Hood's sad, plaintive verse
About the woman, who, half dead,
Stitched her frail life in every thread.
How little then I knew the need!
Yet for my own sex I did plead,
And my heart crept on each word's track
Till soft sobs from the crowd came back.
I saw my sister, streaming-eyed,
Yet bearing still a face of pride:
Oh, sister! when you looked at me
With that quick yearning glance of love,
Did you peer on, to what might be—

What is?—and is it known above?

When that great throng a shout did raise,
And gave me words of heartfelt praise,
And loving eyes their incense burned
Till my young girlish head was turned—
Did your clear eye see farther then
A moment past all mortal ken,
And in the dreary scene I drew
Did my own form appear to you?
It might have been; grief was o'er-nigh,
And—God, have pity!—this is I,
Treading a steep and dang'rous way,
And—earning twenty cents a day!

ALICE'S LOST FORTUNE.

(See Illustration.)

In a bachelor's luxuriant quarters in one of our best flat-houses a man lay in bed, tossing wearily. The medicine-bottle and glass on the table confirmed the impression the spectator gathered from his appearance. The man was ill. He had inquired from the paid nurse who sat by his bedside several times that morning what the hour was. He seemed to be nervously expecting some arrival, and when, soon after noon, the bell rang he looked quickly and anxiously toward the door, at which a pretty girl of eighteen entered. She came rapidly to his bedside, and greeted him affectionately. Then divesting herself of her wraps, she bent over him tenderly, and asked him what she could do. The invalid sent his attendant out of the room, and when the two were alone he said:

"Alice, my dear, I have sent for you to tell you bad news. It is better that you should hear it from my lips than from any one else. You know I have loved you dearly—loved you as a father, have I not?"

"Indeed you have, uncle; no girl ever had a wiser, more devoted guardian."

"No, not that, Alice. A loving guardian, but not a wise one. My child, I have sent for you to confess my folly, and to ask you if you can forgive me. My poor girl, I have lost all your fortune. I hoped that I could get you a better interest for it, and I invested it foolishly. It is all gone, every cent, and all I have is gone with it. Oh, what a fool I have been!" and the voice was broken with tears.

It certainly was a crushing blow to the young girl standing there. It changed all her future, and she could tell no more than her miserable uncle how she would live. But her faith triumphed. Laying her hand on the hot, feverish one in which her other hand was clasped, she said: "Do not grieve, uncle; God will surely care for me. He was the God of my father and my mother, and He will not desert me. Depend upon it, the money has been taken from me for a wise purpose. I am not afraid."

"Oh, Alice, can you forgive me, then? It is such a dreadful thing for you, but, believe me, I had a good motive in putting your money there."

"Certainly, uncle, I forgive you fully. Do not grieve any more."

The sick man threw himself back on his pillow exhausted, and closed his eyes as if in prayer. A little later he seemed to have fallen asleep, and Alice watched him silently. It was more than an hour afterward when she noticed a change in his face, and she sent the attendant for the physician. It was too late, however; the messenger had come, and the stricken man never recovered consciousness. Before the next morning Alice was left alone in the world, and the kind guardian who had in some respects rendered her orphan life less lonely was taken from her.

Hers was a situation in which faith had need be strong, and happily Alice's was well-grounded. She confronted the world boldly, relying on her Heavenly Father's care. In the midst of trial and hardship her faith never wavered. Accepting her privations as a discipline, she sought to learn from them the lessons they could teach, and she grew stronger and more devoted as time passed. Years afterward, when the cherished wife of a noble Christian man, she was called upon to stand by his side during a great crisis in life, and through her undaunted faith and constant encouragement he fought and won his battle, Alice knew that she could never have given to her husband the support he needed had she not herself passed through the furnace of trial. It had been good for her and for him she loved that "she had borne the yoke in her youth" (Lam. 3: 27).

THE SILVER LINING.

A SERIAL STORY.
The Dark Cloud.

ALL unconscious of the impending blow that was to desolate his home, Dr. Arnold sallied forth on his errands of mercy. At Thornleigh his presence was of no use for the present. The soothing potion he had administered to the little Dora must have time to produce its effect. Mrs. Stevenson would have been glad to keep him under her roof, with an instinctive feeling that her idolized little daughter was safer while the skilful physician was in the house; but the Doctor knew that he was powerless for the present, and insisted on going to see other patients to whom he might be of use.

"My dear friend," he said to the anxious mother, "we must wait a few hours, and I must employ the interval in necessary duty. Dora is in higher hands than ours. I cannot cure her; path which led him up and down many a grassy glade. The path he took brought him out at last to a lake, and standing back from it some distance on a slight eminence was a cottage to which he guided his horse's steps.

A trim little garden surrounded the cottage, and roses climbed up the front, mixing with sweet-scented clematis, which now perfumed the air. As the doctor rode up a large retriever came out from a kennel, wagging his tail—for evidently the visitor was no stranger.

The cottage door was quickly opened, and the doctor entered a comfortable little sitting-room to the right. There his patient, James Harding, was sitting. He found him suffering from so severe an attack of bronchitis, brought on by the few early autumnal evenings, that he could only speak with difficulty.

"I've just been thinking, sir, the Master maybe has nearly got my mansion ready," he said, after the doctor had made a few inquiries.

"A mansion, Harding; but how do you know there will be one for you?" said the doctor, wishing to hear what the old man would say.

It was almost with a reproachful look he said, "Know, sir! Why, hasn't He said, 'In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you?' and, I take it, as long as we've got the wedding-garment on that He has given us He'll ask no more."

A fit of coughing prevented the old man saying any more for a few minutes; then he tried to speak again.

"It's hard to leave the old woman, sir, very hard; but I tell her it won't be for long—only a little while, you know, sir."

"Yes, Harding, only a little while; and now good-by. I hope you will have an easier night through the medicine I am giving you."

"Good-by, sir, and thank you kindly for all you've ever been to me."

And the doctor rode off again, this time taking his way across a piece of moorland, over which a few cottages lay scattered, then on to a large-sized village, which would no doubt before long assume the dignity of a town. He was going to the far-end of the village to visit the clergyman's wife, when as he rode along some one coming out of a shop made him look round. He saw that it was a face he knew and immediately pulled up.

"Well, May, and how are you to-day? and how is your mother?"

"Thank you, Dr. Arnold, she had a bad night; and though we hardly thought you would be through to-day, yet I came down this way hoping I might get sight of you. She would be very glad if you would go round and see her."

The doctor did not say so, but inwardly he was very sorry to have to lengthen his ride. Still he was the last ever to shirk duty, and quickly promised May he would soon be with her mother. Accordingly, after seeing Mrs. Morris at the vicarage, he rode on to Sunny-croft, the pretty residence of May's father, Mr. Richardson, who was a lawyer of some repute in the neighborhood.

On this particular afternoon the doctor had no

all I can do is to help her to get rest and quiet, while the disease is running its course. She will fall asleep soon, and that will, I hope, give her strength, so that when she wakes she will not suffer so much from restlessness, and will be better able to bear her pain. She has to fight her battle with the disease herself; we cannot strike the enemy, but we can strengthen her to resist his assaults, and we can do no more than that. I am speaking, of course, of the physical side of the case, I need not remind you that there is a spiritual side. There is no limit to God's power. I have seen patients recover when by every rule known to physicians they ought to have died, and the secret of their recovery was in the prevailing prayer of some one who pleaded for the sufferer's life. Medicine and medical skill have failed over and over again, and yet recovery has come—come, I verily believe, from the Giver of life directly. As to Dora, I tell you the limit of my power as a physician; what God may do for you in answer to prayer you do for a few hours. Good-by. Now I must go for a few hours. Good-by."

Dr. Arnold's next visit was to a very different home. After leaving Thornleigh behind him for some distance, he turned off into a bridge-time to spare; he did not shorten his necessary inquiries and directions for his patient, but when that was accomplished he hastily said good-by, and at last once more turned his horse's head in the direction of Thornleigh. When he left the Vicarage he noticed that with the setting sun dark clouds were coming up, the wind was rising, and there was every prospect of a stormy night. Now, coming out from Mr. Richardson's, he buttoned up his coat more closely, for the wind was very cutting, and urged on his good horse to quicker speed.

The heavy clouds made the evening an unusually dark one; so, instead of taking the short cut back through the wood, Dr. Arnold was obliged instead to go by the road which skirted it for a considerable distance. The wind moaned and howled dismally as he rode along; once or twice the moon peeped out, but it was only for a minute, and the driving clouds soon covered it again. He had not gone far before heavy rain set in—no slight shower, but such rain as usually accompanies a thunder-storm. The season had been a very wet one, and in many parts fields had been under water. The bright morning had made every one hope that drier days were in store, but now it seemed as if the rain were coming down with renewed energy.

The wind increased in fury every minute. The doctor bent his head before it that he might get his breath, but horse and rider both suffered by the opposing element. Progress was slow, and there seemed to be a force in that gale almost strong enough to stop it altogether. What a night! Here screened by the trees and high hedges, if it was so fierce, what must it be at sea, with nothing to impede the course of that mighty wind! Dr. Arnold thought pitifully of the sailors who were out in the storm, and then, like a flash, there entered his brain the thought that Grace, his beloved child, must be at this very moment on board the vessel which was to carry her and Mrs. Campbell to their destination in the north. "God protect my darling in her peril!" was the cry that rose from the trusting heart of the Christian man, as he rode on in the darkness, with wind and rain beating on his face.

Very glad was Dr. Arnold to catch sight of the lights at Thornleigh as, weary and wet, he once more rode up to the door.

He found his little patient had just dropped off to sleep after a restless day. So, after changing his wet garments by Mr. Stevenson's dressing-room fire, he was soon down-stairs ready for dinner.

The little child's sleep did not last long, and she woke up unrefreshed. Again the doctor took his place by her bedside and did all in his power to soothe her, comforting the poor mother's heart by assuring her he would not leave the house that night.

Rejoining Mr. Stevenson shortly after in the drawing-room, the two gentlemen tried to keep up a cheerful conversation, but it was evident neither of them were in the mood for it, and the sound of the pouring rain outside was very depressing.

At last Mr. Stevenson said:

"I tell you what, Arnold, you and I are not very bright to-night; let us see if we should find the library more cheering; you know it is always the best room in the house to me."

They were soon in the well-lighted, pleasant, cosy library, and for a time both seemed to forget their depression. All at once they were startled by a gurgling sound they could not understand, and listening, they heard, unmistakably, the rushing of water.

At the moment some of the servants came running in, saying the water was pouring into the house. There was no doubt what it was; the unusual rains had weakened the bank of the ornamental lake in the grounds, and the heavy down-pour of the evening proving too much for its strength, it had given way.

Higher came the water, every minute finding its way further into the house. Soon there was nothing but hurry and confusion; some pulled up carpets, others piled chairs one on the top of the other, and in half an hour no one would have recognized the well-ordered house and quiet household of Thornleigh.

What a strange night it was—every one busy, doing all they could to remove the valuable furniture out of danger, and the little sick child upstairs unconscious of all that was going on. How little the good doctor, as he busily worked with the others through that strange night, every now and then going up to see after his young patient, dreamt of what that storm was working in another place.

At last the rain ceased, and the water began to decrease, but the mud and the damp would take days to remedy.

In the morning Dr. Arnold, to the intense joy of the parents, was able to pronounce the little sufferer better, though complete quiet and freedom from excitement were still necessary, and would be for some time to come.

After a very early breakfast the doctor set off homeward, for he was not a little anxious to know how his own family had fared during the terrible night; he thought also lovingly of his Grace far away, and longed for tidings of her. Mrs. Arnold was never more glad to welcome her husband than she was that morning. Beyond a sleepless night and some damage to the garden, no harm had been done at home. Many inquiries were made about Dora Stevenson and the effect of the storm at Thornleigh, and then the doctor, after half an hour's rest at home, began afresh his day's duties. No one thought of his being tired or weary, so bright and cheery was he that day going from place to place, with a kind word for each fresh patient.

Surely no profession is more noble or self-sacrificing than a doctor's, for there is no time, day or night, that he can call his own. What strange scenes he is called to witness, how many a secret is unfolded to him of which the outside world never dreams, how many a cupboard door he is obliged unwillingly to open, revealing the hidden skeleton of many a family! And what power, what opportunities are committed to him, not only of restoring bodily health, but also of speaking a word in season which may bring life to the sin-sick soul.

To Dr. Arnold, his profession was a solemn trust. He was accounted one of the most skillful practitioners in the neighborhood. He was conscientious in his endeavor to learn all that was to be learned of the mysteries of his calling. Disease is ever taking new forms, something before unknown is being continually disclosed about the organs of the human body, discoveries are constantly being made of new medicines which are efficacious in special cases. All this the busy physician was eager to learn, and few realized how intense was the study to which he applied himself at the close of his day's exhausting labor.

On the day following that stormy night, his visits were unusually numerous. He was wanted in many places by patients newly fallen sick, and by sick patients who were worse after the storm. Somehow it seems as if the human frame sympathized with the disturbances of the outer world. What the connection is between the atmosphere and the mind and body we do not know, but it is evidently a very close one, and it seems closer in delicate organisms than in stronger ones. The debilitated sufferer in a comfortable room, carefully shielded from the outer air, and protected from changes of temperature by artificial heat, nevertheless is unaccountably responsive to disturbances of the weather, of which the watcher by his bedside is unconscious. Thus it happened that on that day Dr. Arnold had fewer leisure moments than usual, and was called upon more frequently than he generally was to minister to that more subtle form of suffering which strong people describe contemptuously as nothing but nervousness. He came home at night thoroughly weary in mind and body, and was glad to retire to rest at an early hour, earnestly hoping that for once he might pass the night in undisturbed repose.

Happily, the night-bell was silent all through the night, and the Doctor rose refreshed and thankful. He entered his study and sat down for half an hour's reading before breakfast. He could hear his two elder daughters chatting merrily in their own room on the same floor, and speculating on the probabilities of their getting a letter out of the bag the postman was carrying along his route, as they watched him from their window. The sisters thought it just possible he might bring a letter from Grace, so they were specially eager.

How unconcerned he looked, how unconscious of the tidings of joy or sorrow that he was bearing to each house! At last he was coming to the Arnolds, and Helen rushed to the door in time to meet him.

"Oh, Kate, there is none from Grace, only one letter, and that is for papa! It is quite a strange handwriting. How uninteresting!"

As she walked slowly toward her father's study she was trying to make out the post-mark; but it was so rubbed she could not succeed.

She opened the study door, as her father's voice said, "Come in," and gave him the letter.

"Is this all, Helen?"

"Yes, papa; I thought there might have been one from Grace."

"That was hardly likely, Helen."

She would have left the room at once, but her eye caught sight of a new book, and she stopped to look at it.

A groan from her father made her turn quickly toward him. She saw the letter had dropped from his hand, and he was deathly pale.

"Father, dear father, what is it?"

He could not speak for a moment; then he said, "Call your mother."

She and Kate came quickly at Helen's tasty summons.

"My darling," he said, "can you bear it?" and then as if to himself, "How can I tell her?" but the mother seemed to know instinctively what had happened. The color went from her lips as she said:

"Ralph, it is our Grace."

Each read the sad letter, which told them the crushing news of bereavement; and then the two girls crept away and left their father and mother alone—alone with their sorrow and their God.

No human sympathy could soothe them; well for them they knew to whom to go—even to Him who said, "I am the resurrection and the life."

Two hours went by; no one ever knew what passed within those study walls; then Mrs. Arnold came out and went up to her daughters' room, where she felt sure she would find them. She opened the door, and sat down by the two girls. They were there together, trying to bear their first great sorrow. She put her hands in theirs. How icy cold they were! But her face was calm, though there were traces of the agony of the past two hours upon it.

"My poor girls!" She tried to speak, but no more words would come, and their sobs came afresh.

There they sat for some time, the poor mother speechless and tearless. None of them could trust themselves to speak on the subject of which their hearts were so full.

At last Mrs. Arnold said: "Your father and I are going to-morrow; it is too late for us to go to-day, so we shall write to say we are coming," and then, very quietly, she added: "We must try and think of our darling safe home and happy. We shall go to her, for she is gone before, and will not heaven seem more home-like with one of our precious ones there?"

But the effort was too great, and a violent shivering fit came on, which made the sisters forget their grief for a time, as they anxiously tended their poor mother. They led her away to her own room, and there, with the sweet, gentle sympathy that true women alone can give to each other, they soothed her and comforted her, and in that work, as it always is, they themselves were strengthened.

NAAMAN THE LEPER.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 20, 11 Kings 5: 1-16 Golden Text, Ps. 51: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Not Accidentally Afflicted—God Permitted It—The Little Practiser in the Household—Her Declaration—How She Knew of Elisha—Her Words Repeated at Court—The King's Action—A Common Blunder—An Unspiritual Man's Embarrassment—Elisha Interposes—Wounded Dignity—His Typical Reasoning—A Common-Sense Argument—Healing and Gratitude.

ELISHA'S usefulness was not confined to the land of Israel. "A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid" (Matt. 5: 14). God had called the prophet to be a beacon light in a time of gross darkness, a chosen witness even in other lands to His power and love. It was no accident that Naaman, captain of the host of Syria, was a leper. The hand of God had been in his exaltation—"by him the Lord had given deliverance unto Syria." Because God permitted it, he was a great man with his master and honorable; and also because God permitted it, he was a leper. Does God love, then, to tantalize His creatures, to raise their hopes high, and then blight them? Oh, no; but He had higher ends in view for Naaman than merely earthly honor and glory, and thus He suffered him to be driven to an extremity in which his only resource would be the yet unknown God. And He brought it about so simply. A little maid was made the instrument. She was not so much a little preacher as of what she knew about God. We do not hear of her taking to task her fellow-servants in the house of Naaman, where she was a slave, taken captive in the war; we do not hear of her saying that her master's sore affliction was a judgment upon him for his having torn her away from her home and from her parents. No doubt in her loneliness, among heathen strangers, the Lord was with her, as He had been with Joseph in the house of Potiphar, and her heart, far from dwelling on her own wrongs, welled up with love to all around her. She said to her mistress, Naaman's wife, "Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy." How did she know this? In all the days of Elisha's ministry not one leper had been healed (Luke 4: 27). How, then, could she be sure that Naaman, a Gentile stranger, should be the first? It is more than probable that God had revealed it to her; and were it not so, she knew that every one in need who had gone to God through Elisha had been delivered from his burden.

There must have been something unusual about this young child of God. It is clear that, like Joseph, her master saw that the Lord was with her; like Samuel, God let none of her words fall to the ground (Gen. 39: 3; 1 Sam. 3: 19). The words of the little maid were repeated at court, and caused such an impression that the very king himself took the matter in hand; and, no doubt to the great disgust of all the medical men in Syria, he sent the general of his army in the greatest state into Israel, with a letter to the king that he should recover him of his leprosy.

The King of Syria knew no more about

than do most people in the present day. He looked on the power of healing as resident in Elisha, and as being exercised at will in obedience to the king's command. Of course the King of Syria did not see God in the matter at all; his own gods were myths; superstition said they did this or that; tradition told of wonders accomplished; but the king had no experience of them, and he only dealt with his gods through the priests. The King of Israel was little better. More instructed, of course, for he knew there was a God, and he knew that Elisha had power with God; but he himself had never once come into personal contact with Him. The letter of the King of Israel enraged him; he was brought by it to define his true position and take it as a spiritual or an unspiritual man. Nothing goads an unconverted man like the simple appeal to do some spiritual thing. Let him be asked to pray for a definite thing, he will back out of it by saying he does not know the will of God; let him be asked to show somebody the way of salvation, he will say that he has no gift that way, or that he does not believe in forcing things; and he will designate dependence upon God as blasphemy, because it is beyond his depth. The King of Israel was no exception. "Am I God to kill and to make alive that this man doth send unto me to recover a man of his leprosy? Wherefore consider, I pray you, and see how he seeketh a quarrel against me." Personal considerations were all that moved him; whether Naaman was healed or not was no concern of his. What a reproach it must have been to the king when Elisha sent to him and said, "Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? let him come now to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel!"

WOUNDED DIGNITY.

Naaman was unused to be sent from pillar to post. The king had paid no court to him; he had been treated as the loathsome leper he was, and very likely he was sore about it. But when he came, with all his pomp, and stood at the door of the humble house of Elisha, and even there he was a nobody, it was too much to bear. The prophet did not even come to look at him, did not ask after a single symptom, did not so much as know how many retainers he had with him, and treated him just like an ordinary man! Naaman looked upon himself as a most important person, and upon his case as a very special one. But God, who had guided his way from Syria to the land of Israel, was directing all which happened to the great end of making Himself known to Naaman, and so delivering him from his self-occupation and his self-conceit. Elisha was in God's plan. "Surely the Lord will do nothing but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets" (Amos 3: 7). He knew that Naaman's sickness and healing were only means to an end, and that the main end of God was his conversion to Himself. Thus Elisha simply sent a message to Naaman, saying: "Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean." Naaman had built a castle in the air; he had let loose the reins of his imagination, and had drawn a beautiful picture, in which, of course, himself was the chief figure; and to his dismay it vanished from his sight. "He was wroth, and went away and said,

BEHOLD I THOUGHT,

He will surely come out to me, and stand and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place and recover the leper." In his idea there should have been an imposing ceremonial in which Elisha should prove his power, and in which himself should be conspicuous—a something which could be told and retold to his own and Elisha's glory. But to go down and take a bath in a little, insignificant river like Jordan, to do what any other man could do, and then to make such a fool of himself as to take a bath seven times, when, if the waters had any virtue, the first time would surely be enough—no, this was too humbling, too absurd. So thinks the haughty sinner when he is told to do nothing but accept a crucified Redeemer and a work already done. So thinks a struggling believer who longs for purity of heart, when he is told to cease his struggles and efforts, and to believe that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth him from all sin. So thinks a poor distracted sufferer when he is told to do nothing but only accept the healing already wrought out by Him who took his infirmities and bore his sicknesses! Naaman, in his anger, began to reason the point. "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" If water is going to do it, "may I not wash in them and be clean?" If the oil is going to do it, may I not use a little oil at home without coming to an anointing service?" say some invalids. It is not the water that does it, it is not the oil that does it—it is "the Lord that healeth thee" (Ex. 15: 26), who does His own work.

Naaman was already on his homeward way, nursing his mortified pride and his leprosy together, when a little common-sense was brought to bear on him. His servants had had a great deal more trouble than he had in this journey, and very naturally they did not like that it should be all for nothing. So they put the matter to him in a new light. "My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? How much rather, then, when he saith to thee, Wash and be clean?" It was an irresistible argument, and it hit right home. Naaman was manly enough to acknowledge it, and mortification gave way to real humility. Oh, how easy is it for poor fallen human nature to do to be some great one! Paul was "nothing" (11 Cor. 12: 11). John the Baptist said, "I must decrease" (John 3: 30), and our Lord Himself said, "I can of Mine own self do nothing" (John 5: 30). All this is the reverse of our human nature, which vaunteth itself and is puffed up. Naaman was brought to the right point at last, of being nothing and of doing the simple thing he was told to do. And then change beyond all which he had pictured to himself took place. First, there was a revelation of God in His power and in His love. With the quickened life of his body, when "his flesh came again like unto the flesh of a little child, and he was clean," came also an apprehension of God and of things spiritual as never before. So is it always in divine healing. The soul is brought into the position with God through which He can work, and He acts through upon the body. Naaman's heart was full of praise, but it was not of the healing or of the prophet that he spoke; his theme was the God who had done this thing. He returned to the man of God, he and all his company (after having audience with God he could obtain audience with the prophet), and he said: "Behold now I know that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel." Sweet words to Elisha's ear, very different from the flattery with which Naaman would have loaded him had things been as he thought.

But what should he do with the rich provision which the King of Syria had given him where-with to fee the prophet who should heal him? He offered it to Elisha, but was instantly refused. "As the Lord liveth, before whom I stand, I will receive none." God's purpose was accomplished, Naaman was converted, and God had a witness who should tell in Syria that He was a real, true, mighty God, who could change a heart and heal an incurable disease in the same hour. When Naaman foresaw a possible difficulty in his official duties when accompanying his master to the home of Rimmon, and he wanted to know how the Lord would regard it, the prophet only said, "Go in peace," for the God he had found in Israel would be with him in Syria to guide him, and he had already declared that he would "henceforth offer neither burnt offering nor sacrifice unto other gods, but unto the Lord." Who shall say that God may not in our day convert and heal the heathen at one and the same time? Who will say that divine healing is unnecessary?

The death, on Thursday, September 3d, of the venerable servant of Christ, whose name was honored and revered in all the churches, does not come upon the Christian community of America as a surprise. He was in his eighty-sixth year, and the reports that have come from his quiet retreat at Irvington-on-the-Hudson, during the past few months, proved that both he and those who loved him best could have no desire that his life should be prolonged. His work was done, and well done, and the haven of blissful rest in the bosom of the Father, with all the feebleness and infirmities of advanced age, cast off, would be, as he and all around him felt, a most welcome change. He died so calmly and peacefully that his son, who watched him as he slept, could not tell the moment when his spirit passed away. Like a tired child he fell asleep, and without a struggle or a pang, the spirit quitted its worn-out tenement to receive its reward in heaven.

"No earthly clinging—
 No lingering gaze—
 No strife at parting—
 No sore amaze;
 But sweetly, gently,
 He passed away,
 From the world's dim twilight
 To endless day!"

Stephen Higginson Tyng was born at Newburyport, Mass., on March 1st, 1800. His father was prominent in political circles and in the legal profession, and was for some time Collector of the Port at that place. His mother was the daughter of the Hon. Stephen Higginson, whose name he bore. He studied at Harvard, where he graduated in 1817, in the same class with Caleb Cushing, George Bancroft, and Stephen Lounsberry.

BUSINESS TRAINING.

For some years after the completion of his secular education he was occupied in commercial affairs; but God had other work for him to do, and after much thought and prayerful consideration the young man felt it was his duty to devote himself to the work of the ministry.

To his experience in business, doubtless, was owing much of the strong and practical vigor which characterized his sermons, and gave a living energy to his work as a preacher and a pastor. The close relation with busy men into which trade brings those who engage in it is a far better training for the preacher than cloister meditation. It teaches him what his hearers are, and what they need to be told. In the ranks of business men he learns what are the strong temptations that beset them; he can sympathize with them, and is able to give them appropriate warnings. While he who "draws a bow at a venture" may, perchance, hit the joint of the armor, the man who has himself worn the armor is far more likely to know its vulnerable points and direct his arrows to the spot where they will take effect. So it was with Dr. Tyng; and those who listened to his eloquent and earnest discourses went away carrying practical lessons useful to them in their battles with the world.

THEOLOGICAL STUDIES.

Having decided to obey the call he believed he had received from God, Dr. Tyng relinquished his commercial pursuits, and resigning his prospects of gain he devoted all his energies to the acquisition of theological lore. While profoundly conscious that his success as a minister of the Gospel was mainly dependent on the teaching of the Holy Spirit of God, he did not despise learning, nor hold in contempt the advantages to be gained by the teaching of men whose lives were devoted to that work to which he purposed consecrating his life. Accordingly he applied to the learned Bishop Griswold, under whose guidance he gave two years to the study of the Scriptures, and the works of eminent divines. At the close of that period, Dr. Tyng was ordained a deacon of the Episcopal Church, and commenced his labors at Georgetown, D. C.

EARLY MINISTRY.

His next pastorate was at Queen Anne parish, Prince George's County, Maryland; and there, during six years, in a quiet, unobtrusive manner, he labored in the cause of Christ. In the pulpit, in the Sunday-school, and in the homes of his parishioners he was untiring in his efforts, and his heart was gladdened by seeing the blessing of God on his labors. May, 1829, was a season of sorrow to the Maryland church, for at that time the young pastor, who had won for himself the respect and affection of all hearts, was removed from the scene of his labors to Philadelphia, where he became rector of St. Paul's Church.

While at St. Paul's his fame spread to other localities, and a recognition of his worth was made by Jefferson College, which conferred on him the degree of D.D. In 1851 his own college of Harvard, never quick to move in such matters, noticed the growing fame of one of her own students and honored herself in honoring him. While mere titles are to such men as Dr. Tyng only like "the guinea's stamp," it must have been a source of pleasure to him to receive from the college where he had studied as a raw lad the degree of D.D. The title was conferred, and thus two popular universities united in doing honor to this eminent preacher.

After four years' work Dr. Tyng removed to the Church of the Epiphany, in Philadelphia, where he labored till 1845, when the death of the venerable Dr. Milnor left without a pastor the church of St. George, in New York. Hither Dr. Tyng was called, and with this church his name, more than any other, is associated.

NEW YORK PASTORATE.

St. George's Church has an interesting and notable history. It was originally a mission of the great mother church, Trinity. Its first building, erected between 1748 and 1752, was placed at Chapel and Van Cliff streets, upon a spot called Chapel Hill. This is now at Beekman and Cliff streets. The building was destroyed by fire in 1814, but no time was lost in its reconstruction. In 1811 it severed its association with Trinity and became an independent parish. One year after Dr. Tyng became its rector, the growth of this city forced a change of situation, and Peter G. Stuyvesant offered the society a plot of ground in the square which has taken the name of his family. Dr. Tyng himself was greatly in favor of choosing a site in Union Square, where the Everett House now stands, which could then have been bought for $25,000. But the church preferred to accept Mr. Stuyvesant's offer, and what was then a magnificent edifice was erected on the ground furnished by him. At that time the land about was quite country-like, farms being all around, and from the very square, upon which the church was built, a little creek wandered down to the East River.

The new church prospered greatly under Dr. Tyng's rectorship. He was not only a remarkable preacher, convincing and earnest, a keen logician and an interesting pulpit orator, but his personality, and an influence peculiar to himself, entered into all he said, and into his intercourse with his parishioners. He built up many charitable enterprises, going into them himself, and drawing others by the force of his own generous example. His Sunday-school work was particularly great. At one time twenty-five hundred children attended his school, $64,000 for foreign missions was raised in his parish, while he was rector, and the church itself was placed upon a substantial basis. On November 14th, 1865, St. George's was burned to the ground, and Dr. Tyng was at work making arrangements for the building of a new edifice before the charred timbers of the old one had ceased to smoke. The present comfortable and commodious church was the result of his efforts. To this day the church is affectionately mentioned by old New Yorkers more frequently as Dr. Tyng's church than by its own name.

Its influence grew rapidly, and was altogether beneficent. Practical Christianity was manifest there. Religion, as a power, in daily life, was the keynote of Dr. Tyng's preaching, and he had little respect for the forms which, at the present day, some of his brethren make the most prominent feature of their ministry. Stong, vigorous evangelical teaching was heard from the pulpit, and Christ the Saviour of men was the one topic of discourse. Happily for the church and the city, the character of St. George has not changed with time. Under Rev. W. Rainsford, Dr. Wilson, and the Rev. Parke the same saving message which is "the power of God unto salvation," may still be heard within the hallowed walls, and men are still turned to that place from darkness to the living God.

Dr. Tyng was one of the most energetic pastors. During the thirty-three years of his ministry at St. George's, and mainly through his efforts, not only were vast sums of money raised by the church for home and foreign missions, but two churches were actually built in Africa, one being of stone, and the other of brick, the cost of both being entirely defrayed by the congregation of St. George's. In addition to the missionary cause, Dr. Tyng was an earnest temperance advocate at a time when the cause was not so popular among the clergy as it is now, and he was foremost in advocating the claims of institutions of an educational and philanthropic character. He succeeded in infusing much of his zeal into his church, for large and frequent contributions came from St. George's to the aid of those who were laboring in those fields in New York and other cities.

RETIREMENT.

In 1870 Dr. Tyng found it necessary to withdraw in a measure from active pulpit work on account of his extreme age, but his people provided him with an assistant, and he continued his supervision of St. George's parish. But he was becoming increasingly feeble; his intense mental activity, and his unremitting exertions had undermined his physical strength, and entire rest was necessary. On April 28th, 1878, he preached his farewell sermon to his congregation. He was then seventy-eight years old, although his church were reluctant to lose him as its pastor, that course was evidently the kindest thing possible. The loyalty, and devotion, and gratitude of the people were manifest in the arrangements made. His assistant, the Rev. Walter W. Williams, was made his successor, and Dr. Tyng was appointed pastor emeritus with a salary of $5000 a year, which he enjoyed until his death. With a zeal resisting the encroachments of old age, he still lingered in the field reluctant to leave while he could wield a weapon for the Master, whom he had served so long. At his own request, a congregation of children was gathered every Sunday afternoon for several months, in the church of Holy Trinity, of which his son was then rector, and to them the veteran preached with an unctio and a spirit of love, such as breathes in the epistles of the aged Apostle John, and God blessed those simple efforts of the old man to "feed the lambs."

AS A PREACHER;

Dr. Tyng had but few equals in the city or the country, and those who remember his earlier sermons at St. George's speak in strong terms of the fire and eloquence with which he pleaded, exhorted, and denounced, swaying his hearers with true oratorical power. The obvious earnestness and sincerity of the preacher gave him an authority and an influence beyond any possible to the mere pulpit essayist; and as the gaze of his hearers was riveted on his face they felt they were listening to one who knew and felt in his inmost heart the value of the truths he preached and who, like the great apostle of the Gentiles felt as he pleaded with men that he pleaded "for Christ's stead that they would be reconciled into God." One who heard him thirty-five years ago, when he was in the zenith of his power and popularity, writes: "It has been our good fortune to hear him on a variety of occasions—in his pulpit, on the platform, and as a participant in discussions of public interest. But everywhere he retained his perfect individuality without the chance of a mistake. We have heard him eulogize Whitefield and Wesley and Gurney, in his own pulpit; repudiate all sympathy with papacy on the platform, and discuss matters of religious policy with leaders proud of the title of independents. But throughout the whole, we could not escape the conviction that Dr. Tyng was the speaker, and when we considered his arguments as distinctly impressed upon the memory, we saw them stamped with the individuality of their source."

Dr. Tyng was one of the first ministers in America to receive light on the doctrine of and he announced, with his usual bold and outspoken manner, his acceptance and belief in this blessed doctrine. At the Conference on the Second Coming of our Lord, held in Holy Trinity Church in October, 1878, he narrated his experience in relation to this belief, and expressed the satisfaction with which he saw so many of his ministerial brethren enrolling themselves in the ranks of its advocates. He said:

"I hope I may be excused for saying a few simple words in reference to myself. Next month will finish the fifty-ninth year of my poor laboring in the preaching of the Lord's Gospel. Well do I remember, more than fifty years ago, when the great truth of a Saviour's 'Premillennial Coming' burst upon my mind. As a young man in the South, travelling long distances to preach His Word, I was met with such—I will not say ridicule, but with kind and affectionate remonstrance. The world was unprepared around me for any such enunciation, and yet it seemed to me to be the clearest sunlight of the page of Scripture, involved in every real promise of the Gospel, and making the one great foundation upon which all the truth and all the hope of that Gospel rested. I looked at it then entirely alone. I scarcely knew a minister of any class around me that would believe it at all. It seemed to them to be an undervaluing of all the efforts of that which they called the Christian Church."

"I was ready, and I have always been ready, to love those whom my Master loves, and wherever I find the temple in which He dwells, I find the Church which I acknowledge, older in its establishment than Apostolic authority, and grander and wider in its extent than any denominational organization."

"There is, nothing to be sacrificed when we come together as the servants of one God—I will not say under the shadow, but the sunlight of our glorious hope. I believe as fully in the personal Advent of my blessed Saviour in His run time as in the sunrise of to-morrow morning, and look for it as confidently. It may come in my time. Many things have come within its period. It certainly will come within somebody's time; but anybody's generation in which it does come will find multitudes still doubting, Pharisees still questioning, Sadducees still opposing, and I trust many children of Israel looking for deliverance, and rejoicing in the fulness of the salvation which is presented."

AS AN AUTHOR

Dr. Tyng also achieved a wide reputation. His books made him known throughout the land, and won for him the esteem of men who never listened to his voice. We may notice among the volumes he has written, "A Family Commentary on the Four Gospels," "The History of Ruth, the Moabitess," "Esther, the Queen of Persia," "Lectures on the Law and the Gospel," "Forty Years' Experience in Sunday-schools," "Recollections of England," "Fellowship with Christ," "The Child of Prayer," and many other works.

A peculiarly chaste and polished style characterizes all the productions of his pen, and while they are by no means lacking in vigor and power, they evince great care in their preparation, and show how refined and scholarly was the mind from which they proceeded.

Of the treatise on "The Law and the Gospel," published in 1833, while Dr. Tyng was in Philadelphia, he says: "Above five thousand copies have been sent upon their humble but blessed errand of mercy. God has been graciously pleased to make the book useful and effectual to the awakening and instruction of His people, to an extent which has both astonished and humbled its writer. Many precious instances of conversion, by the divine blessing on its instructions, through the power of the Holy Ghost, have been brought to his knowledge; for all of which he desires from his inmost soul to give the praise and glory to the God of all grace. Some of these have been of persons who are now preaching the blessed truths which God was pleased thus to reveal to them from His Holy Word. Some faithful Christian friends have so prized the work that they have habitually kept a number of copies on hand to lend to others, to whom they trusted they might be made useful."

THE SECRET OF A HAPPY HOME

will, perhaps, better than any other of the shorter gems to be found scattered through his works, serve as a specimen of Dr. Tyng's literary style. He says: "It is not the world or the pursuit of the world, but the power of true religion, the fear and the love of God, the consciousness of a heart that really tries to do His will, and confides in the assurance that He will protect and guide others in the same blessed path. Take this great principle of life and truth from the household, let the world rule there in its pride and covetousness, or in its lust of indulgence, and how soon and how thoroughly are domestic happiness, dignity, and peace sacrificed and cast away. . . . Mutual suspicion, recrimination, alienation, separation, divorce, hatred, persecution, murder, all follow in the legitimate train of succession as natural and too often habitual results. A member of a rich household composed of parents and adult children once said to me, 'Sir, our house is a perfect hell.' The lust of wealth and the scramble for its partition had left no filial or fraternal love and confidence behind. How often have I seen the same sad scene repeated!"

The fearful end of a life without God was illustrated with much force in another passage by Dr. Tyng in his lectures on "Esther, the Queen of Persia":

"AN EMINENT STATESMAN OF AMERICA

came to his dying hour in a hotel in Philadelphia. As he lay upon his bed of anguish, lamenting in his secret mind over the folly and sin of the past, and long life of guilt, transcendent power of mind and loftiness of station completely thrown away, he bade his servant bring him one of his cards. There he wrote beneath his own name in capital letters the word remorse. He turned it over and wrote on the other side remorse, and laid it down. Soon his physician came in, a good and serious man. The dying man handed him the card, and asked him to read it. He read remorse. He bade him turn it over and read the other side. He did so, and read again remorse. 'Yes,' said the prostrate man of genius and station, 'that is the whole. It is all remorse.' He said no more, and soon after died. For him the fashion of this world had passed away, its pleasures all departed forever, and left him nothing but the bitter anguish of remorse."

A ROBBER OVERCOME.

The following anecdote was narrated with great dramatic power by Dr. Tyng in one of his lectures: "A very lovely young Christian whom I well knew was laid on a sick bed for many years. She was often unprotected and alone. On one occasion, late at night, as she was lying awake on her bed, her family all asleep in their rooms around, a man was seen by her entering her door. He stopped a moment after he had gained an entrance, her little night-lamp shining on them both from the stand by her bedside. He looked at this calm and lovely girl, surveying him with perfect tranquillity. She raised her finger, pointing upward, and said: 'Do you know that God seeth you?' The man waited a moment but made no reply, and then turned, and walked immediately out, having opened no other doors than the street door and the door of her chamber. Thus God interposed and defended by the weakest instrument, but with the mightiest power."

He being dead yet speaketh.

MR. G. MÜLLER'S ORPHANAGES.

In his forty-sixth annual report, just published, Mr. Müller says: "Through God's especial kindness, the Scriptural Knowledge Institution for Home and Abroad, has been upheld to enter upon its fifty-second year. As time passed on we have had, year after year, abundant cause for praise and thanksgiving, but rarely has this been the case more than during the past year. In this report the reader will find instance upon instance as to how our prayers have been answered."

Commencing the year with a balance of £500 ($2500, no less than £41,558 ($207,790) has been sent, during the past twelvemonth, to Mr. Müller, who, in giving an account of his stewardship, intersperses practical remarks, "intended for the spiritual benefit of the reader." The goodness of God, in removing the typhoid fever from their midst, is gratefully recorded. Also the preservation of the buildings from fire, and the evident working of the Spirit of God in the schools, and among the orphans. "And lastly," says Mr. Müller, "I would publicly express my gratitude to my heavenly Father for continuing to me such a good state of health as that I am, scarcely at all hindered in service for the Lord, and am able to work with my head and pen with as much ease as I could sixty years ago, besides having far less difficulty with regard to my voice and chest in preaching, although, on September 27th, I shall complete my eightieth year, if life be continued to me."
